Foreword

The regular publication of Presidential papers is one of countless procedures—large and small, public and private, mandated by law or fixed by custom—which, taken together, make the United States an open society. This volume, covering the first half of 1978, is as much a dialog with the present as it is a record for the future.

These papers reflect the variety of a President's roles, from ceremonial leader to party chieftain, from partner with Congress in the making of laws to representative of the Nation in the building of a more peaceful world. They reflect as well the vast scope and complexity of the public concerns of Americans in a challenging time.

During the first half of 1978, efforts launched in my administration's initial year began to bear fruit. Important gains were made in such areas as employment and farm income. The Panama Canal treaties, ratified during this period, opened a new era of cooperation in our hemisphere.

Some of the speeches and documents collected here were painstakingly prepared; others were extemporaneous. All, I hope, show my concern with bringing government closer to the people, with responding to human needs, with protecting our liberties and our national values, with preserving natural resources, with strengthening our economy—and, most of all, with building a world of stability, security, and peace.

Preface

This book contains the papers and speeches of the 39th President of the United States which were issued by the White House Press Office during the period January 1–June 30, 1978. A second Public Papers book completing President Carter's second year in office will be printed later in 1979. The material has been compiled and published by the Office of the Federal Register, National Archives and Records Service, General Services Administration.

The material is presented in chronological order within each week, and the dates shown in the headings are the dates of the documents or events. In instances when the release date differs from the date of the document itself, that fact is shown in the textnote. Every effort has been made to ensure accuracy. Tape recordings are used to protect against errors in transcription of Presidential remarks, and signed documents are checked against the original to verify the correct printing. Textnotes, footnotes, and cross references have been provided by the editors for purposes of identification or clarity. Speeches were delivered in Washington, D.C., and other documents released there, unless indicated. All times noted are local times.

All materials have been fully indexed. In addition to the usual subject-matter entries in the index, the material has been classified in categories reflecting the type of Presidential activity or document. For example, a reader interested in the President's speeches will find them listed in the index under "Addresses and Remarks." An index accounting for all the materials for 1978 will be included in Book II.

The Public Papers series was begun in 1957 in response to a recommendation of the National Historical Publications Commission. An extensive compilation of messages and papers of the Presidents covering the period 1789 to 1897 was assembled by James D. Richardson and published under congressional authority between 1896 and 1899. Since then, various private compilations have been issued, but there was no uniform publication comparable to the Congressional Record or the United States Supreme Court Reports. Many Presidential papers could be found only in the form of mimeographed White House releases or as reported in the press. The Commission therefore recommended the establishment of an official series in which Presidential writings, addresses, and remarks of a public nature could be made available.

The Commission's recommendation was incorporated in regulations of the Administrative Committee of the Federal Register, issued under section 6 of the Federal Register Act (44 U.S.C. 1506), which may be found in Title 1, Part 10, of the Code of Federal Regulations.

Preface

A companion publication to the Public Papers series, the Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, was begun in 1965 to provide a broader range of Presidential materials on a more timely basis to meet the needs of the contemporary reader. Beginning with the administration of Jimmy Carter, the Public Papers series expanded its coverage to include all material as printed in the Weekly Compilation. That coverage provides a listing of the President's daily schedule and meetings, when announced, and other items of general interest issued by the White House Press Office. Also included are lists of the President's nominations submitted to the Senate, materials released by the Press Office which are not printed full-text in the book, and acts approved by the President. This information is compiled on a weekly basis and appears at the end of each week's coverage.

Volumes covering the administrations of Presidents Hoover, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, and the first 2 years of President Ford are also available.

This series is under the direction of Fred J. Emery, Director, and Ernest J. Galdi, Deputy Director, Office of the Federal Register, and is produced by the Presidential Documents Division, Robert E. Lewis, Director, and Richard L. Claypoole, Deputy Director. Editors of this book were Katherine A. Mellody, Kenneth R. Payne, and Brian L. Hermes.

White House liaison was provided by Walter W. Wurfel, Deputy Press Secretary. The frontispiece and photographs used in the portfolio were supplied by the White House Photo Office.

The typography and design of the volume were developed by the United States Government Printing Office under the direction of John J. Boyle, Public Printer.

New Delhi, India

*Remarks of the President and President N. S. Reddy at the Welcoming Ceremony.
January 1, 1978*

PRESIDENT REDDY. Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen:

It gives me great pleasure to welcome President and Mrs. Carter and the very distinguished guests on this New Year's Day.

The year just ended saw a new burst of faith and vitality in our two democracies. The year which begins today will, we hope, open a new chapter in our relations.

Our people were greatly enthused at the visit last year of your mother, Mrs. Lillian Carter, and especially at her abiding interest in the little community of Vikhroli, which she served with great dedication some years ago.

Today in welcoming you, we welcome not only the President of the United States but also a great humanist, a man of ideals, and one who has brought to international politics the nobility of moral imperatives.

Much has happened in our two countries since the last visit of an American President to India. It is a happy coincidence that governments in Washington and New Delhi changed almost at the same time. Shared values in terms of democracy and the dignity of the individual have worked for a free and easy dialog between the people and the governments of our two countries.

As mature, independent nations our countries have had differences in priorities and policies, which have often clouded the common ideals and deep affinities which bind us. Neither of our countries has been indifferent to the great challenges which confront the world as a whole. We believe that our goals are the same—a world of peace, justice, and liberty for individuals and nations.

The United States has long interested itself and cooperated with us in our own developmental balance. We believe that a closer and more confident relationship can be of mutual benefit and in turn contribute to serve the cause of building bridges of cooperation between the developed and developing countries.

We hope, Mr. President, that this visit, however short, will provide an opportunity for frank and free discussions and become a catalyst for establishing a clear rapport and understanding between the leaders of our two governments.

But even this brief visit will, I am confident, give you an opportunity to get a feel of the warmth of friendship which the people of India have for the people of the United States.

On behalf of the people and government of India and on my own behalf, allow me to wish you a very pleasant and fruitful stay in Delhi and a Happy New Year.

PRESIDENT CARTER. President and Mrs. Reddy, Prime Minister Desai, distinguished members of the leading group in India, diplomatic members, and people of this great country:

I'm certainly delighted to begin my own new year by coming here to India to make new friends. My mother, who loves this nation and its people very deeply, has told me of the warmth and friendship of the Indian people.

She experienced it in her years of service here and, again, a few months ago in a time of sorrow when she represented me as President and the people of the United States at the funeral of your former president.

I know that I will feel at home here because of the things the United States and India have in common—the importance that we attach historically and in this present day to basic moral values; our common belief in and the daily practice of democracy; our mutual commitment to world peace and to its essential foundations; a more just political and economic order among the nations, large and small, rich and poor; our concern for helping those who are most in need, both our immediate neighbors and those who live far away from our own homes; the great size and potential and economic strength of both our nations; and our readiness on occasion, Mr. President, to criticize others, but to be even more critical of ourselves, knowing that we can always improve even the superb achievements which our people have realized.

I'm very glad to be welcomed by you, such a distinguished leader. And through our correspondence this year, I have also already come to regard Prime Minister Desai as a personal friend. Now I am happy to meet him and you personally. I know him to be a man of great courage, of rectitude and dedication.

We will have much to talk about with the government leaders of India. Both our nations know that an interdependent world requires close cooperation and consultation between the leaders every day, every year which we serve. I am certainly grateful for this opportunity to visit your great country and to learn in person about the largest democracy on Earth.

On behalf of the people of the United States, Mr. President, let me say that we are very glad to renew our friendships, to establish new ones, and to respond toward your heartfelt welcome, and also to return your wish that we both together and the entire world can have a good new year and a world at peace.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The exchange began at 2:27 p.m. at Palam Airport.

Following the arrival ceremony, the President met with President Reddy at the Rashtrapati Bhavan.

New Delhi, India

Happy New Year everybody. I bring you warm New Year's greetings from the people of the United States. I am moved and pleased by the size and the warmth of your welcome. It is a stirring testimony to the common values which have always bound together the Indian people and the people of America.

I am particularly pleased with the presence of the mayor and of your Prime Minister Desai. I know him to be a man of uncompromising dedication to personal and also public morality. Both he and I share with the people of India and the people of my country a deep religious faith.

Interest in my family in your great country of India runs very deep because of my mother's years of service here with you and because of her love for the Indian people. Being here with my wife fulfills a longstanding ambition of mine to visit your great country and your great people. I particularly want to learn about your country and to learn from your country the greatness of India, the culture of India, and your views on the problems with which we all must deal together.

We want the other peoples of the world to benefit from our consultation, our friendship, our standard of moral values, and our hope for world peace. The most important bond between India and the United States is our emphasis on the questions and the commitments of the spirit.

It is to be expected that the world's two greatest and largest democracies are bound together with a profound commitment to the importance of moral values. Our creeds and our religions differ in some ways, but we agree that all faiths be granted equal respect. Both nations are certain that a concern with matters of morals and the spirit is closely connected with the strength of our own democratic political systems.

My own Nation is built on firm and fundamental beliefs. We believe that governments exist to protect the freedom and the well-being of the people. We believe that there are individual rights which have a higher claim than powers of governments. We believe that every human being is entitled to certain basic rights—a right to choose one's own government, a right to worship one's own God, a right to think and to speak one's own mind freely, a right to live where one chooses, a right to learn and to be taught, a right to work, to raise a family, and to eat so as to be strong in mind and body, a right to be cared for with skill and tenderness when ill.

On these human rights can a world of justice be built, and toward these ends the people of America and the people of India must always work together.

May God's blessings and peace be with you all. Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:45 p.m. Following his remarks the President and Prime Minister M. R. Desai went to the Rashtrapati Bhavan for a meeting.

New Delhi, India

*Remarks at the American Embassy to Members of the American Community.
January 2, 1978*

Ambassador Goheen and friends, both those who come from the United States and those who live here permanently, it's good to be on American soil. And as I walked down the path to shake hands with those in front of the crowd, I was impressed at the young age of your staff. I would say the average age is about 7 or 8. [Laughter] We are homesick for Amy. She happens to be in Colorado now, skiing for the first time. We don't have any snow in Georgia, and this is her first experience.

But our country is so great and so strong and, I hope, in its attitudes is enlightened, progressive, and also, benevolent.

It's almost 2 years ago that the people of Iowa, represented so beautifully by the group behind me,<sup>1</sup> exercised their very sound political judgment by giving me my first victory in the long road to election as President of our country. And I want to thank them and the people of Iowa and all of the Americans who have their hearts, at this moment, focused on India because of the presence here of me and my wife.

I've come, just a few moments ago, from the beautiful and simple memorial to Mahatma Gandhi, a man who represented in his simple, courageous, and dedicated life, principles which never change. He was, indeed, and still is a spiritual leader of the whole world, and he represents principles that I try to keep ever present in my own mind—a hope for peace, for nonviolence, for pure truth, for dedication, for compassion, for understanding, for love, for simplicity. And even in his great strength as a moral leader, he was able to exhibit all these characteristics.

It's a sobering thought to know the economic and military and political power of the United States. When I met last night and this morning with the leaders of India—President Reddy, Prime Minister Desai, members of the Cabinet—in almost every important discussion that arose concerning atomic weapons or the prohibition against them, or conventional arms sales to the Horn of Africa, the Middle East, international trade, the functions of the United Nations—in almost every instance, Prime Minister Desai said, "Well, the responsibility lies on the shoulders of you and the Soviet Union." And I think he has a tendency to exaggerate the influence of our country, perhaps, somewhat, but still it is a sobering thought to know that the world looks to us for the maintenance of peace and for mutual progress and for the solution of some of the economic and social ills that afflict the world.

I come here representing our Nation as a President sobered by power and also proud to represent the freedoms and the commitment to human rights and the search for peace that is our Nation and which exemplifies the deep yearnings of all the American people. So, I am an important representative here in India, one of our closest and most valued friends in the largest democracy on Earth.

But equally with me, you represent our country also in a very tangible way and in a permanent way—not just the Ambassador and his wife, but every member of the staff, both American and Indian. You represent the United States here on American soil and in your every contact with the people who look to you and say, "There goes a representative of America." And the wives and husbands of the staff members, and even the smallest child who's perhaps only 2 or 3 years old, you are part of the United States of America here in India. It's with a great sense of awareness that I recognize the professional commitment and the quality of your work in the Embassy here in New Delhi.

Your responsibility is to know this country—its strengths, its weaknesses, its achievements, its problems, its past, its present, and its future—and also to know the same characteristics of our own Nation; to search for common commitments and areas of agreement and means by which we can strengthen the valuable friendships which bind us together.

At the same time, it's incumbent upon you to let us know back in Washington in a continuing, routine way how I, as President, and the Secretary of State, other leaders in our administration and the Congress, can perform better to realize the tremendous hopes that we all share.

India is a special place because of Gandhi, because of Nehru, because of Desai and others. There is a sense in the world that moral leadership derives from the Indian people in a direct and continuing fashion. And I think the elections in India this past year have again shown a reconfirmation of commitment to democracy in its purest form: the right of individual citizens to make their own decisions through freely elected government officials.

It's no coincidence that we share those strong ties of friendship with this great country. We share mutual achievements. We share mutual problems. And we try to exercise our influence in a beneficent way toward areas of the world that might be troubled with conflict and even greater trial or tribulation.

So, as President, I come to express the appreciation of the American people who are at home for the American people who are here doing such a fine job, and to let you know how proud I am of you. We are partners in a noble effort to exemplify the finest hopes and aspirations of the American people throughout the Earth.

Thank you very much for letting me have this chance to share with you what we do together.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12:15 p.m. In his opening remarks, he referred to Robert F. Goheen, United States Ambassador to India.

Following his remarks, the President went to Roosevelt House, the Ambassador's residence, for a working luncheon with Prime Minister Desai.

Earlier in the day, the President met with Prime Minister Desai at the Rashtrapati Bhavan and participated in a wreathlaying ceremony at the Gandhi Memorial.

New Delhi, India

*Remarks Before the Indian Parliament.
January 2, 1978*

*Mr. Vice President, Mr. Prime Minister,
Mr. Speaker, distinguished leaders of the Republic of India:*

I stand before you in this house, the seat of one of the world's greatest legislatures, with feelings of profound friendship and respect.

I bring with me the warm greetings and good wishes of the people of the second largest democracy on Earth, the United States of America, to the people of the largest democracy, the Republic of India.

Not long ago, both of our people's governments passed through grave crises. In different ways, the values for which so many have lived and died were threatened. In different ways, and on opposite sides of the world, these values have now been triumphant.

It is sometimes argued that the modern industrial state—with its materialism, its centralized bureaucracies, and the technological instruments of control available to those who hold power—must inevitably lose sight of the democratic ideal.

The opposite argument is made even more frequently. There are those who say that democracy is a kind of rich man's plaything, and that the poor are too preoccupied with survival to care about the luxury of freedom and the right to choose their own government.

This argument is repeated all over the world—mostly, I have noticed, by persons whose own bellies are full and who speak from positions of privilege and power in their own societies.

Their argument reminds me of a statement made by a great President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln. He said, "Whenever I hear anyone arguing for slavery, I feel a strong impulse to see it tried on him personally."

The evidence, both in India and in America, is plain. It is that there is more than one form of hunger, and neither the rich nor the poor will feel satisfied without being fed in body and in spirit.

Is democracy important? Is human freedom valued by all people?

India has given her affirmative action and answer in a thunderous voice, a voice heard around the world. Something momentous happened here last March—not because any party in particular won or lost, but rather, I think, because the largest electorate on Earth freely and wisely chose its leaders at the polls. In this sense, democracy itself was the victor in your country.

Together, we understand that in the field of politics, freedom is the engine of progress. India and America share practical experience with democracy.

We in the United States are proud of having achieved political union among a people whose ancestors come from all over the world. Our system strives to respect the rights of a great variety of minorities, including, by the way, a growing and productive group of families from your own country, India.

But the challenge of political union is even greater here in your own country. In the diversity of languages, religions, political opinions, and racial and cultural groups, India is comparable to the continent of Europe, which has a total population about the same size as your own. Yet India has forged her vast mosaic of humanity into a single great nation that has weathered many challenges to survival both as a nation and as a democracy. This is surely one of the greatest political achievements of this century or any other century.

India and the United States are at one in recognizing the right of free speech—which Mahatma Gandhi called “the foundation-stone of Swaraaj” or self-government—and the rights of academic freedom, trade union organization, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion.

All these rights are recognized in international covenants. There are few governments which do not at least pay lip service to them. And yet, to quote Gandhi once more, “No principle exists in the abstract. Without its concrete application it has no meaning.”

In India, as in the United States, these rights do have concrete application, and they have real meaning, too. It is to preserve these rights that both our nations have chosen similar political paths to the development of our resources and to the betterment of the life of our people.

There are differences between us in the degree to which economic growth is pursued through public enterprise on one hand and private enterprise on the other hand. But more important than these differences is our shared belief that the political structure in which development takes place should be democratic and should respect the human rights of each and every citizen in our countries.

Our two nations also agree that human needs are inseparable from human rights; that while civil and political liberties are good in themselves, they are much more useful and much more meaningful in the lives of people to whom physical survival is not a matter of daily anxiety.

To have sufficient food to live and to work; to be adequately sheltered and clothed; to live in a healthy environment and to be healed when sick; to learn and to be taught—these rights, too, must be the concerns of our governments. To meet these ends orderly economic growth is crucial. And if the benefits of growth are to reach those whose need is greatest, social justice is critical as well.

India is succeeding in this historic task. Your economic challenges are no secret, and their seriousness is well understood in the West.

But what is far less well understood is the degree to which Indian social and economic policy has been such a success. In the single generation since your independence was gained, extraordinary progress has been made.

India is now a major industrial power. Your economy ranks among the 10 largest in the whole world. You are virtually self-assured and self-sufficient in consumer goods and in a wide variety of other products, such as iron and steel.

There have been notable increases in production in nearly every important sector of your economy—increases which reflect an economy of great technological sophistication. This kind of growth is doubly important to try to reduce trade barriers and to promote both bilateral trade and mutual responsibility for the whole world's trading system.

But most important are the advances in human welfare that have touched the lives of ordinary Indians. Life expectancy has increased by 20 years since your independence. The threat of major epidemics has receded. The literacy rate in your country has doubled. While only a third of Indian children went to school in the years just after independence, nearly 90 percent of primary-age Indian children now receive schooling. Nine times as many students go to universities as they did before.

I mention these gains that we tend to overlook in our preoccupation with the problems that quite properly face and engage our attention.

India's difficulties, which we often experience ourselves and which are typical of the problems faced in the developing world, remind us of the task which lie ahead.

But India's successes are just as important, because they decisively refute the theory that in order to achieve economic and social progress, a developing country must accept an authoritarian or a totalitarian government, with all the damage to the health of the human spirit which comes with it.

We are eager to join with you in maintaining and improving our valuable and mature partnership of political and economic cooperation.

It's a sobering fact, for instance, that in a nation of so many hundreds of millions of people, only a few American business leaders are now involved, on a daily basis, in the economic and commercial life of your country.

We need to identify more areas where we can work together for mutual benefit and, indeed, for the benefit of the whole world.

In the area of development, I am deeply impressed with the creative direction that the Government of India has taken in the new economic statement. You have committed your nation unequivocally to rural improvement and the creation of rural employment. This policy now faces a test of implementation and, especially, the test of bringing its benefits to the very poorest areas of your rural population. The seriousness and the determination, however, of your commitment is a cause for optimism.

We want to learn from you and to work with you however we can.

In agriculture, there are also exciting new areas of technology on which we can work together. After a decade of importing grain, India now stands with a surplus of nearly 20 million tons. This is a tribute to the growing productivity of your agriculture and the competence, also, of your administrative services.

We applaud the grain reserve program that you've begun, and we would welcome the opportunity to share with you our resources and our experience in dealing with storage problems that surpluses bring with them.

Our countries must be in the forefront of the effort to bring into existence the international food reserve that would mitigate the fear of famine in the rest of the world. At the same time, we must recognize that today's surpluses are likely to be a temporary phenomenon. The best estimates indicate that unless new productive capacity is developed, the whole world with its rapidly growing population may be facing large food shortages in the mid-1980's.

The greatest opportunities to increase agricultural productivity exist here in India and elsewhere in the developing world. These opportunities must be seized not just so that Indians can eat better, but so that India can remain self-sufficient and, perhaps, even continue to export food to countries with less agricultural potential than you have.

In the past, America and India have scored monumental achievements in working together in the agricultural field. But there is still a vast, unrealized potential to be tapped.

I would like to see an intensified agricultural research program aimed both at improving productivity in India and at developing processes that could then be used elsewhere. This program could be based in the agricultural universities of our two countries, but would also extend across the whole frontier of research. And beyond research, I would like to identify joint development projects where research can be tested and put to work.

Perhaps Prime Minister Desai and I may now instruct our governments to focus on these matters and to come up with specific proposals within the next few months.

One of the most promising areas for international cooperation, which I have already discussed with your Prime Minister, is in the regions of eastern India and Bangladesh, where alternating periods of drought and flood cut cruelly into food production. Several hundred million people live in this area. They happen to be citizens of India, Bangladesh, and Nepal.

Great progress has already been made between your nations in resolving questions concerning water. And we are prepared to give our support when the regional states request a study that will define how the international community, in cooperation with the nations of South Asia, can help the peoples of this area use water from the rivers and the mountains to achieve the productivity that is inherent in the land and the people.

Sustained economic growth requires a strong base in energy as well as in agriculture. Energy is a serious problem in both our countries, for both of us import oil at levels that can threaten our economic health and expose us, even, to danger if supplies are interrupted. American firms are already working with Indians in developing the oil-producing area off the shores of India, near Bombay.

We also have a long record of cooperation in the development of nuclear power, another important element of India's energy plans. Our work together will continue in this field, as well. This is a cold, technological subject. But Prime Minister Desai and I had warm and productive discussions about this field. We have notified him that shipments of nuclear fuel will be made for the Tarapur reactor.

And because of an accident that did occur in your heavy water production plant, we will make available to India, also, supplies from our reserves of heavy water.

Additionally, we stand ready to work with you in developing renewable energy resources, especially solar energy. There is no shortage of sunlight in India. And the lack of a massive, existing infrastructure tied to fossil fuel use will make the application of solar and solar-related energy vastly easier here than it will be in my own country, where we are so heavily dependent upon other sources of energy. However, the inherently decentralized nature of solar energy makes it ideal as a complement to your government's stress on developing self-reliant villages and communities.

The silent void of space may seem remote from these challenges. But the intricate electronics of a space satellite can be as useful to earthbound farmers as a new plow.

The Indian and American Governments will tomorrow exchange diplomatic notes confirming that the United States will program its Landsat Earth resources satellite to transmit data directly to a ground receiving station that India will own and operate.

This satellite service will provide India with comprehensive topographic and minerals information and timely data on the ever-changing condition of weather, agricultural, water, and other natural resources. Under the terms of the agreement, India will make available to neighboring countries any information that affects them.

Also, India has already reserved space on board the American space shuttle in 1981 to initiate a domestic communications satellite system, using a satellite designed to Indian specifications.

We are very pleased that our space technology, together with India's superb space communications capability, will serve the cause of practical progress in your country.

Our scholarly exchanges have already enriched the lives of Americans who participated in them. And I hope the same has been true of Indian participants. In matters of culture and the arts, we know how much we have to gain. Not only India but also the rest of Asia and Africa and the Middle East have much to offer us. I hope to expand the opportunities for our own citizens to appreciate and to enjoy the strong and varied culture in the nations of your part of the world.

In global politics, history has cast our countries in different roles. The United States is one of the so-called super powers; India is the largest of the nonaligned countries. But each of us respects the other's conception of its international responsibilities, and the values that we do share provide a basis for cooperation in attacking the great global problems of economic justice, human rights, and the prevention of war.

This pursuit of justice and peace and the building of a new economic order must be undertaken in ways that promote constructive development rather than fruitless confrontation. Every country will suffer if the North-South dialog is permitted to founder.

Because India is both a developing country and also an industrial power, you are in a unique position to promote constructive international discussion about trade, energy, investment, balance of payments, technology, and other questions. I welcome your playing this worldwide leadership role.

I know that there will be times when we will disagree on specific issues and even on general approaches to larger problems. But I hope and believe that our shared interests and our common devotion to democratic values will help us to move toward agreement on important global and bilateral issues.

But neither of us seeks to align with the other except in the pursuit of peace and justice. We can even help each other to alleviate differences which might exist between ourselves and other nations.

Our two countries are part of a democratic world that includes nations in all stages of development, from Sweden and Japan to Sri Lanka and Costa Rica.

We share many common problems. But we also share an obligation to advance human rights—not by interfering in the affairs of other nations, not by trying to deny other nations the right to choose their own political and social system, but by speaking the truth as we see it and by providing an admirable example of what democracy can mean and what it can accomplish.

The danger of war threatens everyone, and the United States is trying to help reduce that danger—in the SALT negotiations with the Soviet Union, in talks aimed at a comprehensive ban of the testing of all nuclear explosives anywhere on Earth, and in our own policy of restraint on conventional arms transfers. We are also working hard to restrict the proliferation of nuclear explosives.

We are seeking to help the process of peace in Africa and the Middle East. And we are taking steps to forestall, along with the Soviets, great power rivalry and the escalation of military presence in your own Indian Ocean.

India is pledged to peaceful cooperation with your neighbors, and India is an important part of almost any United Nations peacekeeping force. India is a present and frequent member of the Security Council and has been in the forefront of campaigns against colonialism and against apartheid.

The motto of my country is “In God We Trust;” India’s is Satyameva Jayte—“Truth Alone Prevails.” I believe that such is the commonality of our fundamental values that your motto could be ours, and perhaps our motto could also be yours.

Our nations share the goals of peace in the world and human development in our own societies. And we share, as well, the conviction that the means that we employ to reach these goals must be as much in keeping with the principles of freedom and human dignity and social justice as are the goals themselves.

This affinity of belief is as strong a tie as there can be between any two nations on Earth. The values that Americans and Indians share have deeply affected my own life. I come to you as a national leader, yes, in the hope that my visit will mark a new and a higher stage in the steadily improving relations between our two countries.

But in a more personal sense—a sense that is very close to my own heart—I come also as a pilgrim.

This morning I had the honor of laying a wreath on the memorial to Mahatma Gandhi. In that sacred place, so simple and so serene, I recalled anew the ways in which Gandhi’s teachings have touched the lives of so many millions of people in my own country.

When I was growing up on a farm in the State of Georgia, in the heart of the Southern United States, an invisible wall of racial segregation stood between me and my black classmates, schoolmates, playmates, when we were old enough to know what segregation was. But it seemed then as if that wall between us would exist forever.

But it did not stand forever. It crumbled and fell. And though the rubble has not yet been completely removed, it no longer separates us from one another, blighting the lives of those on both sides of it.

Among the many who marched and suffered and bore witness against the evil of racial prejudice, the greatest was Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. He was a son of Georgia and a spiritual son of Mahatma Gandhi.

The most important influence in the life and work of Dr. King, apart from his own religious faith, was the life and work of Gandhi. Martin Luther King took Gandhi’s concepts of nonviolence and truth-force and put them to work in the American South.

Like Gandhi, King believed that truth and love are the strongest forces in the universe. Like Gandhi, he knew that ordinary people, armed only with courage and faith, could overcome injustice by appealing to the spark of good in the heart, even, of the evil-doer.

Like Gandhi, we all learned that a system of oppression damages those at the top as surely as it does those at the bottom. And for Martin Luther King, like Mahatma Gandhi, nonviolence was not only a political method, it was a way of life and a spiritual path to union with the ultimate.

These men set a standard of courage and idealism that few of us can meet, but from which all of us can draw inspiration and sustenance.

The nonviolent movement for racial justice in the United States, a movement inspired in large measure by the teachings and examples of Gandhi and other Indian leaders—some of whom are here today—changed and enriched my own life and the lives of many millions of my countrymen.

I am sure you will forgive me for speaking about this at some length. I do so because I want you all to understand that when I speak of friendship between the United States and India, I speak from the heart as well as the head. I speak from a deep, firsthand knowledge of what the relationship between our two countries has meant in the past and how much more, even, it can mean for all of us in the future.

For the remainder of this century and into the next, the democratic countries of the world will increasingly turn to each other for answers to our most pressing common challenge: how our political and spiritual values can provide the basis for dealing with the social and economic strains to which they will unquestionably be subjected.

The experience of democracy is like the experience of life itself—always changing, infinite in its variety, sometimes turbulent, and all the more valuable for having been tested by adversity.

We share that experience with you, and we draw strength from it. Whatever the differences between my country and yours, we are moving along the path of democracy toward a common goal of human development. I speak for all Americans when I say that I am deeply grateful that you and I travel that road together. Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:33 p.m. at Parliament House. In his opening remarks, he referred to B. D. Jatti, Vice President of India, Prime Minister Desai, who had introduced him, and K. S. Hegde, Speaker of the House of the People.

New Delhi, India

Toasts of the President and President N. S. Reddy at a State Dinner. January 2, 1978

PRESIDENT REDDY. We are happy to have you with us this evening. My people associate America as a land of liberty, and they look upon you, Mr. President, as a leader who has sought to restore the relevance of moral and spiritual values.

The year just ended will long be remembered in the annals of our two nations. The people of the United States of America elected you to the White House to heal the wounds of a decade of conflicts and divisions. In India, our general elections gave proof that in a democracy the will of the people is the ultimate arbiter of power. Your visit provides the opportunity to establish closer personal contacts between the newly elected and like-minded leaders of our two countries and to strengthen the deep affinities between us. I welcome you on behalf of my people and my government.

Notwithstanding the ideals which we share, we have varied emphasis in our priorities and in our international preoccupations. Paradoxically, the very adherence to similar political systems has at times exaggerated our misunderstandings and blurred our affinities.

The world situation as it appears has materially changed. Many new countries have attained independent nationhood. Détente, coexistence, and even cooperation between countries with different political and social systems have come to be recognized as having an inexorable logic for our interdependent planet. Ideologies are in the process of being domesticated, and pluralism amongst nations is seen as a factor of stability, rather than a threat to international peace. The prospect of nuclear war has given a new meaning to the search for peace on Earth. Nonalignment is much less misunderstood. If there is a bipolarity today, it is between forces seeking stability and cooperation and those which seek to obstruct orderly and progressive solutions to world problems.

The growing chasm between the developing and developed world may in the future lead to increasing, dangerous tensions. The world of the rich and the poor face a common doom if we cannot act together to protect the earth, the air, and water from plunder and pollution.

What we have admired in the short period of your Presidency is your sensitivity not just to the problems of your own country but to the dark shadows on peace and international stability. You have made the international community aware of the rights of individuals, be they at home or in other distant lands, and the responsibilities we have to uphold of the common man's inherent demand for liberty, equality, and justice.

Mr. President, the world today commands the resources, the technology, and also, I believe, the wisdom to fashion a stabler and just international order. The time has come for the United States and India, along with like-minded countries, to work together so that overriding, narrow national interests may be persuaded to see the wisdom of making necessary adjustments and sacrifices to help establish a new international economic order. The dangerous imbalances which exist must be corrected, the specter of poverty removed, and the creeping despondency in cooperative solutions banished.

Mr. President, we recognize that the role we in India can play in the resolution of international problems can only come from dynamic economic growth and the establishment of an equitable society in our own land. Our people have demonstrated the capacity to learn and to innovate, but to fulfill their modest expectations is, in itself, a gigantic task. Our achievements, however, give us courage and confidence.

We have laid the foundations for our progress on a wide front covering principally agriculture, industry, and more important, the indigenization of scientific and technological know-how. Our economy has been relieved of the endemic anxieties arising from the paucity of food production and difficulties in balance of payments. We are in the process of reviewing our priorities so that a greater share of the benefits of planned socio-economic development reach the economically weaker sections of society. We have recognized the dangers from uncontrolled urbanization and are determined to make our villages economically resilient.

Social and economic transformation through democratic methods may at times appear slow. Certainly in a democratic setup, failure attracts more attention, both at home and abroad, than progress actually made towards social and economic goals. We seek neither to minimize our tasks nor conceal our failures. We are fully convinced that, in the end, a democracy gathers vigor from open dissent, and a consensus makes for firmer foundations. What we ask of the international community, and that too as a supplement to our own national efforts, is constructive cooperation or at least a benign understanding of our endeavors.

On the wider canvas, my government remains faithful to the fundamental principles of our foreign policy. The remnants of colonialism and racialism, where they still exist, must go. Racialism, which certainly persists in Africa in defiance of international opinion, must give way to governments representative of the majority.

We believe this is no time for increasing but, rather, arresting and eliminating great power deployment in the hitherto tension-free areas such as the Indian Ocean.

We welcome the negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on the limitations of strategic weapons and efforts to consolidate détente.

Faithful to the spirit of the United Nations Charter, India will always be on the side of the peaceful resolution of international disputes. We are determined to be true to the friendships which have served our national interests. We are equally convinced that in keeping with contemporary realities, we can widen and intensify our relations, to mutual advantage, with many countries.

In the final instance, peace will remain fragile if nuclear weapons, capable of such annihilative destruction, are kept and multiplied. We appreciate the concern and sincerity which you have expressed at these dangers and the efforts you are making to arrest the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

For our part, we have unilaterally abjured the development of such means of mass destruction. But, Mr. President, we hope that you will agree with the dangers of nuclear war, by accident or design, will remain, until such time as all nations, without arbitrary distinctions, join in a firm commitment for the progressive reduction and eventual elimination of nuclear weapons from all parts of the world. The challenge demands not just restraints from nuclear weapons but pledges by the nuclear "haves" to turn away from the use of this instrument of modern science for military purposes. But, in the meanwhile, must countries who have no nuclear weapons be inhibited from using nuclear science as an instrument for economic transformation? I would like to emphasize with a full sense of responsibility that India, for her part, will not indulge in the perverse use of nuclear science.

Mr. President, our bilateral cooperation has been rich in range and content. My government acknowledges the debt of gratitude we owe to the United States, which has provided us generous aid when we were in need. Your assistance has been an important factor in our development and in the progress towards the diversification of our economy.

Of all the many-sided links between us, I would particularly like to recall that students and technologists trained in American institutions have, on return, grafted their acquired knowledge and skills to our national development.

Multifaceted and beneficial as has been our bilateral relationship, the range and sophistication has a wide scope for further development. It is for these reasons that we believe that the Indo-U.S. Joint Commission and its three subcommissions merit fuller encouragement and support.

The real cement of our relations goes beyond politics, economics, and technology. It is in the values and emotional involvement of our people. Both for Americans and India, man's communion with God, tolerance and compassion towards his fellow beings are respected as the highest virtues.

The present revulsion from the tensions of modern life and its unending search for material comforts has, we notice, led to a new burst of interest in our spiritual and philosophic heritage.

On another plane, many volunteers—like your esteemed mother—have built bonds of kinship between individuals and families across the oceans. This deep commitment to things of the mind and spirit, the sustained exchanges in the field of art, education, and culture, along with personal relationships, make for strong but invisible bonds which are only possible between open societies.

Mr. President, the rich texture of our relationship should make it immune to misunderstanding and distrust in the future. The quality of our friendship is such that no nation which cherishes international peace and cooperation need fear its potential and suspect it of malevolence.

With shared faith and complementary objectives, Mr. President, the word could go forth from this ancient capital that the friendship between our two large democracies, one rich and powerful and the other underdeveloped but resurgent, is to serve the hopes and aspirations of all mankind and that our objectives are not only relevant now but will remain valid through time.

Our vision must be of a world which would safeguard nations in their diversity and where man may achieve social justice, dignity, and fulfillment.

It is with a sense of historic significance on this occasion that I ask you, ladies and gentlemen, to raise your glasses to the health of the President of the United States of America and Mrs. Carter, to the high ideas and enlightened interests which bind India and the United States.

To your health.

PRESIDENT CARTER. President Reddy and Prime Minister Desai, great leaders of the government of India, beautiful women and friends who have made our visit here so enjoyable and productive:

This afternoon in your Parliament I spelled out in quite a lengthy speech the details about relationships which we have as a mutual interest. So, this evening in my brief remarks I would like to comment in a more personal way.

Today was fulfilled in my life a long ambition to visit the memorial to Mahatma Gandhi. As I stood there I thought about India and about my own country and about the personal feelings that all of us share as we come to an ancient land which in recent years, with the birth of your hopes and dreams for freedom, has been an inspiration to us all.

This morning your Prime Minister gave me a book that he had written analyzing the Bhagavad-Gita. One passage from that great book stood out in my mind. I can't quote it exactly, Mr. Prime Minister, and I can't interpret it well, but it said when a country is flooded, the reservoirs become superfluous. Sri Krishna went on to explain what he meant in this message, that when one's heart is filled completely with an awareness of our love for God, the other considerations in life are incidental. And one need not worry about the outcome of an action, but should worry on a momentary basis about the purposes and the attitudes and one's relation to the eternal.

There is no way to describe in overall terms my feeling about India. So I will have to describe my thoughts in specifics.

My first impression on leaving Air Force One, my plane, was the extreme friendship exhibited to me by the leaders who are assembled at this table. It was a remarkable expression of deference and respect on your part for the country I represent. When all your ministers, many of the members of your Parliament, and the diplomatic corps came to meet us, and the beautiful words that you expressed, Mr. President, to me then, will always be cherished in my heart.

On the drive into the city from the airport, the overwhelming welcome that I received from the hundreds of thousands of Indian citizens assembled on the side of the road was indeed a remarkable experience for me. There was a genuine expression of happiness and good will and friendship on their faces, and their raised hands and smiles made me feel, indeed, that I was welcome.

I also had a sense of belonging. I didn't feel that I was in an alien land. I think the reason for this is that my family has grown to respect and to love India in the last 10 years. When my mother was 68 years old, she became a member of the Peace Corps and requested that she be sent to India. She is a registered nurse, and she worked in a small clinic in a village of Vikhroli, just north of Bombay. One of the reasons that she requested India—perhaps the most important reason—was her awareness of what your nation represents as expressed by the commitment and the courage and the humility of Mahatma Gandhi.

So, our family, although this is my first visit, has felt a part of your life. When your former great President Ahmed died, I had just become President of our country. And my mother and my son, who has the same name as I, came to represent the United States during that sorrowful time. So I felt a sense of belonging this afternoon.

In the presence of the members of your Parliament, the welcome that I received there, the attention that was given to my words, a sense of political ties was very strong. Again, I felt that I was in a place which shared commitments and not in a strange place where the form of government was unknown to me; a sense of democracy, a sense that everyone in that assembly hall indeed represented the people of India was something very similar to a person who has served in the government in our own country as well.

I had a thought this morning, too, about the beauty of India, as I stood at the memorial to Gandhi. This is a lovely time of year. And the flowers are bursting forth. I walked for an hour or so this afternoon in the Mortal Garden outside this palace and was impressed by the quietness and a sense of peace, and even in your busy streets and alongside the highways there is a sense of inward beauty among the people, a sense of inward peace in their hearts, and also outward beauty in your buildings, in your trees, and in your flowers.

I also felt a common purpose with you in the principles which we all represent: freedom of speech, a free press, a right to criticize, a right to disagree, open debate, issues thoroughly discussed, changes welcomed, even in a nation which is ancient in its customs and in its traditions.

We share a common measurement of greatness, not power or pomp or ceremony or uniforms or outward show of greatness, but we recognize that greatness is present when the least of those in our nations are treated well and cared for, when their afflictions are eased, and when they have food and education and a healthy life.

I also, Mr. President, shared your words a few moments ago in a hunger for peace, not only in individuals but as a nation and as leaders in the world.

India sets a moral standard for many of us to emulate. And the judgment that is spoken by the leaders of your country makes a great impact on those of us who sometimes have been criticized. We think twice before we incur the disapproval of India and your leaders, because we realize that your standards of morality and justice are very deeply felt.

You have an ability to bridge the gap between those who have a developed society, and you understand in personal terms the hungers and the needs and the yearnings and the unmet aspirations of those who live in nations which are still developing.

The last thing I would like to say is that there has been somewhat of a circle of influence between our country and yours. I'm very proud of my Nation, although most of my words have been in praise of your own. I have read some of the works of Mahatma Gandhi, and I know that he was greatly impressed by our poet Ralph Waldo Emerson and by a man who loved God's world, Henry David Thoreau. I brought your Prime Minister a gift of the collected works of Thoreau because of Gandhi's respect for him.

And when Gandhi learned even more and gave his life in the cause for which he stood, many of our own people learned from him and were inspired by him.

This afternoon, I just mentioned one of our leaders, Martin Luther King, Jr., who studied the works of Gandhi and adopted nonviolence and the force of truth as the essence of his own beliefs. And although he never carried a weapon and never struck another human being, but turned his face when he was beaten and suffered many times in jails, he remembered the teachings of Gandhi.

So, from our country to you, and from you back to our country, there is a circle of learning, a circle of mutual trust, a circle of friendship, a circle of respect, and also a circle of shared responsibilities and shared commitments.

The quality of our life is not yet what we would hope. We have many things to learn. We have many grievances to redress. We have many degrees of freedom still left to enhance. We are far short of our dream of peace. But in a democratic society like our own, when the yearnings of every person can make an impact upon the decisions of the leaders, there is always a sure sense that progress will be ever upward.

I would like to propose a toast on behalf of my own Nation and the American citizens who are here tonight, Mr. President: To President Reddy, to Mrs. Reddy, to the distinguished leaders of India, to the great people of India, and to peace throughout the world.

NOTE: The exchange began at 8:55 p.m. in Ashoka Hall at the Rashtrapati Bhavan.

Remarks on Signing the Delhi Declaration. January 3, 1978

Prime Minister Desai has read a joint declaration which he and I drafted together. At the heart of the friendship between India and the United States is our determination that the moral values of our people must also guide the actions of the states, the governments.

Both our nations were the conscious creation of men and women who believed that spiritual principles could find political expression. Gandhi and Nehru, Washington and Jefferson, the thousands—and actually millions—who worked with them, those whom they led, were all determined to present a shining new example to the world.

The United States gave the world an illustration of a new form of government, with a new relation between the citizen and the state—a relation in which the state exists to serve the citizen, and not the citizen to serve the state.

India experimented with creating political unity from overwhelming human diversity, enabling people of different cultures and languages and religions to work together, both in independence and also in freedom. Yours is an experiment whose success the world is celebrating anew.

The declaration that we have just signed, or will sign, commits to paper what has long been written in our hearts. It proclaims our belief that each individual has inalienable rights, our commitment to justice among nations and within societies, and our determination that disputes must be resolved without violence, especially in this age when nuclear weapons threaten the total destruction of humankind. Above all else, we affirm that states, like individuals, bear moral responsibilities for their acts.

Yesterday, before your Parliament, I said that whatever the differences between our nations, we are moving along the path toward a common goal of human development and human rights.

As I prepare to leave India, reluctantly, today, I'm thankful to know that with this declaration we have taken another step toward that path of friendship and mutual commitment.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:43 a.m. in Ashoka Hall at the Rashtrapati Bhavan.

Earlier in the morning, President and Mrs. Carter visited the farming village of Daulatabad Nasirabad, which was officially renamed Carterpuri (Carter Place) in honor of their visit.

January 3, 1978*

India and the United States of America, despite differences of history and culture, are one in the recognition that the ultimate sanction of power and of public policy rests in the respect for the dignity and well-being of the individual. Regardless of race, sex, religion or social status, every human being is entitled to life and liberty, to freedom from want and, without threat or coercion, to freedom of expression and worship.

We share an unwavering faith in the democratic form of government, which guarantees to all citizens fundamental freedoms under law and the right to choose their representatives and determine their own future.

At the same time, we believe that a cooperative and stable world order depends on the right of each people to determine its own form of government and each nation its own political, social and economic policies.

We are gratified that the process of decolonization has democratized the international state-system, giving most nations for the first time an opportunity to participate in making decisions relating to international peace and cooperation.

The disparities in economic strength that exist among nations must be bridged and a more equitable international economic order fashioned if we are to secure international peace.

We recognize that broad economic development is essential for a modern state, but also that such progress is hollow if its benefits do not reach all the people.

The present-day world commands scientific and technological skills to enrich the quality of life and give greater social justice within and among nations. We call on an inter-dependent community of nations to work together to protect and nurture the common heritage of our planet's resources and environment.

We declare that war is not an acceptable means to settle political disputes. Our countries will do their utmost to resolve disputes with others amicably and, within the framework of the United Nations, to help in resolving the disputes of others.

The spectre of war has hung over the world for too long. Existing stockpiles of nuclear weapons must be reduced and eventually eliminated, and the danger of proliferation of nuclear weapons must be arrested. Further, every effort must be made progressively to reduce conventional arms and to redirect the productive forces so released to the betterment of mankind. We commit ourselves to work towards these ends.

Beyond the realms of politics and economics, the world today affords opportunities for freer and fuller intellectual and scientific exchanges. Freedom of ideas and the promotion of cultural and artistic interplay, in a world where the mind is without fear, can create an environment where tolerance and understanding can flourish.

Beyond the traditional ideas of statecraft, Indians and Americans recognize an obligation to themselves and to others that ends can never justify evil means. Nations, like individuals, are morally responsible for their actions.

Riyadh, Saudi Arabia

Remarks of the President and King Khalid bin Abd al-Aziz Al-Sa'ud at the Welcoming Ceremony. January 3, 1978

THE KING. Mr. President, I welcome Your Excellency in our country as a great friend, and I thank you for your efforts to find a just and lasting solution for the problem of the Middle East. I wish Your Excellency a pleasant stay in this friendly country and success in your trip and commendable endeavors.

Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Alsalamu elkum. Peace be unto you. The primary purpose of my trip and this visit is peace.

The first meeting between the leaders of Saudi Arabia and the United States of America was when President Franklin Roosevelt came to the Gulf of Suez to meet with King Abd al-Aziz. This friendship has now grown to encompass the millions of people in our two nations. We work together now, and we plan together for the future. The ties which bind us together are strong and unbreakable.

Although our time here is all too brief, I have already learned much from Crown Prince Fahd, Prince Saud, and other leaders from Saudi Arabia who have recently visited me in my own country. Now I am glad to meet with Your Majesty for close consultation on matters of great mutual interest to our people.

As Your Majesty has already said, a most important subject which will be discussed is the early achievement of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

I recall the traditional Arabic welcome, Ahlan wa sahlan. It is beautiful and simple. And my understanding is that it means, "You are among your own people, and your steps will be unhindered." Seeing the generosity of this welcome, I feel that I am among my own people and know that my steps will not be hindered, because I walk the same path as Your Majesty, King Khalid, toward a common goal of even greater friendship among our people, between our two countries, and of peace for all the people of the world.

Your Majesty, we are glad to be in your great country.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The exchange began at 4:17 p.m. at Riyadh Airport. King Khalid spoke in Arabic, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter.

Following the arrival ceremony, the President met with King Khalid at the Royal Guest Palace.

Later that evening, the President attended a working dinner at the King's Palace. Following the dinner, he met with Crown Prince Fahd bin Abd al-Aziz Al Sa'ud, the First Deputy Prime Minister, at the Royal Guest Palace.

Aswan, Egypt

Remarks of the President and President Anwar al-Sadat Following Their Meeting. January 4, 1978

PRESIDENT SADAT. Ladies and gentlemen, morning.

I want to tell you that it is a very happy occasion for me and for my people, also, to receive our dear friend, President Carter, here on the Egyptian land. We would have liked that this visit would have lasted a bit longer, but we know his commitments.

We had a very intensive and fruitful talk upon the whole arena—in particular, the conflict here in the Middle East and the whole international position and our bilateral relations. I am very happy to say that our views were identical, and we have agreed upon certain steps to keep the momentum of the peace process.

All I ask is let us have in a very short time the opportunity to welcome President Carter and to show him the gratitude of my people and myself.

In the same time, may I say that in the peace process we welcome all the parties concerned. And they are welcome whenever they find it convenient to them, because this time, as I have already repeated before, we are heading towards peace and real peace in the area, permanent peace.

Thank you.

PRESIDENT CARTER. President Sadat, people of Egypt:

It is an honor and a pleasure for us to be in this great country, led by such a strong and courageous man.

Mr. President, your bold initiative in seeking peace has aroused the admiration of the entire world. One of my most valued possessions is the warm, personal relationship which binds me and President Sadat together and which exemplifies the friendship and the common purpose of the people of Egypt and the people of the United States of America.

The Egyptian-Israeli peace initiative must succeed, while still guarding the sacred and historic principles held by the nations who have suffered so much in this region. There is no good reason why accommodation cannot be reached.

In my own private discussions with both Arab and Israeli leaders, I have been deeply impressed by the unanimous desire for peace. My presence here today is a direct result of the courageous initiative which President Sadat undertook in his recent trip to Jerusalem.

The negotiating process will continue in the near future. We fully support this effort, and we intend to play an active role in the work of the political committee of Cairo, which will soon reconvene in Jerusalem.

We believe that there are certain principles, fundamentally, which must be observed before a just and a comprehensive peace can be achieved. First, true peace must be based on normal relations among the parties to the peace. Peace means more than just an end to belligerency. Second, there must be withdrawal by Israel from territories occupied in 1967 and agreement on secure and recognized borders for all parties in the context of normal and peaceful relations in accordance with United Nations Resolutions 242 and 338. And third, there must be a resolution of the Palestinian problem in all its aspects. The problem must recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and enable the Palestinians to participate in the determination of their own future.

Some flexibility is always needed to ensure successful negotiations and the resolution of conflicting views. We know that the mark of greatness among leaders is to consider carefully the views of others and the greater benefits that can result among the people of all nations which can come from a successful search for peace.

Mr. President, our consultations this morning have reconfirmed our common commitment to the fundamentals which will, with God's help, make 1978 the year for permanent peace in the Middle East.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The exchange began at 10:15 a.m. at Aswan Airport.

Following their remarks, the President boarded Air Force One for the flight to Paris. During the flight, he telephoned Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin to discuss the talks held with President Sadat and other leaders concerning the Middle East.

Paris, France

THE PRESIDENT. Mr. President, distinguished members of the French Government, people of France:

I am delighted to be here in Paris, the Queen of Cities, and to make my second visit to France, whose intellectual and cultural parentage of the United States has been exceeded only by the nation whose language I now speak.

I have had the privilege of meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing in London and of welcoming Prime Minister Barre to the White House this past year. Their advice and knowledge, especially on international, political, and economic matters of concern to both our nations, has been very helpful.

As your President said, the relationship between our people is special and rare because it has largely been an alliance of ideals. Two hundred years ago, leaders in both our nations helped each other to a definition of a revolutionary principle—that citizens possess certain natural rights which stood higher than the claims of power of any state.

In their time, the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Declaration of Independence turned the world upside down, and they are still the bedrock of our own democratic systems of government and of the demands for human rights, which is being heard with increasing intensity throughout the world.

But our alliance has embodied more than ideals. Americans will forever remember the crucial assistance which Lafayette and the French nation gave us during those painful and dangerous days of our own national birth. It was with the same spirit of common purpose that Americans came to the Normandy beaches and to the Marne to join France in preserving your liberty and, thereby, our own.

Now we are again allied in a search for answers to difficult questions that concern us both. President Giscard d'Estaing and I will discuss ensuring the stability and growth of the international economy and working for economic justice within our own societies and among the nations of the world, maintaining the defense of our Western nations, while constantly searching for peace in troubled areas such as the Middle East, for constantly improved relations with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and for reductions in the level of all kinds of armaments everywhere in the world, addressing other issues which no nation can afford to ignore, especially the world's energy problems, and continuing the struggle for basic human rights, which our two nations proclaimed 200 years ago.

The statue in the harbor of New York that symbolizes our own liberty, like many of the ideas which first inspired our own demands for freedom, came as a gift from the people of France.

Our approaches to specific questions may not always be the same, but our deep respect for the independence and leadership of France and our affection for your people have remained strong for more than 200 years. I hope and believe that in the future the ties between France and the United States of America will grow even stronger.

Mr. President, we are delighted to be here in your great country with your great people.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:20 p.m. at Orly International Airport in response to welcoming remarks by President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing.

Following the ceremony, the President and President Giscard d'Estaing motorcaded to the Arc de Triomphe, where they participated in a wreathlaying ceremony at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. They then proceeded to Elysee Palace for meetings.

Paris, France

Mr. Foreign Minister, presidents of the organizations who daily work to ensure friendship between our two countries, ladies and gentlemen of France and the United States who have come this evening:

This afternoon I laid a wreath, along with the President of France, on the grave of the soldier who commemorated the bravery of the French people. And standing on my left was a group of men in the same regiment who fought with George Washington at Yorktown 200 years ago.

When our democracy was born, France was there. And for more than 200 years, our two nations have shared the same ideals and the same culture.

There is one belief above all others that has made us what we are. This is the belief that the rights of the individual inherently stand higher than the claims or demands of the state. This is the message that the American and French peoples, each in turn, carried forward to the world two centuries ago, and these are the values which the world still depends upon us to affirm.

Democracy was then a new and an untried concept. Now it is a standard for our Western civilization. The American Declaration of Independence inspired so greatly by French philosophy, spoke of the unalienable rights of persons, of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness. These rights were controversial then, and now they are the measure by which the faithfulness of governments is tested. Democracy is indeed a compelling idea, an idea so attractive that even its enemies now attempt to cloak repression with false democratic labels.

But our democratic order has come under challenge. There are those who question whether democratic values are appropriate for contemporary circumstances. Voices in the developing world ask whether notions of free speech, personal liberty, freely chosen governments should not be pushed aside in the struggle to overcome poverty. Voices in the industrialized world ask whether democracy equips us for the frenzied pace of change in our own modern lives.

We've heard warnings that a democratic society cannot impose on itself the restraint and self-discipline which is necessary to cope with persistent economic problems. We've heard that the disparate elements of our societies cannot cohere in a democratic system. Governments everywhere have begun to seem remote and impersonal, incompetent. Many people question whether any government can hear their distant and solitary voices.

These problems are real, and we must admit their existence. But we must also bear the burden that democratic society imposes on those like us who are part of it. That is to proclaim our unshaken faith in the values of our democratic nations and our belief that those values are still relevant—to the rich and the poor, the North and South, East and West, as constant now as they were when our forebears signed the Declaration of Independence and your forebears proclaimed the Declaration of the Rights of Man.

We defend these values because they are right, because there is no higher purpose for the state than to preserve these rights for its citizens. But we defend them also in the faith that there is no contradiction between preserving our democratic values on the one hand and meeting challenges which face our modern societies.

It's precisely when democracy is up against difficult challenges that its leaders must show firmness in resisting the temptation of finding solutions in nondemocratic forces.

This week, in India, I discussed our belief that only through respect for individual liberties can developing nations achieve their full economic and political potential. That is our faith. And India, the world's largest democracy—they are proving that it is still true.

Here in France we meet as industrialized powers to affirm that our confidence in a democratic future for these developed societies is equally strong.

Democracy is not merely right and just. It's also the system that is the most consistent with human nature. It's the most effective way to organize society for the common good.

Where the state dominates everything, only the narrow talents of the bureaucrat are free to flower. But the pluralistic society that exists within a democracy allows for a broad range to succeed—in government, in the arts, in labor, in technology, in the sciences, and in the marketplace as well.

Democracy unleashes the innate creative energy of each of us. We need look no further back than the last three decades to see unparalleled success. These years have been extraordinary in the time for France, for Western Europe, the United States, and other democratic nations.

France and its partners in Western Europe rose from the destruction and the turmoil of World War II to build economies and societies more thriving and productive than ever before and to regain positions of world leadership very rapidly.

Never have so many new jobs and so much new wealth been created or so much change in people's lives been managed so effectively and yet with so much freedom.

All of this is no accident. Nations with other political systems, in spite of their great human and natural resources, have not done as well.

And democracy protects us also against the excesses of modernization. It helps us constantly to reduce the rising complexity of modern life to human terms. At a time when the computer makes total state control more possible than ever—processing people like numbers—democracy stands guard, protecting the uniqueness of the individual.

This is why the great trend of emigration is from those states which deny basic rights to their people and toward the free nations of the West. That's why India, under the greatest trial and tension, has reaffirmed its commitment to rule by the people, and that's why Portugal and Spain and Greece have rejoined the ranks of Europe's democratic nations.

We do not fear the challenges which test our chosen form of government.

But today we need a new agenda for democracy.

The first task on this agenda is to devise ways in which government and social institutions can better and more quickly respond to the higher standards of leadership and service which are now being demanded by our people.

It's a time of testing. Already the varied experiments are underway, according to the unique traditions and needs of each individual country. In Western Europe successful sharing of the fruits of economic growth at all levels has provided a way to help in society overcoming mounting social problems.

In France you are making a young constitution work in balancing authority between the executive and the legislature.

In some countries, like Germany and Scandinavia, there are continuing experiments in new forms of interrelationship between labor and management.

The member nations of the European Community are planning to hold direct elections among the nations for the European Parliament.

In my own Nation, we are trying to reduce government regulation in areas better left to private enterprise or to the individuals.

And in several nations, including some of our own, there is emphasis on strengthening the role of local government, on decentralizing power, and on working through voluntary associations to meet particular problems and needs.

In these and other ways we can make government more responsive, accountable, and also closer to the people, fostering a renewed sense of confidence in our national and in our local communities.

We can also find new answers to the old problems of combining freedom with responsibility. As President Giscard d'Estaing wrote in his book, "Towards a New Democracy," "The pluralism of power guarantees freedom. . . . Democratic progress does not result in disorder, but in a better balance of order within freedom and responsibility."

The second item on the new agenda for democracy is the economic challenge. We must not only restore growth, control inflation, and reduce unemployment; we must also demonstrate that our democratic economic system can adapt to the demands that are constantly changing and placed upon it. This means proving again that we have the self-discipline to pursue our future, no less than our current interests, so that contending domestic groups will not produce chaos and discord, but a new harmony of effort for the common good.

It means increasing our efforts to ensure that the fruits of economic growth reach all parts of society, so that each individual will share in the benefits of economic progress. And it means using our resources to promote human development—not just growth for its own sake.

Our democratic economies now have unprecedented strength to meet this challenge. We have skilled work forces. We have productive plants and equipment, effective management, and the will and the means to cooperate closely with one another—both within nations and also among nations.

And in the free market we have a means of matching production to human needs that is swifter and more subtle than any computer, more sensitive to society's requirements than any state committee.

My country is able and willing to join with its partners in building on that strength, to put the global economy on the path to growth and to rising prosperity.

America's efforts will be directed toward maintaining the strength of the dollar, continuing steady progress against unemployment and inflation, and stimulating private investment.

This year we will cut taxes substantially for both business and consumers, and we'll take these steps primarily because they are in our own interests, but also because we recognize the importance of continued noninflationary recovery in the United States to the economies of the rest of the world.

We are working with our economic partners also in the Geneva trade negotiations to reach rapid agreement that will improve the open trading system, expand commerce, and create new jobs.

And following the French example, we are hard at work on a comprehensive energy program which will lessen our imports of foreign oil, reduce undue dependence, and cut the deficit in our balance of trade.

France and America and the other industrial democracies are emerging from the economic recession of recent years. Some of us can turn our attention at once to noninflationary growth, like the United States. Others must first take painful measures simply to reduce inflation. As more nations are able to pursue higher growth, our economies will create more jobs, and unemployment will go down.

Confidence in steady growth will reduce pressures for trade restrictions, protectionism, make it easier for us to adapt to changes within our societies, help us to make more efficient use of energy, and make it easier for countries with payments surpluses to open their markets to developed and developing nations alike.

But there are also many other economic needs today. The economic institutions that served us well in the past need to be strengthened. We must reach a better understanding of basic economic forces so that we can solve the problems simultaneously of inflation and unemployment. We've not yet been able to do this.

We must devote much greater effort to further advances in high technology to help all our nations compete effectively in tomorrow's markets.

We must develop new and productive industries and services so that we can moderate the impact on our peoples of change imposed by increased global competition for jobs and markets that's sure to come. And we must solve the problem of youth unemployment. Unless we do, an entire generation could be estranged from our democratic societies.

We must take steps to avoid exporting our economic difficulties to other nations, whether rich or poor. And we must use the tools of shared freedom to increase the choices and opportunities of our economic system. We can share our experience in social development, in education, health care, social services, and the organization and management of farms and factories.

At the heart of all these efforts is continued cooperation along with our other economic partners in such ways as the economic summits, which were first proposed by France. This cooperation should recognize the individuality of each nation, while acknowledging that our economic well-being will rise or fall together.

The third task on the new agenda for democracy is to provide for our mutual security.

I come to France today recognizing that our two nations share a basic commitment to preserve our hard-won freedom. We are able, with our allies, to keep our freedom precisely because we are militarily strong.

Our central security system today and our central problem is maintaining our will to keep the military strength we need, while seeking at the same time every opportunity to build a better peace. Military power without détente may lead to conflict, but détente would be impossible without the NATO alliance and popular support for a strong defense.

Both France and America prove that the peoples of a democracy can and will support these joint goals of constant strength and also a commitment to peace. The commitment of the American Government and the American people to the security of Europe is absolute. There should be no doubt that we will maintain in Europe whatever forces are needed to meet that commitment. We are also grateful that France maintains and improves its forces that are essential for defense.

But we also see the need to move beyond confrontation, to resolve the differences between East and West, and to progress toward arms control and disarmament.

We are determined to seek balanced and mutual limits on both qualitative and quantitative deployment of nuclear weapons, and then substantial reductions, leading to the eventual elimination of nuclear weapons as a potential destructive force among the nations of the world.

We are determined to seek early agreement on a comprehensive ban of the testing of all nuclear explosives, both military weapons and also the so-called peaceful nuclear devices. And we are determined to seek a substantial reduction of the international commerce in conventional weapons.

We'll work with other nations to achieve the advantages which such agreements can bring. While the approaches of France and the United States to these issues may sometimes differ, our desire to build a more stable peace is one and the same. And in all these efforts, we will consult and cooperate closely with you and with our other allies, recognizing the independence of each nation but also our mutual interests and our mutual commitments.

The fourth task on democracy's new agenda is the effort of Europeans to shape your future. For the goal that you've set for yourselves, with your partners in the European Community, is nothing less than to transform—in an unprecedented fashion in history—and to improve relations among states with ancient traditions, unique histories, and legitimate pride in national achievement.

The United States will give its unequalled support to what you and your partners in the Nine are doing to strengthen European cooperation, for we see European strength and unity as a boon and not as a threat to us. The real threat to the interests of us all would be economic weakness and disunity.

The fifth and the final item on the new agenda for democracy is to cooperate among ourselves in adapting to global change. The same factors which led to our economic successes over the past two generations—science, technology, education, health, will, and wisdom of our people—have also altered the interrelationship between the industrial democracies on the one hand and the developing world on the other.

European nations, individually or together, also have an increasing role to play beyond this continent, particularly in reordering relations between North and South.

It was less than 100 years ago that the European powers met and divided the continent of Africa among you, and yet today colonialism has nearly ended. Before World War II, 80 percent of the world's land mass and 75 percent of its people were under Western authority, but today there are more than 100 new nations, each with insistent needs and insistent demands. A few years ago, the West made virtually all the decisions about the global economy, but now important resources are also under the control of the developing countries—as the energy crisis has made very clear. The councils of economic action can no longer be limited just to a few.

During this trip, I've seen how the developing nations are creating a new role for themselves in the world's economic system, redistributing global power, posing new global problems, and assuming new rights and new responsibilities.

We've long understood that greater individual equality can bring forth greater prosperity in our domestic societies. But now we also see how greater equality among nations can promote the health of the global economy, including our own. No nation, nor any small group of nations, can any longer shape its destiny alone.

In proposing the North-South conference, President Giscard spoke of creating new forms of international cooperation. What he said then stands as a watchword of all our efforts together, and I quote him again: "(This) should not constitute a victory for some countries over others, achieved by taking advantage of temporary power relationships. Rather it must be a victory of mankind over itself. . . ."

If we move in that spirit and direct our efforts together to solving the problems that face the nations of the world, then we shall surely gain that victory of which he spoke. We will vindicate our deep and abiding faith in the strength of democracy to grow and to develop with the times.

Six days ago, I left the United States on a tour whose constant theme has been the universal vitality of democracy. In Poland, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, India, and now in France, I've emphasized that our modern struggle is not only to establish peace but also to protect the individual from abuse by the state.

Tomorrow, with President Giscard d'Estaing, I will leave Paris and visit the beaches at Normandy. If the names Omaha, Utah, Juno, Gold, and Sword will always live in the memories of both our peoples, it's because they remind us at what cost our liberties have been purchased and what a precious heritage has been left for us to attend and to defend. These names remind us that liberty is not secured with just one defense but must be struggled for again and again and again.

Our ancestors made their defense with principles and with revolution. People of my parents' generation, and of my own, bore arms in the name of freedom. Many of them were left at Normandy Beach and at the thousands of other shrines to liberty across the world.

Though we will always be prepared, we pray that their sacrifice in battle need never be repeated. And we know that war need not come again so long as we transmit our devotion to those values of free people, strengthened and renewed, to each succeeding generation that comes after us.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:32 p.m. to members of French-American business, civic, and cultural societies. In his opening remarks, he referred to Louis de Guiringaud, Foreign Minister of France.

Normandy, France

Remarks of the President and President Giscard d'Estaing on Visiting the Site of the D-Day Landings. January 5, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. President Giscard, friends of France and the United States of America join together in history in the present and in the future.

This morning I flew in a modern-day helicopter from our Armed Forces in Europe from Paris to these famous beaches, and on the trip I thought about the path which has brought us together today.

In June of 1940 General de Gaulle, the leader of the French Resistance forces, said, "The flame of the French Resistance must not and will not die." Four years later, on the 6th of June, 1944, the Allied forces came to the beaches known to us as Omaha, Utah, Juno, Gold, and Sword to begin a heroic action leading to the liberation of Europe.

On that day, an unprecedented armada landed on the shores of Normandy. One hundred and seventy-six thousand brave troops came here from England to launch a tremendous attack. Within 2 weeks, more than 1½ million troops had moved into France and the other coastal countries.

Before me, beyond the flags of my country and that of France, there are more than 9,000 white marble crosses erected in memory of those who died near here. They served under great commanders—General Eisenhower, General Montgomery, General Bradley, General Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., who, because of his heroism, was awarded the Medal of Honor and later joined the French 2d Armored Division under General Leclerc.

The 1st and the 29th American Divisions were the ones who landed near here on the Omaha Beach. This was where the most fierce resistance was encountered. And of the roughly 2,500 who came ashore, about 2,000 died.

At one point, American rangers had to scale a vertical hundred-foot cliff while the Germans above rolled down grenades upon them.

On Omaha Beach, hundreds of our troops lay dead, and the sight was so impressive that because of that the German commanders thought, until it was too late for them, that the victory had been won by Germany.

But from Juno, Gold, and Sword, Allied forces moved forward and were eventually victorious, and then swept across Europe, restoring freedom here.

Almost two centuries before that, the French had come to our shores to help give Americans freedom, led by Lafayette, Comte d'Estaing, and many other courageous men.

About 30 years before the Normandy invasion, in the First World War, when American soldiers arrived in Europe, their first words as they stepped ashore were, "Lafayette, we are here."

In Europe now, there are about 30,000 American soldiers and marines who are buried in Europe from the First World War. Sixty thousand others are buried in Europe from the Second World War. More than 150,000 bodies of American dead were returned to our own country to be buried there who lost their lives in the defense of freedom in Europe.

We are determined, with our noble allies here, that Europe's freedom will never again be endangered. We now have about 200,000 Americans, fighting men, in Europe to make sure that this threat is never before us again.

General Donaldson<sup>1</sup> told me that this is the first time that two Presidents have ever been together in a memorial to those who gave their lives in the past. But I believe that this is symbolic of the unshakable bonds which history has seen bind together American people and the heroic people of France.

We are proud for what we have done together. We are sure that our friendship will be everlasting. And it is indeed a great honor for me, as President of the United States, to come here to pay homage to the brave men and women of the past who have ensured our precious freedom today.

PRESIDENT GISCARD D'ESTAING. Mr. President, like all young Frenchmen of my age, on June 6 I heard the news of the landings over the radio. That news spread like wildfire across Paris—"They have landed." "They" were the Americans, the British, the Canadians, and the French, who, on five beaches, had come to give us back hope and freedom.

You can imagine our impatience and our pride. The fight was a harsh one. Here at Omaha, General Bradley's 1st American Army lost 3,000 men in the first few hours. It was only after 8 hours struggle that veterans of the 1st American Division managed to reach the top of the cliff.

Everyone knows Colonel Taylor's command—"The only people who are on the beach are those who are dead and those who are about to die—we must move."

All this France remembers. She expresses her gratitude to those who fell for her freedom, to their families, and all their friends.

Today, our two peoples join together in their deep-lying will for peace, but also in their dedication to liberty—that liberty which for us is the most precious of all possessions, which we will never renounce and which would justify, if by misfortune it became necessary, the greatest of all sacrifices. That is why we are ready to work in the pursuit of peace with all those who want freedom to spread throughout the world.

NOTE: The exchange began at 11:32 a.m. at the Normandy American Cemetery and Memorial.

Normandy, France

*Remarks at the Bayeux Town Hall.
January 5, 1978*

Mr. President, Honorable Mayor, distinguished and very friendly citizens of Bayeux:

It is a great honor and privilege for me, as President of the United States, to come here to extend to you the friendship of the people who love France as they love their own Nation.

On the automobile which President Giscard has provided for me to use in France, one of the license plates has a number 1776, the date of the Declaration of Independence of our country. The other license plate is 1789, the date of the Declaration of [the Rights of] Man of the French.

Our time of liberty began together with the alliance of freedom, which has persisted through 200 years, and it is a precious possession of the people of our Nation to be bound in brotherhood and sisterhood with the men and women of your great country, France.

I also remember, as a young man in the United States Navy, June 6, 1944, when 5,000 ships left the shores of England to move toward the shores of Normandy.

Three thousand of those ships disembarked, over a 2-week period, more than 1½ million Allied troops—the turning point in the war which ultimately brought freedom to you and to us.

This morning I flew past your city and then down the beaches in a helicopter to observe the area which demonstrated the heroism of the Allies in those discouraging times. I witnessed the Omaha Beach area where 2,000 Americans lost their lives on the first day—a site of tragedy, of heroism, but of victory.

Omaha has one meaning, but Bayeux has a different but related meaning. Here, during the dark days of the occupation, you never lost your commitment to liberty and to complete freedom. And I am very proud to come to your village, which is known by Americans of this day because it was the first city liberated by Allied forces.

In the American cemeteries in Europe, almost a hundred thousand bodies lie, a symbol of our mutual dedication to the principles which have bound us together for more than two centuries.

Presently in Europe there are 200,000 American troops equally dedicated to those same principles of independence and freedom. We feel as a deep political and emotional feeling in our hearts the ties which have bound, do now bind, and always will bind together the people of France and the United States of America. This is a treasured possession of ours, one which is among the most important feelings and commitments of the American people.

I am very grateful of the heroism and the dedication of the people of France, who have for many years since the birth of our own Nation been an inspiration to us. I believe the world recognizes our military strength, which is of great importance, but also recognizes our mutual commitment to unchanging principles which are equally binding and of as great importance as military strength.

Let me say this morning that I am very grateful for your hospitality, your welcome to us, and a renewal of those commitments that have given you freedom, have given us freedom, and will guarantee the symbol of freedom throughout the world in the years ahead.

Thank you again for your warm welcome, which has lifted my heart. And I believe that the people in our own country who watch this ceremony and this tremendous gathering on television and who listen to the news will have their own spirits raised along with yours to the close ties that bind together the United States of America and the great Republic of France.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:15 p.m. at the Hotel de Ville. In his opening remarks, he referred to Jean-Louis Le Carpentier, mayor of Bayeux.

Following the remarks, President Carter and President Giscard d'Estaing boarded a train at Bayeux for the return trip to Paris. During the trip, they held a working luncheon and a meeting.

Versailles, France

Toast at the State Dinner. January 5, 1978

Mr. President and Mrs. Giscard d'Estaing, distinguished leaders of France, friends who have made our brief visit here so inspirational and so enjoyable:

We have said many times since arriving in France how closely related our nations have been since the origins of our republics. In addition to the heroism shown by warriors who fought together in times of conflict and trial, we also had intimate relations that existed between the early leaders of our country and the leaders and the people of France.

Two of our earliest Presidents served here during their tutelage for leadership, Thomas Jefferson and John Adams. Benjamin Franklin, another great leader of our country, served here as Ambassador of the United States in its formative stage. Unbeknown to the Continental Congress and other national leaders, Benjamin Franklin was also an Ambassador from my own State of Georgia. We paid him, secretly, $15 a month. [Laughter] I understand he did our work at night, along with many other interesting things. [Laughter]

Benjamin Franklin made a very interesting statement during the time he was Ambassador here which I would like to read. "God grant that not only the love of liberty but a thorough knowledge of the rights of man may pervade all the nations of the earth so that a philosopher may set his foot anywhere on its surface and say

'This is my country.' " The interesting thing is that he said this, "a thorough knowledge of the rights of man," years before the Declaration of the Rights of Man.

As President Giscard d'Estaing has already said, the first treaty of independence between Great Britain and the United States was signed here at Versailles. And President Wilson came back here in 1919, at this very place, to sign the Treaty of Versailles, establishing again both peace and a worldwide commitment to freedom and liberty.

It is difficult, perhaps, for citizens of France to know or to comprehend the deep feeling of brotherhood, mutual purpose, and appreciation held in the hearts of Americans for what your nation has done for us.

In the early years of our young nation, Lafayette was still a great hero in our country. In my own State of Georgia, he traveled widely, visiting the cities of Augusta, Sparta, Milledgeville, Savannah, and we even know that he visited a small Indian village between Georgia and Alabama very close to where I live. We have both a city and a county in my own State named after Lafayette.

The Declaration of Independence and the Declaration of the Rights of Man initiated the startling concept throughout the world of basic human rights. Since I've been here, President Giscard d'Estaing and I have discussed some of the aspects that go with the definition of human rights. One of the most important is that of worldwide peace.

Another is economic benefit, which guarantees free people a chance for food, shelter, health, education, and a chance for their spirits to grow.

Another is to strengthen the ties of friendship, such as those which exist between the people of France and the people of the United States of America.

Another is to exhibit bravery, not through coercion but voluntarily for a worthy cause. We honored this type of bravery today near the beaches of Normandy.

Another characteristic, of course, is the appreciation of beauty. And today we've had a reaffirmation of our consciousness of the beauty that pervades the nation of France—not only the countryside through which we traveled, but this palace, the home that your President has permitted us to use for these two nights. And this afternoon, we had a chance to see the beauty of your artists whom we admire so much in our own country.

If France and the United States, bound so closely together now, can continue to exhibit the bravery and the commitment which we have shown in the past, then human rights will be the historical inevitability of our times.

On behalf of the people of America, I would like, therefore, to propose a toast to President Giscard, to the people and the greatness of France.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:42 p.m. at the Grand Trianon in response to a toast by President Giscard d'Estaing.

Prior to the President's remarks, he attended a reception at the Grand Trianon, where he met with various French political leaders.

Following the dinner, the President and President Giscard d'Estaing went to the Chateau de Versailles for a reception.

Remarks of the President and President Giscard d'Estaing at the Departure Ceremony, January 6, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. On this departure from the great nation of France, it is difficult for me to express how deep the emotions have been in me and among the American people for the extraordinary hospitality that has been extended to us on this all too brief visit.

The many reminders of the historical alliance and the mutuality of heritage between our country and France, the common demonstrations of bravery of our fighting people who have defended liberty have been overwhelming in the depth of emotion engendered in all of us.

The personal welcome given to us by President Giscard d'Estaing and his wife, the Ministers of the French Government, have been equaled, even though this has been very difficult, by the spontaneous and genuine expressions of friendship among people at Normandy, at Bayeux, on the streets of Paris, and last evening at Versailles.

The open demonstration of mutual commitment for the future of the ideals and principles of our two nations has indeed been reassuring to us and, I believe, even to the rest of the world. And I want to express my personal thanks to your great President and to the wonderful people of France.

PRESIDENT GISCARD D'ESTAING. Just a word, Mr. President, to say that our conversations we had during your visit were exceptionally cordial and open and have taken place in full respect of the views of the other. Perhaps for the first time in conversations of this sort, neither of the partners, in fact, at either time tried to alter or change the policy of the other, but on the contrary, tried to seek out those elements in common which can be pursued together.

I would say that it was a particularly warm welcome that you received from the people of France, and those who know the people of France would agree it was exceptionally cordial and warm.

There is, of course, the effect of the longstanding friendship between our two countries, but there is also the favorable judgment in the eyes of the people of France for the generous action that you have undertaken. Your desire for idealism in the international responsibilities of your country is something which is very akin to the views and feelings of the French people. And I am quite convinced that, thanks to our conversations and our meetings, we will be able to work fruitfully together for the understanding and peace and progress of the world.

NOTE: The exchange began at 10:35 a.m. at Orly International Airport.

Earlier in the day, the President met with President Giscard d'Estaing at Elysee Palace.

As printed above, this item follows the text of the White House press release.

Brussels, Belgium

Remarks of the President and King Baudouin I at the Welcoming Ceremony. January 6, 1978

THE KING. Mr. President, with great joy I am welcoming you and Mrs. Carter to Belgium for the first time in your capacity as President of the United States of America. You have, of course, visited our country before as the Governor of your home State.

This is the final stage of your long but rapid tour of four continents just at the beginning of the year 1978, which you have described as of capital importance. The many conversations you have had during the tour bear witness to your heavy responsibilities in the construction of a freer and more peaceful world. The list of countries on your program is by itself evidence of your concern for drawing international relations closer and for solving the problems that are causing the greatest difficulties at the present time.

Your stay in Brussels, the headquarters of the Atlantic Alliance and the seat of the European Communities, obviously reflects your desire further to confirm your friendship and cooperation with the member countries of those organizations.

By taking your inspiration from the essential human values which, as you have said, make life worth living, you have promoted a universal awareness of the importance of human rights. You are responding to the great challenges of our time, whether political or economic, national or worldwide, with courage and determination.

Two months ago you received Mr. Tindemans and Mr. Simonet<sup>1</sup> at Washington in their two-fold capacities as members of the Belgian Government and spokesmen for the European Communities. The discussions held in your Capital City have greatly encouraged us, since they led to the conclusion that, in spite of the difficulties caused by the world prices, you remained opposed to the easy way out, namely, protectionism.

Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, welcome to Belgium. May your all too brief presence here be fruitful.

THE PRESIDENT. Your Majesties, people of the great nation of Belgium:

I am delighted to be back in your great country to renew my friendship with Prime Minister Tindemans and to have an opportunity to meet with Your Royal Highness, King Baudouin, and Queen Fabiola.

Brussels was the first city which Vice President Mondale visited when he toured the nations of our traditional allies just 1 year ago, and now it is the last stop that I will make before I return to the United States.

First and last, our purpose has been the same—to reaffirm in times of rapid change our unchanging faith in allies like your great country and people.

This has been a diverse journey for us, but I have talked about simple, constant themes. One is the demand for political liberties, for basic human rights. On this question, Belgium and the United States have never differed. For these values we have fought together in war, and we have always worked together in peace.

The other universal theme is a need to resolve conflict without violence, to make peace instead of war. Throughout this century, Belgium has paid a heavy price for other nations' failure to keep the peace. Now, Brussels is the home of institutions such as the European Community, and NATO represents our shared hope for a secure and peaceful and a prosperous future.

Brussels is a beautiful city, as my wife and I will remember, which is one of the discouraging aspects of this visit—that it is all too brief. I feel, however, that the warmth of your own personal welcome is a consolation, and I look forward to seeing more of your land and your people when Rosalynn and I are able to return.

Your Majesty, thank you for this warm welcome. We are indeed grateful for a chance to be back with you and the people of your country.

Toasts of the President and King Baudouin I at a State Luncheon. January 6, 1978

THE KING. Ladies and gentlemen, I ask you to raise your glasses to the health of the President of the United States and of Mrs. Carter.

Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, we were really very happy to have you both here, for too little time, and we wish you a happy return home and, if possible, a peaceful rest during the weekend.

May God give you the strength and light to continue your work for peace and more justice.

THE PRESIDENT. Your Majesties and distinguished leaders of the Government of Belgium and the international organizations that have come here because of the deep commitments of Belgium and your people to the principles of freedom, strength through voluntary commitment and international organization, because of common beliefs and common purpose, those of us from the United States are very pleased to be again in your great country.

Rosalynn and I came here before when I was a Governor. In order to demonstrate to the world the importance of myself and my State, I called a press conference. And only two people came. [Laughter]

Today the importance of our relationship is demonstrated by the great welcome that you've given us and the interests of the press and the rest of the world in the presence of American officials here with the European Community, with NATO, and also with the Government of Belgium. Then, as now, my trip is too brief and is devoted to work of an official nature.

I would love to be able to have celebrated the 400th birthday of Rubens with you and to travel around your beautiful country to see not only your people but also the works of art and the origin of the culture, much of which we have inherited in our own country.

Yesterday, I was thrilled to visit, with President Giscard d'Estaing, the shores of Normandy, where in just 24 hours 176,000 forces landed to restore the freedom of Europe and, at the same time, on an equivalent and equal basis, to guarantee the freedom of the people of the United States. We considered that to be both a joint effort and also that the results of the victory in Europe to be of equal benefit to us along with you. But it did demonstrate vividly the close ties that bind us together. And I am very thankful that you have welcomed us with such hospitality.

Your Majesties, I would like to propose on behalf of the people of the United States a toast to you and Queen Fabiola, to the distinguished Prime Minister and the officials of Belgium, to the great international organizations represented here, to the people of your great country, and to peace throughout the world.

NOTE: The exchange began at 1:50 p.m. in La Grande Galerie at the Royal Palace.

Prior to the luncheon, the President met at the Royal Palace with King Baudouin I and Prime Minister Léo Tindemans.

Mr. President, and members of the Commission:

I am glad to meet with you today and to continue the discussions that began when my administration was only a few hours old. Before my first week in office was over, Vice President Mondale began his visit to our traditional allies, stopping first of all in Brussels, home of those international institutions that represent our shared hope for a secure and prosperous future.

As the first American President to visit the headquarters of the European Community, I believe this meeting symbolizes America's abiding commitment to a strong and united Europe and to the European Community.

It has been my pleasure to meet often with the Community's leaders. In addition to meeting President Jenkins, both at the London Economic Summit and in Washington, I benefited from meeting with Prime Ministers Callaghan and Tindemans during their countries' term in the presidency of the Council.

As I have traveled in these last 9 days, crossing continents and cultures, discussing different systems of politics and economics, seeing humanity in its full, diverse array, I have reaffirmed certain constant themes time after time. I have stressed the importance of democratic political values, and the steps needed to defend them; the economic challenges we face in our relations with the developing world, and the need to cope with problems of our own. We must also open our hearts to improve the chances for peace, while always maintaining the strong right arm of our defense.

I have repeated these themes because they need repetition, because they express to the world the values my Nation most deeply holds.

I am proud today to add another—that the United States welcomes a strong, united Europe as a common force for the values our peoples share.

The United States will do its part to work with you.

Our economy is prosperous and growing, continuing its steady recovery. Because we have confidence in the fundamental strength of our economy, we have confidence in the fundamental strength of the dollar, now and for the future. But we are also aware of the degree to which our own prosperity depends more than ever on international economic cooperation.

We are prepared to work with the Community in a wide variety of ways, in order:

- to promote the economic growth of nations so as to control inflation, reduce unemployment, and achieve monetary stability;
- to reach a rapid and successful conclusion to the multilateral trade negotiations, and thus to expand international trade, create more jobs in all countries, and help us all resist protectionist pressures;
- to work creatively toward mutually beneficial relations with the developing nations;
- to cooperate in providing a role for nuclear technology in meeting our energy needs, without hazarding our children's future through the threat of nuclear proliferation; and
- to find answers together to social and economic problems facing each of our societies.

As I said in Paris 2 days ago, we must use the tools of shared freedom to increase the choices and opportunities in our economic system.

We can share our experience in social development—in education, health care, social services, the organization and management of factory and farm.

As the world's largest trading unit, the Community shares with us a clear interest in a successful conclusion to the multilateral trade negotiations. They are progressing well, though much remains to be done.

I welcome the success of the participating nations in reaching the goal set last May in London: substantial progress by the end of 1977. What has been achieved already should enable the negotiations to end this year. Speed is important if these negotiations are to improve the world trading system and remove pressure for protectionism.

We need a broad package of agreements, with major reductions in tariffs and nontariff barriers, and with provisions for agriculture.

We know that each country will face problems of transition to a freer trading system. But those are a small price to pay for the benefits of more open trade. And they are small, too, in comparison to the danger of protectionism if we fail to reach a comprehensive agreement.

Our nations also share concern for developing comprehensive energy programs. Two months ago, I postponed my visit here to Brussels in order to do everything possible to enact an energy program in the United States. My country must waste less energy and develop alternative sources of supply. As soon as I return, I will resume work on this crucial legislation.

I am confident that the United States will soon be setting an example for responsible energy policy.

The European Community and the United States also share a deep interest in promoting relations with developing countries, and our cooperation has led to constructive results.

We must continue to work together to draw these countries more fully into the global economy. They too must be able to share more equitably in the benefits and responsibilities of global economic progress and to play an appropriate role in making global economic decisions.

We in the United States also welcome the growing political and economic role of the Community beyond Western Europe. The role of the Community contributes vitally to reaching goals we share. Most recently, I have been particularly pleased by the close cooperation between us—and by the firm leadership shown by the members of the Community—at the Belgrade Review Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Finally, in stressing our commitment to European unity, I look forward to continuing a close and productive association between the United States and the European Community in the years ahead. And I can think of no more fitting tribute to what you are doing than to cite the words of Jean Monnet, the father of European unity: “You are not making a coalition of states; you are uniting peoples.”

NOTE: The meeting began at approximately 3 p.m. in the Community Conference Room at the Commission’s headquarters. Prior to the meeting, the President met with Roy Jenkins, President of the Commission.

Text of Remarks at a Meeting of the North Atlantic Council. January 6, 1978

Mr. Secretary General, General Haig, and members of the Council:

I am happy to meet again with the North Atlantic Council, after our successful discussions in London last May.

I come to see you at the end of a journey which has taken me to seven nations and which, from beginning to end, has reminded me of the causes for which our alliance was formed.

At every point on this journey, in East and West, in nations trying to cope with their poverty and those adjusting to the consequences of material wealth, I have emphasized the vitality of democratic rule, individual freedoms, human rights.

We in this hall understand those values well. Without them, the West stands for nothing at all. And we also know, too often from personal experience, the cost the defense of these liberties can demand.

Yesterday, I walked with President Giscard d’Estaing along the beaches of Normandy—as I might also have walked in Anzio, in Verdun, or here in Belgium in Flanders Field. If those names fill us simultaneously with mourning and with pride, it is because they remind us of the price that has been paid for our freedom before, the price we hope never to have to pay again.

No one who recalls those sacrifices can wish them ever to be repeated. The ancient soil of Europe bears constant, visible evidence of the carnage that war inevitably brings. In Warsaw, I saw brave people who have rebuilt much of the graceful city that war took from them; but what is new only emphasizes how much of the old was lost. Here in Belgium, too often the battlefield of Europe, every family knows of friends, homes, dreams that have been crushed by war.

That is the challenge for our alliance: to defend our values fearlessly, while tirelessly working to prevent war.

We know that the path to lasting peace depends on human understandings, negotiated agreements, acts of good will; the brave initiatives in the Middle East shine a ray of hope onto all international efforts. But we are united in believing that our defense must always be strong enough to deter any thoughts of aggression—that we must be prepared for combat we always hope to avoid.

When I met with the leaders of the alliance in London this past May, I was impressed with the allies’ seriousness of purpose and by our common determination to prepare NATO for the challenges of the next decade.

At that meeting, we agreed to embark on four major efforts:

- short-term measures to meet immediate military problems;
- a long-term defense program, surveying NATO's requirements in 10 specific areas;
- an East-West study to gain better understanding of trends in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, an overall assesment of Warsaw Pact power, and the implications for the NATO alliance; and
- intensified effort to improve cooperation in defense procurement.

We have already taken major steps in all four areas. I was pleased by reports of the recent ministerial meeting of the Defense Planning Committee and the North Atlantic Council, and I look forward to the transatlantic dialog on defense trade that the Independent European Program Group has proposed.

Together, we are setting the NATO alliance on a course that will reaffirm our shared commitment to peace, to a strong and vital alliance, and to meeting any challenge to our strength and cohesion in the years ahead.

The leaders of the alliance will have the opportunity to review the results of our efforts in a summit-level NATO conference this spring. I am happy to renew my invitation to the alliance to hold that meeting in Washington on May 30 and 31.

The defense budget that I will be submitting to the Congress later this month will provide for real increases in United States defense spending, more than compensating for the effects of inflation. Even more important, a major part of this effort will respond directly to our objectives in the long-term defense program, and will improve the United States military commitment to the alliance.

The number of United States soldiers in Europe will increase by more than 8,000 in the next year and a half, and we will substantially improve our reinforcement capability.

We have made these efforts in the name of the alliance. We hope that with a far-reaching, realistic, long-term defense program, the alliance as a whole will match or exceed the improvements which we ourselves are now undertaking.

The United States will continue to maintain—undiminished—its firm commitment to NATO and will continue to provide the forces needed to back up that commitment.

We will continue to subscribe to the doctrine, strategy, and policies of the alliance, including forward defense and flexible response.

We will work with you to maintain deterrence across the entire spectrum of strategic, theater nuclear, and conventional forces, so that the Warsaw Pact states will know that all of us are united in commitment to defense of all the territories of NATO members.

There will be no flagging of American will or ability to meet all of our NATO commitments, which have the firm support of the American people.

There are other responsibilities facing the alliance.

We have set an excellent record of consulting with one another on a wide range of issues. That can and should continue, and the United States will increasingly draw the NATO allies into its counsels.

As SALT II proceeds towards an agreement, which we hope will come soon, we will intensify our consultations with all of you, recognizing that the Council is the focus of our deliberations. As we move beyond SALT II, we will undertake broad discussions here on all allied security issues.

We must approach these issues together, as an alliance, and judge each question in the context of our overall security requirements for the next decade.

We must assure that our force planning and arms control strategies serve the same purpose. In seeking to reduce tensions and to build a more stable peace, the alliance should continue to give high priority to the mutual and balanced force reduction talks in Vienna.

We believe our negotiating proposals would lead to a more stable military situation in Central Europe, with lower force levels on both sides.

We in the alliance are prepared to be flexible in seeking progress toward a balanced outcome that protects our interests. But serious interest in moving the talks forward cannot be one sided. We look for an equal commitment and contribution toward progress in the talks from the Warsaw Pact states.

Lastly, as allies, we must continue to promote our strength in other areas—economic, political, social, moral. It is precisely when the challenge to democracy is greatest that our leaders must most firmly resist nondemocratic solutions.

I have every confidence that the nations of the alliance, and NATO itself, will be more than equal to these tasks.

I return to the United States confident of the prospects for a peaceful world which respects human rights; I know that the security of our alliance is the rock on which that hope is built.

NOTE: The meeting began at approximately 4:35 p.m. in the Conference Room at NATO Headquarters.

During his visit to the Headquarters, the President met with Joseph M. A. H. Luns, Secretary General of NATO, and Gen. Alexander M. Haig, Jr., Supreme Allied Commander of Europe.

Remarks Following the Meeting of the North Atlantic Council. January 6, 1978

SECRETARY GENERAL LUNS. Ladies and gentlemen, the President.

THE PRESIDENT. That's one of the briefest speeches that you've ever made, Secretary General Luns. And I want to say almost equally briefly that the NATO alliance is one that's precious to the American people. Our involvement in it is supported almost unanimously in our country.

I've been deeply gratified at the resurgence of commitment and tangible support for NATO military strength among all the members of the alliance. I gave them a detailed report about the progress that we are making in our negotiations with the Soviet Union on a wide range of subjects.

We want to understand the East-West relationship and to alleviate any potential tensions. Our commitment is not to war, it's to peace. We believe that the best way to preserve peace and to preserve those ideals and commitments, human rights of the Western allies is dependent upon the military capability which we exhibit. I pointed out to them the suffering that has taken place in Europe by our forces and those of our other allies in previous wars, and the fact that we never want to see this happen again, and that a close support and a constant commitment to mutual defense is the best way to prevent additional war.

I gave the ambassadors, the Secretary General, and the military officials an up-to-date account of my own visit, a report on progress that has already taken place and might take place in the Middle East. We covered the economic strength of our own country, the close ties that bind us together not only militarily but politically and economically.

We had a question-and-answer session where several of the ambassadors pointed out to me particular points of interest to the United States, and I responded to their comments as well. It was a very fruitful exchange, and in less than 2 hours we covered these ranges of interest which have been important to all.

At the end I told our allies who were represented there that we have nothing to conceal from them; they are partners in every sense of the word. And we have had our Secretary of Defense, our Secretary of State, the Vice President—just a few hours after I became President—and now myself come here to the NATO Headquarters to let our allies know that the alliance is indeed intimate and one that's unconstrained and, if any question in the future ever arises about SALT negotiations, tactical weapons, budget plans, soundness of the dollar, that they only need to contact me directly, if necessary, and they'll get an immediate answer.

I think any concerns have been alleviated, and I leave here with a great sense of trust and a great sense of appreciation for not only the strength of the alliance in the past, the ties that have bound us together philosophically and politically and morally, but also with a sense of assurance about the future.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:40 p.m. in the main hallway at NATO Headquarters.

The President's Overseas Trip

*Remarks on Arrival at the White House.
January 6, 1978*

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. President, we're delighted to welcome you and Rosalynn back to the Nation's Capital as you return this evening from this most successful and inspiring trip. We're delighted to wish you a Happy New Year in person for the first time this year, and we're delighted that because of this trip, 1978 is beginning on the best possible basis.

This trip was of tremendous importance and was a great success for our Nation in many ways. First of all, it permitted the President to deepen and broaden the friendship and the sense of understanding and cooperation between himself and the leaders of the great nations that he visited.

Just as importantly, it deepened and broadened the friendship of the American people with the peoples of those nations. And the love and the affection that was so apparent as we watched you meet and walk amongst the peoples of those nations showed the great love and affection around the world that exists for our Nation and its leaders.

This visit also permitted you to work on some very important problems, and the one that comes to mind immediately is the Middle East, where your visits arrived at the most important moment when, during these historical developments, you were able to meet with the leaders of Iran, Saudi Arabia, and of course, Mr. Sadat in Aswan, to help keep the momentum toward peace in the Middle East. Your conversation with Prime Minister Begin also contributed to that crucial process.

But perhaps most importantly your visit and each stop on that visit demonstrated the profound, the complete and the total commitment of this administration and of its President to the pursuit of human rights, of human justice and liberty. Those values most basic to the American people are also most basic to our foreign policy.

When you left, Mr. President, you asked those of us who stayed behind to take care of things. These have been 9 successful days in the history of our country. [Laughter] And we're proud of it. We have avoided war. We have continued Government services with no increase in taxes. The Congress have not turned down a single suggestion during these past 9 days. I've matured a lot. I've aged a year since you left, and Amy's now an accomplished skier. [Laughter]

Welcome home. We're delighted to have you and Rosalynn back with us. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Maybe I should have stayed gone longer. [Laughter]

A week and a half ago when I stood right here on this spot I mentioned some words in anticipation of our trip that are significant: rapid change, diversity among the peoples of the world, American leadership, liberty, freedom, friendship, human rights. And now after going to these nations, I have a much more sure sense of what those words really mean. I won't go into detail now because we don't have time. But there are a few vivid memories that illustrate my own emotions as I return to my land which I love so much.

The visit to Warsaw, the Warsaw Pact nation on the other side of the Iron Curtain, which is now being opened, I hope, for good. Paying tribute to those who were killed there—there were 4 million Jews in Poland before the war; now there are less than a hundred thousand. Warsaw had 1.2 million people; 800,000 of them were killed. Six million Poles died.

Twenty million Russians died in the Second World War.

And I have a much surer sense now that the Communist nations who sometimes we look upon as adversaries want to avoid war and to have peace just as much as we do. And we need to make every effort to search out compatibilities and to understand one another and to communicate easily and well.

I was deeply impressed by India, the largest democracy on Earth, 700 million people perhaps. I visited Gandhi's tomb, where his body was cremated, and thought about how that man with no army, no television, no political organization, no home, was able to transform that country by walking by himself from one village to another just because he had an ideal that didn't change and because he wanted the Indian people to have a right to worship and to choose their own leaders.

And we visited a small village like the one my mother lived in for 2 years, a village of poverty. The people who live there don't make as much income in a year as the average American worker makes in a week. But we were received with open arms, and it was a natural outburst of friendship and appreciation, even there, for what our country stands for.

Then I visited King Hussein and King Khalid and the Shah of Iran, and then stopped in Aswan. And as I stepped off the plane I embraced with a deep sense of affection one of the bravest men on Earth, Anwar Sadat.

And then came back to France, and yesterday, I believe, was one of the best days of my whole life, the outpouring of friendship that existed on the streets of Paris for us, for our country, the people in the small village of Bayeux, the first town liberated when the freedom forces moved back into Europe. And to stand in Normandy Beach, on the site of the loss of 2,000 American lives in just a few hours in Omaha, and to see a tremendous American flag and a tremendous French tri-color flag flying over the graves of over 9,300 Americans who died for the liberty of France and Europe and for our own freedom was a great experience for me.

So, I've learned a lot. We were received with open arms and friendship, even among nations who in the past have been kind of cool toward us, and I was able to see very clearly what the United States of America means to those people around the world.

When we are clean and decent they are pleased. When we are honest they are relieved. When we are strong they're protected, and when we extend the hand of friendship they respond with an open heart.

I was proud of the friendship we received and the friendship we left behind us, but at all times I was even more proud of the people that I represent.

NOTE: The exchange began at 9:14 p.m. on the South Lawn of the White House.

The President's Overseas Trip

Question-and-Answer Session With Reporters on Board Air Force One en Route to the United States. January 6, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. I think I will answer your questions for a while.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS ON THE TRIP

Q. Starting out, Mr. President, would you give us your assessment of the trip and what you think you accomplished?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I wanted to project the image of a nation that stands for what is right and decent and good, strengthen the concept of democracy, both in the developing and the developed nations, try to make progress on resolving the Middle Eastern dispute. And one thing that evolved everywhere I went was an expression of interest or concern on the part of the foreign leaders about how we were going to address the energy question.

Additionally, of course, I wanted to strengthen, if possible, the friendship in varying degrees that existed originally between our own Nation and the other countries that we visited.

I had never been before to India or the Middle East—or the countries that we went to in the Middle East. These were the four or five things that I had in mind. I think we did a fairly good job.

Q. I know that's what you intended to do, but do you think you accomplished those? What, in particular, do you think you have accomplished?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, there is no doubt that the friendship between ourselves and Poland, ourselves and India, ourselves and Saudi Arabia, ourselves and Iran, ourselves and Egypt, ourselves and France and Belgium were enhanced. And this was accomplished.

I believe that we made some progress in the Middle East. So far as I know, there are no differences that separate us from Sadat, for instance. We reemphasized the same basic principles that we proposed 6 or 8 months ago to the Arab and the Israeli leaders. In this respect, the trip was successful.

I made two or three major speeches, too: one on democracy as it relates to the developing nations in the world under changing circumstances; the other one, democracy as it relates to the developed or industrialized nations in the world in changing circumstances. It's hard to say whether the speech has made any impact or not.

I think we also put forward the image of a nation that is strong and secure and self-confident, but which doesn't have to prove our strength by taking advantage of other nations that are not so strong or forceful or secure as are we.

The personal relationships that I evolved between myself and the foreign leaders was very gratifying.

I would say the most emotional day was yesterday with the visit to Normandy and the reception—

Q. That was beautiful.

THE PRESIDENT.—of the people in Bayeux and the response of the French people along the streets of Paris and the tremendous crush of people that showed up last night at the Palais de Versailles. It was a very deeply moving experience.

JODY POWELL. Let me interrupt for a minute. Does anybody need a "shooter?"

THE PRESIDENT. Does anybody care for a drink. That's the question.

MR. POWELL. Let the record show that six reporters were offered a chance for a drink, and they all turned it down. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. That's news. [Laughter]

VIEWS ON THE TRIP

Q. At a couple of points you looked sort of tired to us, but many of us were completely exhausted. And what I'd like to know is how you stood up physically and how it affected you in the changing time zones, whether or not in retrospect you may feel that the itinerary was a little too hectic and if in future foreign trips you might tell your staff to go a little easier on you when they plan a trip?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I'll be honest with you. Today is the first day I've been tired. The rest of the trip I felt quite rested and relaxed and didn't feel hurried. I actually got more sleep per night than I would ordinarily get in Washington. And generally I get up at either 5, 5:30, or 6 o'clock in the morning. I slept later than I ordinarily did. Last night we stayed up pretty late, about an hour later than anticipated. Today was really the first day I felt tired at all. And that was at the NATO meeting.

I think that one of the major considerations—and you can keep this on the record if you want to—is how the rest of the entourage, including the press, are affected by the trip. I'm always taken care of. When I get to the final place, 20 minutes after I make a major speech, I can go to bed and sleep until the next morning. You all have to file your stories and get up and be ready for me to emerge the following morning. I think that that factor is one that we will consider in the future.

Q. Do you think, sir, that there were a couple of gaffes—I guess it's the word?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. There were.

Q. In the Polish translation, the open mike in New Delhi—did that cause you any problems in dealing with the leaders, or will it cause any permanent problem in relations with these countries?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, both were inadvertent, of course. Gierek, I thought, made a very fine statement afterwards. He said, "In Poland we don't criticize women or translators." [Laughter] That happened the first time I met Gierek, and afterwards we had a very fine personal relationship. He never commented on it except just to smile and say, "Well, it was kind of ancient Polish and had a Russian influence." But I don't think it had any lasting effect.

And I have read the news reports of the statements of the Indian leaders after we left, and I think, perhaps, without trying to be overly optimistic, that it kind of helped me and Desai both. I was very forceful about our nonproliferation program, pointed out to him very frankly and bluntly that the Congress was likely to pass stringent requirements on fuel supplies in the future, with my approval. And I wanted him to know at least 18 months ahead of time that it would affect India.

And he and I made a joke of it several times after that in a perfectly easy way. And after we departed, their reports to the press were that it was a very constructive visit.

I think it showed Desai was, as I referred to him, adamant in the Indian position. We tried to evolve some solution to this potential conflict about international safeguards on production of nuclear power versus an adequate supply of fuel. One possibility that we will explore is that if we and the Soviets, the British, can conclude a comprehensive test ban, that this would be an adequate new factor to permit Desai to accept comprehensive safeguards without having to violate the principles of autonomy or independence.

But I regret that the open mike thing occurred. I can't mislead you about that. Between me and Desai, it was always a matter of humor and good reception. I think anybody that observed me and him closely saw that there was a genuine feeling of mutual respect.

Q. Let me just follow up here.

THE PRESIDENT. Please do. But it was a mistake.

Q. Yes, sir, it was probably a mistake, but was it a mistake because of the way the press operates or was it a mistake on your part?

THE PRESIDENT. It was a mistake on my part. I should have said "a very frank and factual letter" and not "a blunt and cold letter." But what I was trying to talk about to Cy Vance—obviously I had nothing of ill feeling toward Desai—what

I was talking about was it was a cold, technical subject, and it ought to be described to the Indians in no uncertain terms so that they would know what to expect 18 months after the legislation takes place.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, I am intrigued that you—I don't want to belabor the Middle East episode, but it certainly did overshadow the trip in many ways; developments kept going—you say that—Sadat said that you have an identity of views, and you say that you don't seem to have any differences. Does that put you—and Sadat has differences with Begin—so where does that put you with Begin?

THE PRESIDENT. I read the news reports after my statement at Aswan, and Begin expressed approval of what I said. There is a fairly good agreement between Begin and Sadat on matters concerning the definition of peace.

Sadat told me that when he met in April with me in Washington and I outlined the three basic principles, one was complete peace between Egypt and Israel—open borders, diplomatic recognition, ambassadorial exchange, free trade, tourist and student and cultural exchanges. And he told me it would never happen in his lifetime, which he did—he told me that in April.

He told me the other morning in Aswan that he was completely wrong, that not only was he well accepted in Israel but he was a hero when he came back to Egypt, that when the Israeli negotiators came to Cairo, that they were embraced and the Egyptians wept. And he said to me, "My people were far ahead of me, and what you proposed in April that I thought was never possible has already proven to be possible." That's one aspect.

The withdrawal of Israeli forces from the West Bank, with minor exceptions on the western boundary, is a principle that we espoused back in February or March publicly. And I think this is still an acceptable approach to the Arabs, although publicly I wouldn't expect them to espouse it now because it violates, in effect, the statements in Rabat. They are able and, obviously, willing to speak for themselves. But this is something we've been very clear on.

The other question, the resolution of the Palestinian problem, I think, can be resolved with an interim solution for a joint administration. I don't want to be definitive about it, but possibilities including Israel, Jordan, the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Palestinians, perhaps the United Nations for a period of time, specifically outlined ahead of time, and then the right of the Palestinians to decide their own future between whether they should continue that kind of administration or affiliate with Jordan—those are the kinds of principles that we have described very clearly and in writing, beginning 8 months ago.

So, the details are going to be a problem. But on those expressions of principle, I don't know of any differences that separate me and Sadat.

Q. Do you call that self-determination?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, yes, I don't think it's—I have never thought and do not think that it's advisable for us, for the Middle Eastern countries, or for the world to have an independent Palestinian nation located between Israel and Jordan. I think they would be a target of subversion. I think there would be a concentrated influence, perhaps, exerted there by some of the more radical other leaders of the world. And I think that that Palestinian entity or homeland ought to be tied in at the least in a very strong federation or confederation with Jordan.

But now I want to say that's our preference. And if Israel and Jordan and the Palestinians and Egypt should work out something different, we would not object. But that's our position. And we made it very clear from the very beginning of my administration to the Israelis and the Arabs that that's our preference.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS ON THE TRIP

Q. I was wondering, were there any unexpected gains or losses throughout the past 9 days?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, that's hard to describe. You know, I'm not an objective analyst. But I felt that the progress we made with India was extraordinary.

Q. In what specific area?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, under Mrs. Gandhi, there is no doubt that the orientation of India, which has been an historic friend of ours, has been away from us, perhaps toward the Soviets.

I felt like Desai and his government has at least come back to a completely neutral or nonaligned position. And there was a genuine feeling of compatibility and friendship, based on deep religious convictions, a commitment to democracy, the principle of human rights, that was very encouraging to me.

It was more than I had anticipated. I don't want to analyze it myself, but the French news media have said that we have never had better relationships with France in this past hundred years than we have right now. I feel very close to Giscard d'Estaing.

I think the French outpouring of emotion and friendship toward us and the tremendous crowds that evolved on the streets of Paris—Giscard d'Estaing said that's a very rare occasion.

The French are almost as blase about foreign visitors as are the people in Washington, because it's such a center for diplomatic visits. But I thought it was a very good expression of friendship.

And as I said earlier, I thought the community of memories, of history expressed on the beach near Omaha yesterday was something that you can't anticipate and you can't contrive. I thought it was really genuine. Well, those are a couple of things that impressed me.

Rosalynn's and Dr. Brzezinski's visit with Cardinal Wyszynski showed that there's a pluralism in the Polish society that is not frequently acknowledged in an eastern European country.

It's obvious that as far as the influence on the minds and hearts and future of the Polish people that there's a sharing between a great religious leader and the political leader.

And privately they expressed admiration for each other. And I think this is a good, kind of a pleasant surprise to know more about the nations behind the Iron Curtain.

I think the Curtain is being parted. I think it's a good step forward. We consummated an additional proper action today by returning the crown to Hungary.<sup>1</sup> We're not trying to drive a wedge between those Warsaw Pact nations and the Soviet Union. But we are trying to get them to look to us as friends who want peace, who recognize the horrible suffering that they've experienced, and who are building a basis for friendship and trade and mutual exchange.

We signed a nuclear agreement with the Iranians that will provide billions of dollars of trade for American industry, a lot of jobs for American people, that won't violate at all our nonproliferation policies.

So, there were some things that we hadn't really laid down on the agenda ahead of time that occurred. But it's hard for me to be objective about it.

Q. What about any kind of negative aspects? Were you surprised by anything that didn't go as well as you thought it might have?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I can't think of anything. But perhaps you can.

VISIT TO POLAND

Q. As a follow on your discussions about Poland, I have two questions: One is why didn't you yourself see Cardinal Wyszynski, and did you make any efforts to suggest to Mr. Gierek that he should allow his dissident journalists into your press conference?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. We requested that the press conference be open ahead of time. That's his country. He made that decision. And I made the decision to comment on it publicly. And he made the decision, I presume, for my comment to be published very freely in the Polish newspapers and also on the television that evening.

We extended an invitation to Cardinal Wyszynski to come and meet with me. But he said it was not proper for a cardinal to come to pay his respects to me. So, we thought it was a good solution there, at the last moment I might say, for Rosalynn to accompany Dr. Brzezinski, who had planned to see Cardinal Wyszynski all the time.

I wrote him a private message. He wrote me a little note, and it was a mutually beneficial thing. But I think the contact with him through Zbig and Rosalynn was adequate.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, can you be more specific—maybe you don't want to be—on what you mean when you say Palestinians have the right to participate in their own self-determination?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't really want to spell out in any more detail what the procedure ought to be. Dayan and Kamel<sup>2</sup> will be meeting in Jerusalem on the 15th of January. Cy Vance will be there. We'll offer our good offices.

My own preference is that the Israelis and Egyptians negotiate that interim procedure with a final referendum themselves. We'll try to find some compromise between them. I think if we can evolve an acceptable set of principles, then it would be much easier for King Hussein and, perhaps later on, the Syrians to join in the discussions. I did not try to convince Hussein to participate now.

I feel and he feels also that Sadat is adequately representing the Arab position. And I think Sadat, in an almost unique way, not only has the trust of his own people and the rest of the world but also, to a substantial degree, the trust of the Israeli citizens.

So, all of us feel for now until Sadat specifically requests it, that Hussein should stay out of the direct negotiations. The Shah will be supportive, the Saudis were very encouraging about the future, and Hussein and we agree completely.

And so, I think that the present posture is a good one. But exactly how the vote should be handled or when or what the options might be offered to the Palestinians, I don't want to say. I don't know.

Q. Can I also ask you, do you think that as a result of your visit there, that Sadat's position with the hardline critics of the Arab world has been improved and that he's strengthened his hand as a result of this?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I don't think I would be violating any confidence to say that all the Arab leaders with whom I met said they support Sadat unequivocally. Now, the feeling of Syria is something that I can't assess. I didn't happen to talk to Asad lately, but the feeling of Iraq and Libya and the more radical Arabs is obvious. They don't want peace to prevail. They don't want a settlement to be reached. They don't want the Geneva conference to be concluded. And many of them still have as a unique purpose the destruction of Israel.

I don't think that Asad or King Hussein or Sadat or the Saudis—the ones with whom I've talked—I don't think any of them feel that way. I think they all are perfectly willing to accept Israel now as a permanent entity in the Middle East, living in peace.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Q. Mr. President, before we left, you said you were going to talk about human rights, and you certainly did, I think, just about every place we went.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. But since we were in Poland, where you told us about Gierek's commitment to you on emigration rights, I don't think we had any specific information that any of the leaders have given to you any reaction to your own position. Is there anything specific? In particular I am thinking about Iran. Have there been any concessions that we haven't learned about?

THE PRESIDENT. No. Obviously, we don't seek concessions on human rights in Belgium or Egypt or France. In Iran, the

Shah and I have had very all-encompassing discussions about human rights. I am not inclined to reveal the private conversations. But the basic question in Iran is the law that exists that outlaws the Communist Party and that outlaws communism are very similar to the laws that we have enforced in the past very rigidly. And this is the basis for the problem.

But the Shah is very deeply concerned about human rights, and I mentioned human rights in my statement in Iran. But we've seen in Iran, in many ways, the opening up of the rights of women, the welcoming of disparate religious and racial groups to Iran—a very fine movement forward, I would say, equivalent to what we've done in the last 20 years. (The last phrase refers specifically to movement on the rights of women and racial and religious minorities.)<sup>3</sup>

Q. Sir, if I could, I would like to get off the hard news for a minute here.

THE PRESIDENT. Good deal.

Q. And, really, I guess it's a two-part question. One is that you, in many of your talks and after the statements and things that you made, you mentioned the word "symbolism." You said, "This is a symbol" of various things.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. I guess the first part is, was the trip partly symbolic? And the second is that you have stayed in the last 9 days in some of the most elaborate buildings in the world. [Laughter] Are you at all uncomfortable with where you have been and the service you've been given in staying at places—you didn't stay at Versailles, but being in places like Versailles—is that at all uncomfortable to you?

THE PRESIDENT. I'll have to be honest and say it was not uncomfortable. [Laughter]

MRS. CARTER. I enjoyed it.

THE PRESIDENT. It was obvious that every leader, beginning with Poland all the way through the stay in the palace in France, went out of their way to try to make me feel welcome and to give me not only friendship but show what their nation had to offer, historically and culturally and in the spirit of hospitality.

So, I enjoyed it. It was very fine, and we expressed our appreciation to them. I've already written thank-you notes to everybody, including our departure from Paris, and told them how much we appreciated it.

The trip was symbolic. It's a very sure and comforting feeling to represent what I consider to be the greatest nation on Earth. And we don't have any weakness that I feel that requires me to artificially prove our strength. We don't have any need that I feel that requires me to take advantage of someone else to meet our need. We don't have any feeling of superiority or domination over other nations with whom we visited. We genuinely treat them as equals, as partners, as people with whom we would like to be even closer friends in the future.

So, it was a trip that was symbolic of the power and influence and the good will of the United States. I tried to emphasize everywhere I went the concepts of morality and decency and goodness and friendship and human rights. So, I didn't feel under any sort of uncomfortable strain to prove something that I don't really think our Nation represents. It was symbolic to that degree. It symbolized what America is, what America wants to be.

VISIT TO INDIA

Q. Do you think you would have liked to have been Viceroy of India? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. I tried to learn while I was in India what their feelings are toward the British. And my sense was that they have a genuine appreciation of what the British did, that the viceroys' administrations were in general very benevolent. There was no India before the British came. It was just a collection of a large number of independent states in all forms. The British brought the subcontinent together in unity.

After Gandhi's heroic and unbelievable crusade, the British left with good spirits. They turned over the power to Nehru on their departure.

And they were very proud to take me to a room, for instance, where no American or European has ever been. It's a beautiful portrait gallery, underneath the palace where we stayed, of all the British viceroys and other administrators who had been there and their wives. Every portrait is, I'd say, twice life-size. And it's very beautifully done, and it shows the respect that the Indians feel toward the British. So, I didn't have any yearning to be a viceroy. [Laughter] I'd rather be President. [Laughter] I think the British left with a good feeling among the Indians.

Q. This is a time for me to ask about the Indian village.

MR. POWELL. Let me first of all say that I would like one more question, in order to get it transcribed and get it back. This is the last question.

Q. I am very interested in what your impressions were of that Indian village and what your thoughts and feelings were, particularly when you touched that poor old blind lady sitting in the dust.

THE PRESIDENT. I felt just as much at home in that Indian village as I did in the palaces. It would be hard to describe my own anticipation of going to the village and the accuracy with which my mother has described the life of an Indian in a typical rural area which is very poor.

In a sense, I was representing my mother when I went there, because she went in and out of those small homes. She ran a clinic and administered to lepers and those who were dying and those who were outcast.

Without scheduling or without anybody knowing about it ahead of time, Desai and Rosalynn and I went into several of the homes. In fact, that home had no idea we were going in there, as you know. And I didn't feel like an alien there. I think those people don't realize the comparison between their lifestyle and that of other people. I don't think they were ashamed of their poverty.

They showed, at least to me—and my wife and I disagree to some degree on this—that between a better lifestyle under a totalitarian government and the right to own their own house and to work a half-acre of land and to keep their own children close to them and to make their own decision in a political election, that they had made their choice. The substantial vote—I think over 200 million people voted in this past year's election for Desai compared to Mrs. Gandhi—they showed a concern about the derogation of democracy in India. And, I don't know, those are just some mixed emotions, but that was one of the best parts of the Indian trip to me.

Q. I don't understand what it is that you and Mrs. Carter disagree on.

THE PRESIDENT. I'm not going to go into that.

Q. Okay. Maybe I just missed it.

HAMILTON JORDAN

Q. Mr. President, I know Jody said this is the last question, but I think all of us here would be remiss because of the rumors that have been going around, and I will ask this while Ham is standing in the door: There have been many rumors since Ham came to Riyadh that something is going on, that he is leaving, that he is not, that he is going to be chief of staff. You could hear everything in the world on this trip. I think it would do yourself and Ham and us a service if we could get some kind of statement from you about if anything is going on.

THE PRESIDENT. No, nothing is going on so far as I know. I don't want to corroborate what Jody said. [Laughter] Ham is the person in the White House that analyzes for me and with me the domestic, political considerations of both domestic and foreign policy. And the meeting with Sadat, when I didn't have a chance to go to see Begin—because he had just been to the United States and because Cy Vance is going to Jerusalem in 10 days—was kind of a sensitive political issue.

And I particularly wanted him to be there with us to make sure that there was an objectivity and a fairness between our unscheduled visit with Sadat and our responsibility to the Israelis to be fair as a mediator.

And that's why I wanted Ham to come over. But there is no change. Hamilton has no better relationship with me than he had before. [Laughter]

REPORTER. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. I enjoyed it. Thank you.

Drug Abuse Prevention Week, 1978

Proclamation 4544. January 11, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

History teaches us that almost every discovery or invention designed to make our lives a little better can, in the wrong hands, become an instrument of tragedy and suffering. Nothing better illustrates this than the problem of drug abuse in America. When used properly, today's drugs can work miracles that were unimaginable only a short time ago. When they fall into the hands of the immature, the careless, the ignorant, or the despairing, their effects can be devastating.

If we are to rid our society of the problem of drug abuse, we must first rid ourselves of the idea that it is confined to a single group. Drug abusers include the busy executive who cannot function without the aid of heavy drinking, the youth who is addicted to heroin, and the victim of disease who grows dependent upon prescribed medication.

Once we understand that the problem does not derive from a single source, we can appreciate the futility of attempting to seek a single solution. Controlling the availability of drugs and seeking better methods of treating the drug abuser are vital, but unless we also identify and reduce the social pressures which encourage drug abuse, our other efforts will achieve little.

Recognizing this we are focusing our efforts on the search for ways to stop drug abuse before it starts. In particular, we are directing our attention to ways of helping young people understand themselves and their surroundings without the artificial support of dangerous drugs. How successful we will be remains to be seen. But each of us needs the courage to face these hard truths, the insight to recognize that this problem affects us all, and the determination to do something about it.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, in order to inaugurate the 1978 National Drug Abuse Prevention Campaign, do hereby proclaim the week beginning January 15, 1978, as National Drug Abuse Prevention Week.

I call upon government officials, educators, medical professionals, clergy, business and civic leaders to join together in working to create an America where people are no longer tempted to abuse drugs. I call upon parents to examine the ways they respect or abuse drugs in their homes and to remember that their attitudes are likely to shape the attitudes of their children. Most of all, I ask each American to take the time and trouble to learn about drug abuse prevention, to kindle positive values within our families and communities, and to create opportunities for people of all ages and all backgrounds to come together to share their ideas, skills, and resources.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this eleventh day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

International Printing Week, 1978

Message of the President. January 12, 1978

So crucial is the freedom of the printed word to a democracy that its protection is incorporated into the First Amendment to our Constitution.

The theme of International Printing Week, 1978, "Don't Stop the Presses!—Let Freedom Roll," clearly expresses that printing, while it may be a business, is also a cornerstone of democracy.

A vast majority of the graphics arts firms in this nation are not massive corporations, but small, often family owned and operated businesses—true examples of the private enterprise system.

I encourage the printing industry to continue its contribution to the progress of freedom.

JIMMY CARTER

NOTE: International Printing Week, 1978, is observed from January 15 to 21.

National Council on Educational Research

Nomination of Harold Howe II and Frederick H. Schultz To Be Members. January 12, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Harold Howe II, of New York City, and Frederick H. Schultz, of Jacksonville, Fla., to be members of the National Council on Educational Research for terms ending September 30, 1979.

Howe, 59, has been vice president for education and research of the Ford Foundation since 1971. From 1969 to 1971, he was adviser on education to the Ford Foundation's office in India. From 1965 to 1968, he was U.S. Commissioner of Education. He has also worked as a school-teacher and principal.

Schultz, 48, is chairman of the board of Barnett Investment Services in Jacksonville. As speaker of the Florida House of Representatives in 1969 and 1970, he worked on legislation to reform education financing. He was chairman of a special State education committee which reported to the Governor.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF JANUARY 12, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. It's nice to be back home. It's nice to start a new year. I have a brief statement to make before I answer questions.

ENERGY LEGISLATION

Much has been said about the messages that I carried on behalf of the American people to leaders of the nations which I visited on the recent trip. But it's also important to focus on the message that I received from them and brought back home.

They are looking to our country to see whether we have the will, the resolve to deal squarely with our energy problems, which are also becoming their problems.

It's clear that our willingness to curb the enormous American national appetite for imported oil will be a consideration, for instance, in future OPEC oil prices.

As a nation, we are increasing our demands for foreign oil. We may have conservation forced on us by unexpected and rapid increases in oil prices in the future. Our consumers and our industries will pay more and more to foreign countries, and with those dollars that go overseas we are, in effect, exporting American jobs.

In Paris and in Brussels, our own allies expressed concern about whether we can and will enact strong energy legislation. If our own economy is not strong, if our strength is being sapped by excessive imports, then we can't provide the kind of leadership and stability on which the economic well-being of the Western democracies rests so heavily.

The United States has had and is still faced with a very large trade deficit which has led recently to exchange market disorders and exchange rate speculation. It's clear that our heavy dependence on imported oil is a main part of our trade problem and that our failure to adopt a comprehensive energy program has badly weakened confidence in our ability to deal with that problem.

Almost every foreign leader stressed the importance of our energy program in terms of our responsibilities for international monetary order and the maintenance of the integrity of the dollar.

We all recognize that while the energy program will not reduce our oil imports overnight, that it will reduce our dependence on foreign oil over the long pull and also permanently. It would improve our trade position, our national economy, the strength of the dollar in a fundamental way.

I believe that we do have the resolve and the national will to deal with the energy problem. The debate in the Congress has been long and divisive and arduous. It has at times tried the patience of all of us. And delay has deferred action, unfortunately, on a number of other important national priorities.

But when we do succeed—and I believe we have an excellent chance to succeed early in this session—we will have accomplished something in which we can take pride, not just here at home but before the other nations of the world as well.

Thank you. I'd like to answer any questions you might have.

QUESTIONS

ENERGY

Q. Mr. President, in connection with energy, has there been any kind of a compromise reached on natural gas pricing? Do you think you'll get an energy program? And if you don't, what unilateral steps will you take? And I have a followup.

THE PRESIDENT. A followup to all three of those questions?

Well, there was a substantial amount of progress made by the conference committees just before Christmas. I think that many of the consumer-oriented House Members were willing to accept a compromise that was acceptable to many of the Senators. The problem has been and still is that there are nine Senators for and nine Senators against any sort of proposal that has been made up until this time.

Dr. James Schlesinger has been out on the west coast to meet with the chairman of the committee, Senator Scoop Jackson. I have talked to Senator Jackson on the phone. And he's told me that he has a re-determination to exert his own leadership and profound influence in bringing about a resolution of the present deadlock.

My guess is that the Congress is beginning to realize—many of them have long realized—the importance of this legislation. It will be the first order of business. It's the first priority for this year's work. And it is holding up other very important matters that the Congress is interested in.

So, I think the answer to your second question is that, yes, there will be a compromise reached. It will be acceptable to me and to the country. And I think it will come very early in this session.

The third thing, what will I do if the Congress does not act, is something that I'm not yet prepared to answer. There are authorities that I have and Dr. James Schlesinger has as head of the Energy Department that would be much more unsettling to our Nation's economy—the imposition of import charges on oil that we hope to avoid, and I think the Members of the House and Senate want to avoid those kinds of disruptive actions just as much as we do.

The present laws are inadequate to deal with the increasing problems of the energy demand, which are met so excessively by imports of oil. I think we do need to have passed adequate incentives. What we have proposed to the Congress would give oil producers for new oil the highest price in the world, and it would mean that in natural gas, there would be a substantial increase in prices to the producers, compared to what we have had in the past.

I think our proposal is fair and well balanced, and I think there's a growing consensus within the Congress that this is a basis on which to reach an agreement. And I hope to avoid having to take administrative action that would be damaging to the economy in order to protect us in the future.

Q. My followup was simply, were you surprised at the NAACP's opposition to your program, and do you think it'll have an impact?

THE PRESIDENT. I was surprised. I talked to the president of the NAACP this morning, Benjamin Hooks. He said the major thrust of their report was that they want to have a sustained growth in the economy and therefore provide additional jobs for people in our Nation. But I disagree strongly with the conclusion the NAACP reached, that the way to do that was to channel enormous sums of money, $40, $50, $60, $70 billion into the pockets of those who own the major oil companies, out of the pockets of consumers.

I want to have a strong economy, too. But I don't think that's the right way to do it.

SOVIET INVOLVEMENT IN AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, everywhere you traveled, except Poland, we were told that you and the leaders talked about Soviet and Cuban penetration in the Horn of Africa, but we only got very generalized and vague statements on this. Can you enunciate the depth of our concern, and what can we do about it except jawbone?

THE PRESIDENT. We've taken a position concerning Africa that we would use our influence to bring about peace without shipping arms to the disputing parties and without our injecting ourselves into disputes that could best be resolved by Africans, both those parties that are in dispute and the Organization of African Unity. The Soviets have done just the opposite.

They, in effect, contributed to the war that's presently taking place between Somalia and Ethiopia. They sold excessive quantities of arms and weapons both to Somalia and to Ethiopia. The war began using Soviet weapons, and now they are shipping large quantities of weapons, some men, and they are also dispatching Cubans into Ethiopia, perhaps to become combatants themselves. We have expressed our concern to the Soviets in very strong terms.

We have shared the concerns that we feel with the leaders that I have visited, both the cumulative group of countries that join with us in the NATO alliance, and specifically with France, the Middle Eastern countries, and India. We've had unanimous response from them sharing our concern about the Soviet Union's unwarranted involvement in Africa. I am very concerned about the loss of life now.

Our hope is that the Somalians might call publicly for negotiations to begin immediately to resolve the Ogaden dispute. One possibility, of course, would be to go to the Security Council of the United Nations or to the permanent members of the Security Council. But the basic negotiation ought to take place between those two nations themselves.

So, I think that there are things that we can do to express our concern publicly, to offer our good services in support of the African nations who are responsible, to support the Organization of African Unity, and in the United Nations to let our voice be heard. But I hope that we can induce the Soviets and the Cubans not to send either soldiers or weapons into that area and call for and achieve a rapid initiation of negotiations.

INTEREST RATES

Q. Mr. President, on another subject, will Miller, as head of the Fed, mean lower interest rates?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I want lower interest rates, and I know the Fed does also, I'm sure, including Chairman Burns and certainly William Miller, who will be Chairman in the future, I hope.

We have here a problem in stabilizing the value of the dollar, which is the basis for most international trade on the one hand, of preventing excessive inflation, which is compatible with that, and still having interest rates low enough to encourage businesses to invest in stocks, to encourage them to create jobs with expansion, and to make sure that we have an economy that's stable and predictable.

So, I think that both Chairman Burns and Miller would like to have lower interest rates.

I hate to repeat myself again, but I think that until the question of energy is resolved, the uncertainty about this subject and the realization that our excessive imports of oil or adverse balance of trade is going to be permanent, those two things are going to contribute to the deleterious effects of increasing interest rates and also uncertainty in the stock market.

Mr. Bradley [Ed Bradley, CBS News].

U.S. ATTORNEY DAVID MARSTON

Q. Mr. President, you promised during the campaign to appoint U.S. attorneys strictly—without any consideration of political aspects or influence—strictly on the basis of merit. May we first of all assume that is also your standard for removing political attorneys, U.S. attorneys, and if so, why are you removing the U.S. attorney in Philadelphia, David Marston, who on the surface seems to have a credible record, which includes the prosecution and conviction of a number of prominent Democrats?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the answer to the first part of your question is certainly yes. I intend to make sure that all the appointments that are made to Federal judgeships and also to U.S. attorneys are made on the basis of merit. And I think until each appointment is observed very carefully—who was in office compared to who is the replacement for that person in office—that it would be hard to criticize a particular instance.

I have recently learned about the U.S. attorney named Marston. This is one of hundreds of U.S. attorneys in the country, and I was not familiar with the case until it became highly publicized. The Attorney General is handling the investigation of the replacement for Mr. Marston. I think the focusing of attention on this case will certainly doubly inspire him to make a selection that will be admirable and a credit to him and to me, and I've not interfered in it at all.

Before I first heard about Mr. Marston, the Attorney General had already decided to replace him. We have encouraged the Members of Congress, Democratic Members of Congress, not to be involved in trying to influence the Attorney General about who should be the new U.S. attorney there.

I'd be glad to answer a followup question.

Q. Is it the Attorney General's feeling, sir, that he has not done a good job?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I can't say that Mr. Marston has or has not done a good job. He was appointed at the last minute under the previous administration. He was not a practicing attorney, had never had any prosecuting experience. And the only criticism that I've heard about him was that he had a very heavy commitment to calling press conferences and so forth when he obtained evidence or when a grand jury took action in an indictment. I think this is not unique in the country.

I've not discussed the case with the Attorney General and asked him specifically what was wrong with Marston. I don't know who he will recommend to me for the replacement. But I can assure you that when the replacement is announced, that there will be the emphasis on the quality of the replacement, his qualifications compared to the incumbent. And I have absolute confidence that the Attorney General will do a good job in that respect.

FUEL PRICES

Q. Could I have a followup on energy? You have said that you want a fair energy bill from Congress.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I do.

Q. And you've indicated, repeated today again, a warning about funneling undue amounts of money from the pockets of the consumers to the oil companies. Yet your Energy Department has told some northeastern Congressmen that it will no longer continue weekly monitoring of home heating oil prices, that it will not monitor fuel prices at the refinery gates, and that if the prices to consumers do go up unduly this winter, they'll take action next winter. Now, how does that protect the consumers against a ripoff?

THE PRESIDENT. If what you say is true, then I don't see that it does protect the consumers adequately. I'm not familiar with that statement, but I will find out an answer for you and let you know the answer.<sup>1</sup>

The President said during his press conference that he would look into a question concerning monitoring of home heating oil prices by the Energy Department.

In July 1976, price controls on home heating oil and diesel fuel were lifted. A one-season price monitoring system was instituted by the Ford administration for the 1976-1977 winter season to ease the transition to the free market.

That monitoring system expired, and work has been underway on a new system for some time. In accordance with Federal rulemaking procedures, a proposed regulation outlining the new system was published in September. Public hearings were held, and the final regulation establishing the new system is expected to be signed this week.

In the meantime, the Department has continued to monitor home heating oil prices through the Energy Information Administration. No significant increases in home heating oil prices have been detected in this heating season.

U.S. ATTORNEY MARSTON

Q. Mr. President, if I could pursue the Marston question—

THE PRESIDENT. Please do.

Q. —one step further. There have been reports that, first of all, Mr. Marston is in the midst of an investigation which involves two Democratic Congressmen from Pennsylvania. And there have been reports that at least one of them has sought to contact the White House or you yourself to, in effect, get Mr. Marston off their backs. I wonder if you are aware of any such contacts or intents, however informal, and what your reaction to such a contact would be.

THE PRESIDENT. The only contact I've had with any Congressmen directly was, I think, Congressman Eilberg called me and asked that we look into it. At that time, the Attorney General had already decided to make the change. When I talked to the Attorney General about it, before Eilberg had let his views be known on the telephone call, he said that the replacement would be made and that he hoped that the Democratic Congress Members who had shown an interest in it would not be involved in trying to decide who would be the replacement.

And this has been an assurance given to us by Mr. Eilberg. As far as any investigation of Members of Congress, however, I'm not familiar with that at all, and it was never mentioned to me.

Q. Could you tell me, sir, what reason Mr. Eilberg gave for asking you to look into it? And what do you mean by "it"?

THE PRESIDENT. He wanted the replacement process to be expedited. The decision had already been made to replace Mr. Marston, and I think the Attorney General can answer your question better specifically. And my importunity to Mr. Eilberg was that it would be better if the Congress Members would let the Attorney General make the selection on the basis of merit alone. And that was Mr. Eilberg's comment to me, that he had no interest in who would be the replacement at all, but he thought that because of the confusion there that the decision that the Attorney General had already made ought to be expedited. And I feel the same way. I have complete confidence that the replacement will be chosen on the basis of merit and not politics.

TAX CUT

Q. Mr. President, with signs now that the economy is improving, why should the tax cut that your administration is proposing be any larger than an amount necessary to compensate for the increased energy taxes and social security taxes?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the tax proposal that I intend to make to the Congress will have an effective date of October 1. We anticipate, if projections hold true, that the first two quarters of 1978 will show very good economic progress in the growth rate, in the controlling of unemployment and inflation. But we believe that by the end of the third quarter, October 1, there will be a need to sustain the economic growth that we think we'll experience.

We are not trying to deal with an economy that's tottering or on the verge of collapse or in any danger. We have basically a very strong national economy.

The goal that we've set for ourselves for 1978 is a 5-percent growth rate. We were very fortunate in 1977 in reaching the goals that we set for ourselves, both in unemployment, as you know, and also in the growth rate. But we believe that a substantial tax reduction is needed for that purpose.

There are two other reasons. One is I want to reduce the portion of our gross national product that is collected and spent by the Federal Government. In my opinion, it's too high. It's approaching 23 percent. And by the time I go out of office, I would like to have that down to no more than 21 percent. And also with the encroachment of inflation, it moves people into a higher tax bracket with paying a higher percentage of their income in taxes just because their dollars that they earn are cheaper and they get more of them.

So, with inflation, you have, in effect, the imposition of higher and higher tax rates to the American people if the laws don't change. So, for that reason also, I want to reduce the rate of taxes paid by the American people.

So, I think that a substantial tax reduction is needed in 1978, and I believe the Congress will agree. So, we intend to do all three things, to compensate for increases in social security tax, to keep the economy moving strongly, and also to compensate for the effects of inflation.

STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE

Q. Mr. President, when talking about the aggravation of oil imports, the U.S. Government's strategic petroleum stockpile—I think your decision is to acquire 1 billion barrels of oil——

THE PRESIDENT. That's correct.

Q. — on the world market. Now, the GAO and others have recommended that we use oil we already own, in the Elk Hills Naval Petroleum Reserve, and that would save, I think, as you're going now, to about $20 billion you're going to spend in foreign oil. We could reduce this by half, a $10 billion saving if we used our existing naval supplies. Why don't we do that?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we are, in effect, increasing the production of American oil to cut down on the amount that we have to purchase. At Elk Hills, at Teapot Dome, we're trying to increase the importing of oil to the continental United States from Alaska. We're trying to maintain the production of oil, sour oil, to some degree in California, in addition to reducing overall consumption of oil and energy and shifting to coal.

And at the same time, it's very important to us to have stability in the world oil market and protect us from some interruption in the future over which we have no control.

So, we've set a goal for ourselves that by 1985, we'll have a billion barrels of oil stored in a secure place in salt domes in the United States so that we can have an 8- or 10-month supply in case overseas oil is interrupted in coming to us.

So, the sum total of what we propose is to do exactly what you describe. Whether domestic oil actually goes into the supply system of our country and foreign oil goes into the underground storage is really of no consequence, because the overall consumption of oil plus the import or use of oil to build up our reserves is the factor that controls how much we import.

Q. Well, my question is—what it goes to the point of—the $10 billion savings. We already own the Elk Hills naval oil reserve.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, when we sell that oil, if it's on the commercial market, the Federal Treasury gets the money back for that oil. So, there's just really swapping dollars. It may be very difficult to transport the oil from Elk Hills and identify a particular gallon or barrel of oil that has to go into a salt dome in Louisiana.

Q. Well, they talked about swap arrangements, particularly with Japan. Japan would be very happy to have that very sweet Elk Hills oil, and they'd give us their Mideast oil.

THE PRESIDENT. I understand. But we're trying to do what I've just said, build up the adequate supply of oil for reserve and cut down consumption and imports at the same time.

Sarah McClendon [McClendon News Service].

U.S. BORDER PATROL HELICOPTER

Q. Who did you say? [Laughter] I thought you were looking over there.

Sir, I have a question I want to take up with you. On January 5, a helicopter, a border patrolman on board, was shot at from the Mexican side of the border, and according to Immigration Service, no plans are being made to make a formal, big, major protest on that through the White House or the State Department to the Mexican Government. The families and the border patrolmen are very concerned. They think if you don't make a major protest, you'll get this again.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. I will certainly look into it. We have only recently begun to use helicopters on the border patrol. We have in Mexico, however, in close cooperation with the Mexican Government, used our helicopters for the detection of poppy fields that produce heroin and other hard drugs in Mexico.

And my understanding was that the helicopter fired at was in the process of trying to destroy heroin poppy fields.

Q. No, sir, it was on this side of the border. The helicopter shot at was on this side of the border, was shot at from the Mexican side.

THE PRESIDENT. I understand.

Q. This has happened before with airplanes, but not helicopters. It's very dangerous with the helicopters.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, until this past year we have never used helicopters for that purpose. But we are now.

U.S. ATTORNEY MARSTON

Q. Mr. President, to come back to the Marston matter for a minute, without gainsaying yours and the Attorney General's intention to appoint someone at least as qualified as he is, it's still not clear to me why he's being removed in the first place. Could you expand on what you've said already a little bit?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think I've covered that at least as far as I am able to. I've never looked into Mr. Marston's qualifications. I depend upon the Attorney General to assess the quality and the performance of duty of the U.S. attorneys around the country. And when he decides that a U.S. attorney needs to be replaced, then he makes the judgment about who ought to be the replacement.

He made, quite early in this past year, a decision that Mr. Marston should be replaced. I've never asked him to delineate all the reasons. And my only involvement in it at all was to expedite the process.

As I've told you, I have complete confidence in the Attorney General's judgment. I think he will recommend to me someone who will make me and him proud and particularly since there's been such a large focusing of attention on the case the last few weeks. And why the publicity has accrued to that case, I'm not sure. But I want to make sure now that when this selection is made, it will be a superb person. And I hope and expect that it will be a man who's at least qualified, perhaps better qualified, than Mr. Marston, or perhaps a woman.

SMOKING

Q. Your Secretary of HEW wants to spend $23 million to persuade Americans to stop smoking, while there are people on your staff, Mr. President, who smoke in public like chimneys. Could you explain this apparent contradiction? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I don't see the contradiction there. I can't deny that the Secretary of HEW, who's responsible for the Nation's health, points out, as have his predecessors for 15 or 20 years, that smoking is a danger to health. The U.S. Surgeon General, as you know, years ago confirmed this in tests. Now, I happen to think that that's his responsibility. And it's not his responsibility to tell a particular American citizen whether they can or cannot smoke.

Q. I understand, sir. But would you ask your White House staff to set a national example? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. No, sir.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. When you were in Egypt meeting with President Sadat, President Sadat emerged from that meeting saying that your views and his on the Middle East were essentially identical. Does that mean that you think the Israelis should withdraw from all 20 settlements they have in the Sinai plus their West Bank settlements before there can be peace in the Middle East?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it's not for me to decide the specifics of an ultimate settlement, either between Israel and Egypt, or Israel and Jordan, or Israel and the other nations involved or the Palestinians.

I think that it's accurate that President Sadat and I see the Middle East question almost identically. I've not been involved and don't intend to get involved in the military settlement that's now being negotiated in Cairo. The position of our Government is now and has been that Israeli settlements on occupied territory are illegal and that they contravene the Geneva conference decisions that were made.

The U.N. Resolution 242 is the basis for the ultimate decision. All the nations involved have espoused 242, and 338 later on, which set up the Geneva conference with ourselves and the Soviets as chairmen. We have in that language that says

Israel will withdraw from occupied territories.

Combined with that requirement, though, is that Israel will have secure borders, including a realization of security from the attitude of her neighbors. So, this is an extremely complicated subject, as you well know. I can't say that on every specific instance that President Sadat and I will agree on details. We didn't discuss those details.

And I think that it's best for us just to add our good offices when we can, support both men as they go to the negotiating table. Secretary Vance will be in Jerusalem with the foreign ministers of the two countries involved, and our position on the settlements has not changed.

FRANK CORMIER [Associated Press]. Thank you, Mr. President.

Multi-Year Budget Planning

Memorandum From the President.
January 12, 1978

Memorandum for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies

Subject: Multi-Year Budget Planning

The demanding task of preparing the Federal Budget for fiscal year 1979 is almost complete. Your cooperation in this task has been very gratifying.

During the process of preparing the 1979 Budget, I was reminded—as I am sure you were—that it has become very difficult for either the Congress or the President to plan budgets effectively just one year in advance. Accordingly, I am asking that your Fiscal 1980 Budget requests be prepared as part of a three-year budget plan. Work on these should commence immediately after the FY 1979 budget is transmitted.

The Office of Management and Budget will give you the 1979 allowances and the planning base estimates for fiscal years 1980, 1981, and 1982. These will be based on your projections for the FY 1979 budget. Then, in the spring, I will review major FY 1980 budget issues that might significantly alter the three-year planning base estimate. Afterwards the Office of Management and Budget will give you detailed guidance (and if necessary, revised planning base estimates) as you undertake the preparation of your fall budget request.

I realize that some issues will occasionally arise during the year which I will not have had a chance to consider in these comprehensive spring and fall budget reviews. When this happens I want an analysis of long-term budget costs to be included among the briefing papers I receive.

Multi-year budget planning should help make our government work better. I know you will do everything possible to see that the transition is smooth.

JIMMY CARTER

Lee Metcalf

Statement on the Death of the Senator From Montana. January 12, 1978

The death of Senator Lee Metcalf stills a voice that had long spoken up for preserving the great wilderness areas of this country. He came from the land of the Big Sky, of wide plains and rugged mountains, where a traveler can go for miles without meeting another person. He was a friend of working people and family farmers and an early sponsor of legislation for clean water, Federal aid to education, and reclamation of strip-mined land. He was beginning his 18th year in the Senate, after 8 years in the House and 6 years as a Montana supreme court justice. During his nearly 25 years on Capitol Hill, he had become a guardian of the public interest in dealing with the utilities and an advocate of congressional reform and budgetary control.

His loss will be deeply felt.

United States-Soviet Standing Consultative Commission

Nomination of Robert W. Buchheim for the Rank of Ambassador While Serving as U.S. Commissioner. January 13, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Robert W. Buchheim, of Washington, D.C., for the rank of Ambassador while serving as the U.S. Commissioner on the United States-Soviet Standing Consultative Commission (SCC).

Buchheim was born January 22, 1925, in Highland, Ill. He received a B.E. in 1946, an M.E. in 1948, and a Ph.D. in 1953 from Yale University.

From 1954 to 1963, Buchheim was a department head at the RAND Corporation, and from 1964 to 1967, he was on the Research Council at the RAND Corporation. In 1963 and 1964, he was chief scientist for the U.S. Air Force.

In 1967 and 1968, Buchheim was executive director of research and engineering at North American Rockwell Corp. In 1968-69 he was a professor and associate provost at Vanderbilt University. From 1969 to 1971, he was executive vice president and president of Southwestern Research Corp. in Phoenix, and from 1971 to 1973, he was a consultant.

Buchheim was Deputy Assistant Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency from 1973 to 1977. Since August 1977, he has been Acting U.S. Commissioner on the SCC.

United Nations

Appointment of Mathea Falco as U.S. Representative on the Commission on Narcotic Drugs of the Economic and Social Council. January 13, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Mathea Falco, of Washington, D.C., as the U.S. Representative on the Commission on Narcotic Drugs of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

Falco, 33, is senior adviser to the Secretary of State and Coordinator for International Narcotics Matters at the State Department. From 1974 to 1977, she was Special Assistant to the President for the Drug Abuse Council.

Anniversary of the Birth of Martin Luther King, Jr.

Letter to Coretta Scott King. December 28, 1977

To Coretta Scott King

Not yet half a century has passed since your husband's birth, and he has already been gone from us for almost a decade. This anniversary reminds us forcefully of what one life can mean and of what can be done in a relatively short time to remove the obstacles that have blocked the progress of human beings for generations.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., left us guideposts: his dedication to breaking down the barriers that separated people and his vision of a world where a person's only limitations would be the individual's own will and ability to learn and use opportunities.

The non-violence he practiced requires a spiritual, intellectual and even physical commitment—a willingness to risk everything on the principle that you can love your enemies into submission to a higher good. He became the worldwide symbol of the power of that principle and the cost of that commitment.

We must renew our own commitment, must again tap that great power and use it to solve the problems that still face those he always championed, the poor and the oppressed. He taught us that whatever stands in the way of meeting needs can be overcome—even the inertia of the comfortable.

I join you in honoring him and the cause of brotherhood he served.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

[Mrs. Coretta Scott King, The Martin Luther King, Jr. Center for Social Change, 671 Beckwith Street, S.W., Atlanta, Georgia 30314]

NOTE: The letter was announced by the White House on January 13.

Federal Reserve System

Exchange of Letters on the Resignation of Arthur F. Burns as a Member of the Board of Governors. January 13, 1978

January 13, 1978

Dear Chairman Burns:

It is with sincere regret and a deep sense of personal loss that I accept your decision to resign as a member of the Federal Reserve Board.

We have worked together closely over the past year, and my respect for your sound judgment and integrity has grown steadily. Your advice and counsel have been of enormous value to me in dealing with the difficult decisions I had to make during my first year as President.

Your leadership of the Federal Reserve over the past eight years occurred at a time when our nation, and others around the world, were forced to grapple with economic problems of extraordinary complexity. Our country has been fortunate to have a person of your experience and knowledge at the helm of the central bank during this difficult period.

Because of your impeccable honesty, your wisdom, and your frank and courageous presentation of your professional opinions, citizens in every walk of life have come to know and respect you during your long period of public service. In expressing my own profound thanks to you, I am conveying the sentiments of a grateful nation.

I will miss very much the frequent personal contact that we have had over the past year, and I trust that in the future your services will still be available to me and to the nation.

Sincerely yours,

JIMMY CARTER

[The Honorable Arthur F. Burns, Chairman of the Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System, Washington, D.C. 20551]

January 12, 1978

Dear Mr. President:

I have given careful thought to the question of continuing to serve as a member of the Federal Reserve Board and have decided not to do so. This decision is based on my conviction that Mr. Miller deserves the fullest opportunity to establish his leadership at the helm of our Nation's central bank. The continued presence of a former Chairman could, in my judgment, be a complicating distraction.

I am mindful, of course, of the desirability of easing the transition at the Board and also of affording you time to name a new Board Member. With these and also personal considerations in mind, I propose March 31, 1978—or any earlier convenient time—as the effective date of resignation.

I take leave of my present office with deep gratitude for the opportunity I have had to serve under you and five of your predecessors. America is a blessed country and it has been good to its people. Adopted citizens, such as myself, perhaps know this even more keenly than do the native born. That is why their love of this land of freedom and opportunity is so often all-consuming. I need hardly add that you can count on me if I can ever be of significant help in your efforts on our country's behalf.

With every good wish to you,

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR F. BURNS

United States-Japan Trade Agreement

White House Statement. January 13, 1978

The President is pleased by the agreement reached between Ambassadors Strauss and Ushiba on behalf of the U.S. and Japanese Governments regarding trade and other economic issues of common concern. The President believes that the agreed measures constitute a promising development in the two countries' efforts to strengthen economic relations; he is gratified at the provision for followup meetings to discuss both implementation of this agreement and further progress.

This agreement should strengthen the bonds of friendship between the two countries, underlining their will and ability to cooperate with each other and with other nations in devising common actions to meet common problems. The President is gratified at the role played by Prime Minister Fukuda in helping to bring about this outcome. He looks forward to working in concert with the Prime Minister in regard to continuing efforts to promote a healthy world economy.

Interview With the President

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session With a Group of Editors and News Directors. January 13, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Well, first of all, I want to welcome you all here and let you know that it's very good for me to have a chance to meet on these fairly frequent occasions with editors and other news leaders from around the Nation. I'll outline just a few things that are going on right now that might be of interest to you and spend what time we have available answering your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

We've now concluded a very good agreement with the South Koreans and with Tongsun Park and his lawyer for a very thorough discussion with him on the record, without any constraints, even with lie detector confirmation of his veracity, and without any prohibition against future interrogations by the congressional committees, which I think is very satisfactory.

This has been an unpleasant inter-relationship between ourselves and the South Korean Government because of the sensitivity of this issue. But I've always kept in mind how important our good relations with the South Korean people is to us and to them and even to all the people of Northeast Asia.

We've had a defense pact with the South Koreans ever since 1954. We intend to honor all the elements of that defense treaty. We are committed to the security of South Korea. We'd like to have the differences between them and North Korea resolved in a friendly and mutually constructive fashion.

We support direct negotiations between the North and South Koreans. We will participate with them and other interested parties if necessary. We've been invited by the North Koreans, indirectly at least, to meet with them without the South Koreans being present. We are not willing to do that.

We enjoyed last year about a $5½ billion trade with South Korea, about a billion dollars of which was for agricultural products. So, I wanted to mention this because quite often, in the excitement of discussing the unpleasant Tongsun Park experience, we lose sight of the fact that South Korea is a strong ally of ours.

We are concerned about the human rights issue in South Korea, and we're doing everything we can to impress upon the leaders in South Korea that this is a problem for us and creates a bad impression among our own people.

We have, additionally in foreign affairs, the prospective meeting in Jerusalem on the 15th between the foreign ministers of Egypt and Israel. I'll be consulting with Cy Vance tomorrow before he goes to join those discussions. He's just now returning from a speaking trip around the country to talk about the Panama Canal treaties.

I stay in close touch, as you can well imagine, with Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat and other leaders. I communicate with some of them several times a week through diplomatic dispatch and personal letters, which are delivered very quickly between us.

We put a great deal of importance into these discussions in Jerusalem. I think if the peace process that Sadat has initiated should break down, it would be a very serious blow to world peace. And we're determined to add our good offices whenever we can.

In the upcoming Congress—to change the subject again—we'll be considering quite early the Panama Canal treaties, probably second only in urgency, as far as time goes, to the energy legislation itself. We hope that we can get both these major matters out of the way fairly early, so that we can address the more routine subjects that are important to us all.

I'll be presenting the budget to the Congress later this month. I'll make a State of the Union speech the 19th. I hope to get up to Camp David this weekend to do some final work on the State of the Union draft, on which we've been working for several weeks now.

I think it's important that we continue to put strong emphasis on the economy. As you know, we've had a fairly good year in 1977 as judged by the cold statistics. We saw the unemployment rate drop a little more than 1½ percent; corporate profits were up about 11½ percent.

We had an increase in the gross national product, between 5 and 6 percent. In the last 6 months, we had the inflation rate down around 4 percent, although we still have about a 6-percent underlying inflation rate. And we want to keep this going.

The prospects are for fairly good economic indicators to show up the first two quarters of 1978, and then, because of worldwide problems, it's likely to taper off unless we do something. So, I do intend to advocate to the Congress a substantial tax cut for American citizens and businesses for this coming year, to begin or to be effective the 1st of October.

I think it's a well-balanced budget. We used zero-based budgeting techniques in every department, every agency. It worked out well for us. I think it will get even better in subsequent years because of experience with it. We are concerned about some of the pockets of unemployment, particularly among young minority groups—in fact, young people of all races. But we'll be emphasizing this during this coming year.

I'm consulting with both congressional leaders and business, labor leaders, trying to get as much harmony as possible within our democratic institutions—democratic with a small “d.” And we have, I think, a need to recognize what a strong, viable, productive, progressive, great country we have.

Quite often we tend to emphasize overly, I believe, the disharmonies and the debates and the contentious, transient issues, because that's where the news lies. But I think pervading all the consciousness of America, and also the consciousness of the outside world as they look at us, is the realization of our strength. And this, of course, relates directly to our system of government and our system of free enterprise and the confidence that the people have in our institutions, government and otherwise.

I've enjoyed being President this first year, almost a year now, and look forward to the next one. I think I've learned a lot. We've got along well with the Congress, and for our first year of the term, I think we've done a good job in keeping the promises that I made.

A lot of people say, “Well, you promised this, and you've been in office a whole year now and haven't done it.” And I think it's obvious that many of the things are so longstanding and so difficult that you can't possibly expect miraculous and instant results. But I'm pleased with what we've attempted and especially pleased at the cooperation the Congress has given to me.

I'd be glad to answer any questions that you have now in the limited time we have available.

QUESTIONS

GOVERNMENT REFORM

Q. Mr. President, as a candidate for the Presidency, one of your great assets was the fact that you weren't a member of the Washington establishment and, therefore, gave your supporters the hope that you could raise the level of our Government above the morass of bureaucratic redtape and cynicism.

Mr. President, after a year in office, what are the possibilities of you or any new President improving our form of government and getting it above this business of “government of the people for the bureaucrat and by the bureaucrat”?

THE PRESIDENT. I think one of the most frequent criticisms that has been made of me and my own administration is not becoming a part of the Washington establishment. [Laughter] If you read the local news media, you see that that's one of the things that we haven't been assimilated into—the social structure and so forth of Washington.

We've made some, I think, good improvements in the organizational structure of Government. We formed a new Department of Energy. We've eliminated now, I think, about 400 agencies and commissions, advisory boards, and so forth, that were unnecessary. We've gotten authorization from the Congress for a much more substantive reorganization effort to be concluded within a 3-year period.

As I said earlier, we've initiated zero-based budgeting. We've begun to cut back on paperwork. We're eliminating unnecessary regulations and constraints on the free enterprise system and also on private citizens. We've made substantial progress with OSHA, for instance, which is one of the most highly criticized Federal programs.

I think that we have brought some constructive ideas to Washington, derived from our long campaigning around the Nation and also from my own experiences as President.

We've got a superb Cabinet. There's not a single member of the Cabinet that sits around this table every Monday morning that I would want to change. I'm proud of every one of them. They're individualistic. They run their own departments without interference from me. They consult with me and the other Cabinet officers on basic policy. There's a harmony among them that's almost unprecedented, and the harmony exists, too, among people within the White House staff and between the White House staff and the Cabinet. Some of these things are quite different than they have been in the past.

When we deal with the Soviets on SALT or a comprehensive test ban, or when we deal with the Middle East question, I don't have to worry about contentiousness or jealousy or lack of communication or an incompatibility between the national security adviser, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of Treasury, and others.

This has not always been the case. We've still got a lot of faults, of course, but I think in these ways, we've improved the situation in Washington. That's a completely objective and unbiased opinion. [Laughter]

SECOND TERM IN OFFICE

Q. Mr. President, Marx Gibson from Joliet, Illinois. You said you've enjoyed the first year in the White House. When will you decide if you're going to try for a second term, and are you aware of Governor Thompson from Illinois' interests in replacing you here?

THE PRESIDENT. The answer to your first question is I don't know, and the answer to the second question is no. [Laughter]

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, I gather there's some concern at the State Department over the course of Middle East negotiations, specifically a feeling that President Sadat's initiative has not really been matched so far by Israel and specifically a feeling that Israeli action over the settlements has not been helpful.

Do you feel that the Israeli response so far has been satisfactory, or do you simply feel that it would be impolitic for you to exert the influence that, I guess, some people at the State Department are urging you to do?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know of any urging that has originated in the State Department to which I have not responded to their satisfaction. Cy Vance and I, you know, are constantly working together, along with the Vice President and Dr. Brzezinski and all of the staff that work under all of us, to make sure that our approach to the Middle East is carefully considered.

We have a limited role to play. We are there to be constructive and to respond to their requests and to be active when there's a dormant situation in the Middle East; to be much more reticent when we think progress is being made without us.

It was an unpleasant thing for me for 9 months or more to be the intermediary between nations who wouldn't even speak to each other, who wouldn't communicate directly with each other almost with a religious fervor. And now, to see Sadat and Begin and their representatives negotiating directly is a very major step forward and a very gratifying thing for me to observe.

I think Sadat's initiative has been bold and courageous. I think it's too early to say whether or not the Israeli response is adequate. That's for Sadat to judge. The major bone of contention right now, of course, is the highly publicized Israeli position on settlements, which we have always considered to be illegal.

And I just can't imagine Prime Minister Begin and the Israeli Government having the basic peace negotiations broken down because of an argument about settlements. It may very well be that in the West Bank or the Sinai that there could be some mutual agreements between Jordan, Egypt, Israel, that some of those Israeli settlers could stay on there. But that would be tied in very intimately with whether or not United Nations forces were the peacekeeping forces or whether the responsibility was Jordan's or the Palestinians' or Egypt's.

I think the details of those things are matters that I ought not to address publicly. I do discuss them without constraint with both Begin and Sadat, and we are very forceful in letting Prime Minister Begin and the Arab leaders know when we disagree with their position.

I've been very careful to do one thing, and that is that whenever we have an American position to put forward as a compromise or as a basis for discussions earlier this year, to put it in writing and show exactly the same document to Sadat, to Hussein, to Begin, and also to Asad, just so there's no doubt about where we stand and what we are proposing. And then, if Begin disagrees with item number four, we tell Sadat—with Begin's permission, of course—this is something that Begin disagrees with, and seek his response. That was a tedious and, I say, unpleasant responsibility. But now we are there to cooperate with them.

The last thing I want to say is that our effectiveness in a time of stalemate or dispute is exactly compatible or commensurate with the trust that they have in me. If I should ever do anything to make either the Prime Minister or President Sadat or King Hussein or Asad feel that we weren't acting in good faith, that I was lying to them or misleading them or shading the truth, our effectiveness would be completely destroyed.

I don't think we've ever done that yet. It means, sometimes, that our Nation is taking the blame from both sides when we put forward a position that was not instantly acceptable. But I'm pleased with the progress made so far.

NUCLEAR POWER

Q. Mr. President, I'm Dick Smyser from Oak Ridge, Tennessee. Mr. Brzezinski told us this morning that you are a man who chooses his words very carefully. It seems to us in Oak Ridge, either rightfully or wrongfully, that when you talk about energy you either consciously don't mention nuclear power or mention it only in negative terms. And it seems to us that this has something to do with the public perception of nuclear power.

In the light of recent concern for CO<sub>2</sub> and what you said yesterday about oil imports, do you still think that nuclear power is kind of a last resort, a necessary evil?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, you know, when I say "last resort," a phrase that I used throughout the campaign and have used as President, too, it doesn't mean that it's a necessary evil. My own position is that we ought to have conservation of energy as a first priority—in fact, if I have to put them in an order, to cut down on the waste of all kinds of energy.

Secondly, we ought to try to use as much as possible of our oil and gas in this country, rather than importing very expensive oil and gas, which causes us to have balance of payments problems. We ought to shift to other forms of energy. Coal would be one. I would say I would rather shift to solar than coal. But there's a legitimate place for nuclear power in our country.

My background is in nuclear power production, as you know. In the early stages of the development, before there was a nuclear powerplant in existence in the world, I worked in this program. And I was active early this past December in a highly publicized ceremony to put into operation and to connect with the power grid of our country the first thorium breeder reactor.

But I think we ought to have a realization that nuclear power should fill in the gap between those other sources of energy and what our Nation's total needs are.

We've just approved an agreement with the Iranians where that country, very rich in oil, can purchase atomic reactors from our own Nation, which I think will bring in a lot of job opportunities for Americans.

The major dispute has been on whether or not we should go forward immediately with the Clinch River liquid metal fast breeder reactor. I don't think we should. I don't think it's time. I don't think we need it yet. I think if it were built as presently designed, it would be outdated by the time it was completed. It's extraordinarily expensive.

But we still have allocated, with my complete support and approval, almost a billion dollars for research and development in the breeder reactor field. And I think this has been the major item that has been highly publicized that has caused concern in Tennessee.

So, I'd say that within that framework, there's a legitimate role for atomic power to play. If there are constraints in the future on light water reactors, it won't be because of obstacles placed in their way by the Government. It will be other problems that might prevent their being widely used in this country, economic problems, primarily.

Q. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes?

Q. Ladies before gentlemen.

THE PRESIDENT. Go ahead.

TOBACCO PRICE SUPPORTS

Q. I am Linette Burton from the Wilton, Connecticut, Bulletin. I happen, by pure chance, to be sitting in the seat that really belongs to Mr. Califano, which made me think that isn't it odd that while the United States Government continues its price support of the tobacco industry, Mr. Califano has come out so strongly against smoking?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think it's odd. As you know, Connecticut produces a lot of tobacco, and so does Georgia. [Laughter]

Q. That's not why I asked. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. No, I think that this is not particularly odd. The price support program is designed to provide stability in the agricultural community. Tobacco is produced in this country. It has been produced in this country for more than 300 years, and I imagine it will be produced in this country years and years in the future. It's a major export item.

The people of our Nation decide to use it. I've never smoked a cigarette in my life, as a matter of fact. I just don't have any urge to. My father did smoke four or five packs a day, and he died with cancer, perhaps because of cigarette smoking.

But I think to stabilize the production of an agricultural product like tobacco, which is accepted, which is legal, is a responsibility of Government, and it's one that I approve.

On the other hand, Joe Califano is responsible for the Nation's health. And the Surgeon General, years ago—I'd say 15 or 20 years ago—and all HEW Secretaries since then, have supported a highly publicized campaign to reduce the consumption of tobacco, certainly cigarette smoking, which is the most potentially harmful. The same thing applies to the State Department, who are constantly searching for peace at the same time the Defense Department, you know, prepares military strength to try to make sure we have peace.

And we have a real need to understand that the two are not necessarily incompatible. We are not trying to encourage cigarette smoking by providing a stability in agricultural production of tobacco. As a matter of fact, the relatively small subsidies that the Government pays—it's not an expensive program—actually increase the cost of tobacco to some degree, perhaps, and make the price of cigarettes higher.

The HEW Secretary has advocated an increase in taxes on cigarettes and a more severe warning on the packages. But I think there is, you know, no real conflict, although on the surface there seems to be.

U.S. RELATIONS WITH ASIA

Q. Mr. President, I'm Larry Giesting from Rushville, Indiana. During the past year you were to Europe twice to reassure our allies there of our continuing support. Are you planning to meet with our Asian allies either here or some other spot?

THE PRESIDENT. Asian?

Q. Asian.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've had come to meet with me this past year the prime ministers or other leaders of New Zealand, Australia, Japan, Malaysia, Singapore, and so forth. I have met with them already. I don't have scheduled a trip to Asia. It might very well be that the Vice President would go to Asia later on this year. He's going to make a trip very soon to Canada and to Mexico. But there's a possibility that he would go to visit those countries personally.

As a matter of fact, last year, my staff figured out that I had met personally with the leaders of 68 nations—that's the top leader. I don't think any President has met with that many before. I think President Kennedy met with 44.

I won't meet with nearly so many leaders this year. Many of them wanted to come to see me because I was so unknown. I didn't have a voting record in Washington. They didn't know what to anticipate, so there was a heavy pressure on us to invite them and we responded to that.

But this doesn't mean that we ignore the problems in Asia. I was in Japan the year before last, in May, and Prime Minister Fukuda is very likely to come here before the summer to see me again. I met with him personally in London last May.

I started out this session emphasizing the importance to us of strong ties to South Korea, which is kind of a linchpin, militarily speaking, for the Northeast Asian part of the country. My son was just out in the Southwest Pacific this past week. We added as commonwealths the American Samoa and the Northern Mariana Islands. It's the first territory that our country absorbed since 1914. And I couldn't go personally, but my family went out to let them know we care about them.

So, I don't think by any stretch of the imagination we have ignored Asia's importance.

VIEWS ON THE PRESIDENCY

Q. Mr. President, this is the time for New Year's resolutions, and you've been President for a year. Do you have any New Year's resolutions as to how your administration can do its job better in the second year than it did in the first year? I'm more concerned with how, rather than what.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we've obviously learned. I had never been to Washington in any official capacity until I became President.

I had come here to represent Georgia as Governor. I had been through here when I was an ensign, lieutenant jg. in the Navy. But Washington was new to me when I came. And quite often when I meet with congressional leaders, I ask them to remember how they felt the first time they came to Washington and how other people helped them. Well, I've had good help this past year.

We've learned a lot. As I said in the TV interview just before I went on the trip, my most serious problem, I think, was inadvertently building up expectations that were too high this past year. Without any criticism of the Congress, I underestimated the time it takes for Congress to act on major, controversial bills.

I thought we'd have a good start on tax reform. I won't present it until a week or so from now. I thought we'd have an energy package complete. I thought we'd have welfare well on the way—the committees are holding hearings now. But we've had good accomplishments. I think this next year, this year that we're in now, we'll have a much more carefully planned agenda for the Congress.

We are consulting much more intimately now with the congressional leaders and their staffs before we send to the Hill a specific bill of any importance. I think the Members of Congress have gotten to know me better. I think I'll be much more reticent to set specific deadline dates for ourselves to meet when I don't have control over the meeting of that target date.

I'm going to reduce substantially the number of issues in which I'm personally involved before the public and let the Cabinet officers do more of that, which I think will be better. It'll give me much more of an ability to focus on the things where the President's personal involvement is necessary.

I think as far as foreign issues are concerned, I've weathered the year of just becoming acquainted with foreign leaders. I think I'll be able now to meet with and negotiate with leaders in a much more discriminatory way, just where my presence, again, is necessary.

As far as family life and my physical well-being, it wouldn't be possible to improve that this year. It's been very, very good this past year. I feel at ease with the job.

So, I think, primarily restricting my own personal involvement in a multiplicity of issues simultaneously and working more intimately and closely with the Congress, consulting with them better, understanding the congressional processes and giving more responsibility in a public way to my Cabinet officers—those are some of the things offhand that come to mind.

Yes? Let me get my old friend from southeast Georgia.

URBAN POLICIES

Q. Talk about the problems with the suburbs and the major cities. It's not just a Georgia problem, I understand.

THE PRESIDENT. That's right. We'll have an urban package to put forward in March. Of course, the thing to remember is that almost every program that we put to the Congress or every budget item on the domestic scene is oriented primarily to the urban areas, because that's where your major concentrations of unemployment and the major problems are. Even many of the aspects of the agriculture bill, you know, relate to urban dwellers.

Food stamp reform, which was accomplished last year, is one example. We'll have a substantial increase in the allotment of funds for housing, for urban development, for education, for transportation, for providing jobs for those who are currently unemployed. And I think we've brought back a great deal of the balance that ought to exist between the downtown, sometimes deteriorating urban centers on the one hand, and the suburban areas on the other.

We are trying to rebuild both the interest at the local community level and also the Federal Government involvement in the downtown urban areas which, I think, had been to some degree neglected. Quite often the Congress would design a program in the past for the more rapidly deteriorating, more needy parts of the country, but because of the better organization, higher level of education and public awareness, higher degree of political influence, the suburbs, completely legally, would get most of the benefits of those programs. We are trying to provide a better balance now.

Q. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Good to see you up here.

FRIENDSHIP FORCE

Q. Mr. President, thank you for recognizing me. I don't think my family would have let me come home if I had not mentioned this to you today.

My oldest daughter has just returned—or shortly returned from Caracas, Venezuela, having participated in one of your people-to-people programs.

THE PRESIDENT. Oh, great.

Q. She wanted me to report to you that her trip, at least, was a tremendous success. This does seem like a pretty effective way to improve relations between nations on a people-to-people basis and a relatively inexpensive one. Do you have plans to expand this program—

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. —to make it available to more Americans?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I wish all of you would mention this when you get back home in your own way. [Laughter]

My wife initiated this program. It's called the Friendship Force. We started it when I was Governor of Georgia. Every year we would send a planeload of people down to Brazil, and we'd bring the same plane back to Georgia full of Brazilians. And each group would stay about 10 days—never stayed in a motel or hotel; they stayed in private homes. The expenses are very, very low, like $250 for the round trip, which is the only expense. The only thing you had to do was to pay your way down and back, that very modest amount, and get one of your neighbors to take a Brazilian in the home.

Since then, my own family—this has nothing to do with government, it's all outside the government—since then, my mother's been to Ireland on a trip. This one actually originated in Des Moines, Iowa. And Mother just went out and joined them to fly over to Ireland and spent 10 days and came back. My mother-in-law and my brother-in-law went to England, to Newcastle, England. This trip to Caracas, I think, originated in Tennessee, did it not?

Q. Yes, sir; in Nashville.

THE PRESIDENT. And my second son, Chip, and his wife will go from Connecticut this coming week, I think, to Tel Aviv, to Israel, and stay over there. I think there will be 420 people on a 747 going from Connecticut to Israel. And that same plane will bring 425 Israelis over here to stay in the Connecticut area. It's one of the finest programs I've ever seen. It really generates a genuine interest in each other's countries.

And we'd like for that to happen all over the Nation. If you have an interest in it, you could write my wife. And I think if you could stir up a planeload of people, you would find that your problem would be trying to keep the crowd down, rather than to recruit people. It's a wonderful, nongovernmental program that I think is worthy of legitimate pride. I'm glad you brought it up.

U.S. FORCES IN EUROPE

Q. Mr. President, Steve Frady from Carson City, Nevada. Do you intend to use the troops leaving South Korea to meet the pledge you made to the NATO nations?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. Those troops will probably come back to our country to a staging area. We will increase in the NATO area our troop placement, in this 18-month period, about 8,000. We now have about 210,000, roughly, soldiers in Europe and roughly 300,000 in all, including the Air Force and the Navy, plus another 50,000, approximately, in ships around the European theater.

But we are trying, also, at the same time, to make a more efficient use of our money. We'll reduce substantially the projected defense expenditures below what President Ford had projected for 1979. But at the same time, we'll have a real growth above the inflation rate of about 3 percent in outlays or expenditures this coming fiscal year. We are trying to cut down waste, and we're trying to orient our forces where they're most needed.

We also are preparing—by stockpiling materiel in the European theater and by having a much more mobile military capability—we are trying to reduce substantially the amount of time it would take to shift continent-based, United States-based mobile units over into Europe if it became necessary. Of course, what we are doing this for is not to create a war but to provide an open, sure demonstration to the Warsaw Pact nations that we are capable of defending Europe, along with our European allies.

So, when we do bring the troops back from Korea, they won't be disbanded. They'll be used on this continent as a reserve force that can be used in Europe expeditiously, if necessary.

Let me just take one more question.

Q. Mr. President, you may be sorry.

THE PRESIDENT. That's all right.

Q. This is going to be a Marston question. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Go ahead.

U.S. ATTORNEY DAVID MARSTON

Q. It seems to have become, from a local political squabble, it has escalated into a national test of the political climate of this administration. I wonder if any thought had been given to the heavy burden that whatever Democratic appointee would carry going in there, having to produce indictments, whether they're called for or not, simply to prove that he did his job?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it may or may not be a Democrat. I don't think that's been decided. I'm repeating substantially what the Attorney General has said. I never heard of Mr. Marston until just recently.

We have literally dozens of these appointments all over the Nation. And the Attorney General generally works out the decision whether to replace the incumbent and, if so, you know, whom to choose as a replacement.

He decided, apparently last March, that Mr. Marston ought to be replaced. I don't think it's a responsibility of the President to outline to the public the reasons that the Attorney General did not think Mr. Marston ought to stay there. I have no inclination to criticize him or any other person that is being replaced.

Because there were ongoing investigations, the Attorney General decided not to make the change immediately. The Pennsylvania congressional delegation—I think, to be honest, the Democrats there—finally came to me because of the delay. Once a decision was made, they thought in order to get rid of a very serious political dispute that kept going on, that the Attorney General ought to name his successor.

At that time, I still didn't know who Mr. Marston was, but I relayed the congressional concerns to the Attorney General. He replied to me that he had long ago decided to replace Mr. Marston and that he was determined to make that replacement on the basis of merit only and requested that the Democratic Members of Congress not become involved in trying to help choose a successor, to let him do it on strictly a basis of merit. And I said that's what I would like to do.

The congressional Members assured me that although some of them in the past had recommended persons to take that job, that they would withdraw from that process and let the Attorney General do it, because of the controversy, apparently, that was surrounding this case in Philadelphia, that they would just get out of it and let the Attorney General make it.

I don't have any doubt that the Attorney General will make an excellent selection. I think he would have without the publicity. Now, it's incumbent on him to make sure that when the choice is made and the announcement is made—I make the final approval—that there's a sigh of relief and a general consensus, assessment, that this replacement for Mr. Marston is indeed highly qualified.

We're not ignorant about who—among what group the choice will be made. The Attorney General has been checking with the top members of the bar, the judges in that area, and so forth, to make sure that the people that he is now considering are all highly qualified.

It's a slow, tedious process. After he decides whom he wants—and he has not yet told me whom he will recommend—but after he decides then the FBI has to do a long, tedious check to make sure that there's nothing in the person's background that might cause embarrassment.

We're going through the same process on a number of other appointments. The FBI Director is one of the most important. I've just done the same thing, as you know, to choose a Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. It's one of the time-consuming responsibilities that I have.

But I'm positive that there will be no distortion of the attitude or commitment to prosecute, or to decide whether or not to prosecute, by the replacement for Mr. Marston. There are about 40 attorneys in that office in addition to Mr. Marston, I understand. And they will continue any investigation that's underway.

I did not know until yesterday that any Member of Congress was being investigated by Mr. Marston. It's just one of those things that was of high interest in Philadelphia that had not come to my attention until I encountered it yesterday, you know, with the press conference.

Q. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. But I think you can be assured that it will be a good appointment. And I think, without derogating Mr. Marston at all—which I don't have the inclination to do—I hope and expect that it will be well received in Philadelphia.

Let me thank you again. I've had a chance to meet with editorial groups like yourselves, I think, every 2 weeks since I've been here. It's a kind of an unprecedented thing, but it helps me more than it does you, just to learn what your interests are particularly from around the Nation.

The White House press corps is a highly professional group, I guess among the best newsmen in the world. But they, like I do, live right here in Washington. And I get a much more widely ranging series of questions from you than I do from them. And I thank you for being willing to come to Washington to meet with us. I know you've met with several of the people on the White House staff this morning, including Dr. Brzezinski. I'm sure you got a good response from them as well.

NOTE: The interview began at 2:30 p.m. in the Cabinet Room at the White House.

The transcript of the interview was released on January 14.

Hubert H. Humphrey

Statement on the Death of the Senator From Minnesota. January 14, 1978

From time to time, our Nation is blessed by the presence of men and women who bear the mark of greatness, who help us see a better vision of what we can become. Hubert Humphrey was such a man.

For 30 years, his voice was heard from one end of this country to the other—most often in defense of the oppressed, the hungry, the victims of poverty and discrimination. All of us will miss that voice.

It was as familiar to Americans as the voice of a member of the family. And, in a sense, Hubert Humphrey was a member of every family in America.

Hubert Humphrey was a fundamentally happy man—a man who really did love his fellow human beings. In victory and in defeat, he set an example of generosity, sincerity, and hope.

The only thing more courageous than the way in which he led his life was the manner in which he left it.

In our laws and institutions, his memorials will endure. The most lasting of them will be in our hearts.

Rosalynn and I extend our deepest sympathy to Muriel Humphrey and her family.

Hubert H. Humphrey

Remarks at Memorial Services at the Capitol. January 15, 1978

At critical times in our history, the United States has been blessed by great people who, just by being themselves, give us a vision of what we are at our best and of what we might become. Hubert Humphrey was such a man.

In a time of impending social crisis, 30 years ago, his was the first voice I ever heard, a lone voice, persistently demanding basic human rights for all Americans. It was the most difficult moral and social issue that my own generation would have to face. In those early days, his was a clear voice, a strong voice, a passionate voice which recruited others to join in a battle in our own country so that equal rights of black people could be gained to vote, to hold a job, to go to school, to own a home.

I first met Hubert Humphrey when he was Vice President—torn because his heart was filled with love and a yearning for peace, while at the same time he was meticulously loyal to a President who led our Nation during an unpopular war.

I also remember him in a time of political defeat, courageously leading a divided Democratic Party, losing his uphill campaign for President by just a few votes. But he was a big man, and without bitterness he gave his support to the new President, and then came back later to the Senate to serve his Nation once again.

For the last year of his life I knew him best, and that's when I needed him most. Despite campaign disagreements and my own harsh words spoken under pressure and in haste, it was not his nature to forget how to love or to forgive.

He has given me freely what I need—the support and understanding of a close and true friend, the advice of a wise and honest counselor.

When he first visited me in the Oval Office, I felt that he should have served there. I know that he's been an inspiration and a conscience to us all, but especially to the leaders of our Nation—to Harry Truman, to Dwight Eisenhower, to John Kennedy, to Lyndon Johnson, to Richard Nixon, to Gerald Ford, and to me. We and our families are here today to testify that Hubert Humphrey may well have blessed our country more than any of us.

His greatest personal attribute was that he really knew how to love. There was nothing abstract or remote about it. He did not love humanity only in the mass. You could feel it in the scope of his concern, in his words, in the clasp of his hands, in the genuine, eager interest in his eyes as he looked at you.

He always spoke up for the weak and the hungry and for the victims of discrimination and poverty. He never lost sight of our own human possibilities. He never let us forget that in our democratic Nation we are a family, bound together by a kinship of purpose and by mutual concern and respect. He reminded us that we must always protect and nurture the other members of our national family.

Yesterday, as messages poured in to me as President and to the members of the Humphrey family from throughout the world, I realized vividly that Hubert Humphrey was the most beloved of all Americans, and that his family encompassed not just the people of the United States but of all people everywhere.

He asked, as the Vice President has said, that this service be a celebration, and in a way that's what it is. Even as we mourn his death, we celebrate because such a man as Hubert Humphrey was among us. The joy of his memory will last far longer than the pain and sorrow of his leaving.

Hubert H. Humphrey

DEATH OF HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

As a special mark of respect to the memory of the Honorable Hubert H. Humphrey, former Vice President of the United States of America and Senator from the State of Minnesota, I, Jimmy Carter, President of the United States of America do hereby proclaim, by virtue of the authority vested in me by a Joint Resolution of the Congress (36 U.S.C. 178), that the period of public tribute and appreciation shall be extended and the flag of the United States shall be flown at half-staff on all buildings, grounds, and naval vessels of the Federal government in the District of Columbia, and throughout the United States and its Territories and possessions until, and including January 19, 1978, the day the 95th Congress of the United States reconvenes.

I also direct that the flag shall be flown at half-staff for the same length of time at all United States embassies, legations, consular offices, and other facilities abroad, including all military facilities and naval vessels and stations.

May this period, as Senator Humphrey wished, "be a time to celebrate life and the future" even though we cannot escape the pain and sorrow of his leaving.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this sixteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Hubert H. Humphrey

Eulogy Delivered at Funeral Services in St. Paul, Minnesota. January 16, 1978

Not too long ago I invited Senator Humphrey to go to Camp David to spend the weekend with me. He had never been there before, and he was very effusive in his thanks, telling me over and over how great a favor I had done for him. It was the greatest favor I ever did for myself.

We spent 2 days on top of a mountain, in front of a fireplace, just talking and listening. We talked about people—common, ordinary people and great people in our country and all around the world. With some he had had very friendly and good relations. They had always supported him in his campaign and always had good things to say about him. Others had sometimes disappointed him, and he had not always had their support. But he never said a word of criticism. He tried to search in his own mind, no matter who it was, and find something good to say.

We talked about pain, about the physical pain that I could see that he was bearing. We talked about the pain of losing a political campaign. We talked about the pain of frustration when you have high hopes and great dreams and human fallibilities won't let you realize them all. But I never detected in any of his words any bitterness.

Yesterday I was honored to speak about Hubert Humphrey at the Nation's Capitol. I talked about what he had meant to our own Nation. But he knew, as I know and Vice President Mondale knows, that one of the responsibilities of those who serve in the White House is to look beyond our Nation's borders, to foreign countries. He traveled a lot, and he told me about the world leaders with whom he had met. He told me about the months during the Vietnam war when he was Vice President and how when he rode down the streets or got off the airplane or visited a college campus with his heart full of love, quite often he didn't see love in the faces of the crowds who faced him, and he didn't see love on the signs and the banners that confronted him and his President. He had a yearning for peace, and we talked about the mechanisms of peace—not always a popular subject for a political figure in a nation as proud of its military strength and its great influence. But in kind of a quiet and unpublicized way, because of what was in him, he was the expression of the good and decent and peaceful attributes of our great, strong, powerful Nation.

He was always dedicated to breaking the logjams in the cold war. He expressed a deep hope that we and the Soviet Union might reach agreements on difficult questions and resolve longstanding differences and get to know each other and search for a way to reduce the mad scramble for superiority in nuclear weapons.

We talked about the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, set up now to negotiate how we might reduce and perhaps eliminate atomic weapons, and I discovered almost by accident that the author of that legislation was Hubert Humphrey.

We talked about the sale of military weapons to other nations, particularly the poor nations, the developing nations, the hungry nations, who respond to the temptations of technological progress and the threats from border states and come to us, above all others, and other nations as well, to buy guns and ammunition to kill.

We are trying to change that policy, and we talked about it and the mechanism under which we are trying to reduce our own participation in the marketing of weapons. It's his legislation.

One of the most difficult questions that a President has to face, or even a Member of Congress, is foreign aid. It's not popular in our country to be for foreign aid programs. But one of the stalwart defenders of our foreign aid program, the leader in the Congress, was Hubert Humphrey. He didn't see foreign aid as a giveaway program. He didn't see foreign aid as billions of dollars going from our Nation to others. He saw human needs.

We talked about the sick people that he had seen overseas, with no medical care at all, and the unbelievable hunger that he had seen in families where the average income for a whole nation was sometimes less than 25 cents a person a day.

So, he saw foreign aid as a great investment from a rich nation, a pittance almost, compared to what we earn and have, that builds up a wellspring of friendship between us and those hungry people.

We talked about the newly developing interest in our own Government toward Africa, not more than a year or two old, but it was not new to Hubert Humphrey. He was familiar with Africa, the nations therein, the people who live there, their hopes and yearnings and frustrations and desire to be something and to have their own governments. He knew about Asia, and he knew about Indonesia, and he talked about these things, not as a lecturer, but almost as a representative of those people, not just Minnesota. He reached beyond our borders.

It was a long time after my mother went to the Peace Corps that I knew that the Peace Corps was Hubert Humphrey's idea. It was an idea that he put forward a long time ago, and it was eventually adopted and put into effect when John Kennedy was President, an opportunity for American young people to go overseas for, I think, $11 a month and get to know other people and serve them. And along with Senator McGovern, he initiated the idea of the Food for Peace program.

He and I talked about religion, about how deep his faith had grown since he became very ill. We talked about sin and how we know that everyone sins and we fall short of the glory of God, but how God forgives us.

Just a few days ago I was in India, and I was visiting the tomb—or the memorial to Mahatma Gandhi, where his body was cremated. And I didn't think about Senator Humphrey—I have to admit it—until I started to leave. And one of the Indian leaders took me over to a wall, and there on the wall there was a quote from Gandhi and the title of it was, "The Seven Sins." And when I saw that, I thought about Senator Humphrey's discussion on sin, and I jotted it down.

According to Gandhi, the seven sins are wealth without works, pleasure without conscience, knowledge without character, commerce without morality, science without humanity, worship without sacrifice, and politics without principle.

Well, Hubert Humphrey may have sinned in the eyes of God, as we all do, but according to those definitions of Gandhi's, it was Hubert Humphrey without sin.

Panama Canal Treaties

Question-and-Answer Session by Telephone With Participants in a Townhall Meeting on the Treaties in Hattiesburg, Mississippi. January 16, 1978

AUBREY LUCAS. Hello, Mr. President?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I'm right here waiting for your question, and I want to congratulate you, first of all, at the University of Southern Mississippi, and also the national Foreign Policy Association, for letting this debate take place. If you have a question for me, I'd be glad to answer it.

I've just come back from the final funeral ceremonies for Senator Humphrey.

DR. LUCAS. Yes, we appreciate your talking with us this evening.

You are probably aware that we are a group of citizens gathered here on the campus of the University of Southern Mississippi in Hattiesburg. We've had a very interesting debate, and we now have some questions that we would like to put to you. I'll ask the question. First I'll tell you who formulated the question, and then we will ask as many as you want.

Mr. David Farber asked this question. Do you feel that the Panama Government has the strength and the ability to control and to operate the canal without being intimidated by the powers of the world?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the answer is yes. Not only is General Torrijos a very popular leader in Panama, as has been observed by almost half the Members of the United States Senate who visited there, but just to make sure that he convinced us and the Panamanians and the rest of the world that it was not a transient commitment, just depending upon him and his personality or his present government, on his own initiative he submitted the question of ratifying the Panama Canal treaties to the people of Panama in a referendum. And as you know, by approximately a two-thirds vote, the people of Panama did approve the treaties.

This is obviously legally binding on Panama in accordance with international law, and in addition, it demonstrated to us that not just the government but the people themselves confirmed the treaty terms.

In addition to the treaty itself, General Torrijos described to the Panamanian people the memorandum of understanding between him and me, which spells out in very clear words the right of the United States during this century and in the next century to take whatever action we deem necessary to defend the canal and to guarantee its neutrality if it is endangered. Also, in that memorandum of understanding, which was spelled out to the Panamanian people, is a provision that in a time of emergency or need that ships of the United States have the right to go to the head of the line and also to be expedited in their passage through the Panama Canal itself.

So, all these terms were presented to the Government of Panama, to General Torrijos, their leader, and also to the people, who ratified these terms.

DR. LUCAS. May we give you another question?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. That was a good question from Mr. Farber.

DR. LUCAS. This question is from Mr. Paul Herrick, and he asks, if the canal treaties are not ratified, what political consequences do you anticipate taking place in Panama?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, for the last 14 years, under four different Presidents, we've been negotiating with Panama in good faith on both sides to outline the terms of the treaties. They have never threatened us. They've negotiated in good faith. They've never insinuated that if the treaties were rejected, that there might be some danger to the canal. We've acted as best we could as a responsible negotiator. They've done the same.

As you know, after the treaties were approved by me and General Torrijos, then they were submitted to the Panamanians in a referendum. They voted for them.

I think if the Senate should fail to ratify the treaties, if they are rejected, that General Torrijos and his government would do the best they could to prevent any sort of threat to the Panama Canal.

If there is some dissident group there, a Communist group or an irresponsible group of students or some other group of Panamanians or outside agitators who tried to attack the canal, it would be my responsibility as President to defend the canal against any such threat.

We have the military strength to do it, and I would take that action. But the Joint Chiefs of Staff have estimated that it might take 100,000 American troops to defend the canal. It's quite vulnerable to a hand grenade or to a planted explosive. And of course, what we want is the Panama Canal to be open, free for use, free of danger.

The best way to ensure that this is the case is to work in harmony with the Panamanians, to form, in effect, a partnership with them, protecting the interests of America, protecting the interests of Panama.

We have outlined the terms of the treaty very clearly so that the governing board would have five Americans, four Panamanians. Our Government would appoint all nine of those members. It would be in effect for 23 years. And obviously, during that time, the Panamanians would have adequate opportunity to learn how to operate the canal. One of the great engineering characteristics of the canal and its locks is the simplicity of operation.

So, I think that if the treaties were rejected, there might be some attempt to disrupt the canal. We could reject that. We are not operating under threat or fear or weakness. We hope to operate in cooperation and partnership with Panama. We want the canal to be open and free for international use. We want ourselves to have the right to defend it if necessary.

All these things would prevail if the Panama Canal treaties are ratified. Our interests would be protected. And instead of having the constant threat of disruption by dissident groups who acted contrary to the interests of the Panamanian Government, we would be operating as partners in cooperation to make sure the canal is open, free for our use, for Panama ships' use, and for the use of the ships from all around the world. That's what we want.

DR. LUCAS. Mr. President, we are told that we have time for one more question. This one is asked by Ricky Dyson. What assurance do we have that if we sign the treaty, Panama will not become hostile toward the United States? If this happens, can we recapture and operate the canal in a state of guerrilla warfare?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, obviously, the best way to guarantee the friendship of Panama, its government and its people, is to carry out our part of the negotiating bargain in good faith and to ratify the treaties that have been agreed between us and them.

It's obvious to me that anyone who wanted to disrupt the friendship between ourselves and Panama, between ourselves and all the Latin American countries, between ourselves and the rest of the developing world, would be very much in favor of the treaties being rejected. If we reject the treaties and go back on the negotiating principles that we've espoused for the last, as I say, 14 years, this would be a good opening for outside agitating groups, the Communists from perhaps Cuba or other countries or the few Communists that might be in Panama or in our country, to take advantage of this temporary absence of harmony and go in and create dissension.

So, the best way to ensure friendship between us and Panama and the best way to ensure the advantages of ourselves and that small country as well, the best way to keep the canal open for ourselves and the use of other ships is to go ahead and ratify the treaties that we have negotiated in good faith and which the Panamanians have already ratified and also voted for in a plebiscite. That is what we ought to do. That's what we, I believe, will do.

DR. LUCAS. Mr. President, thank you for talking with us this evening, and we would be honored to have you visit us here.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it would be a great pleasure. As you know, Mississippi has a special place in my heart. I flew back from Minneapolis just a few minutes ago with Senator Eastland, and I'll always remember the warmth with which the Mississippi people took me in during the campaign. And I'll never forget that late evening vote when I finally was elected President of the United States, and the State that put me over the top was Mississippi.

So, thanks to all my friends in Mississippi. And I believe we've got a good canal agreement negotiated, and I hope and expect that it will be ratified.

Thank you very much.

DR. LUCAS. Good night, Mr. President.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:15 p.m. from the Oval Office at the White House to the meeting in Burnett Auditorium at the University of Southern Mississippi. Aubrey Lucas is president of the university.

The meeting in Hattiesburg was one of a series of six town hall debates held around the country as part of the "Great Decisions" program of the Foreign Policy Association.

Consumer Product Safety Commission

*Nomination of Three Commissioners.
January 17, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Susan B. King and Edith B.

Sloan to be Commissioners of the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

King, 37, served as Special Assistant to the Chairman of the Federal Election Commission from 1975 to 1977. She was vice president of the Center for Public Financing of Elections from 1973 to 1975 and Washington director of the National Committee for an Effective Congress from 1967 to 1973. She is presently working toward a J.D. at Catholic University Law School in Washington.

Sloan, 39, is director of the Office of Consumer Protection of the District of Columbia. She was executive director of the National Committee on Household Employment from 1969 to 1976. She was with the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights from 1965 to 1968 and with HARYOU-ACT Project Uplift in New York City in 1965. She was a delegate to the National Black Economic Caucus in 1975. She holds a J.D. from Catholic University.

The President also announced that he will renominate R. David Pittle for reappointment as a Commissioner of the Consumer Product Safety Commission. Pittle was nominated for the position on October 31, 1977, but was not confirmed before the Senate adjourned.

Interstate Commission on the Potomac River Basin

Appointment of Joseph D. Gebhardt as a Member. January 17, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Joseph D. Gebhardt, of Bethesda, Md., as a member of the Interstate Commission on the Potomac River Basin. He replaces Carl P. Croasdale, resigned.

Gebhardt, 31, is an associate with the Washington public interest law firm of Dobrovir, Oakes, Gebhardt, Scull, specializing in litigation in such areas as consumer rights, government information, and voting rights. In 1973 he was a staff attorney for the Center on Corporate Responsibility.

Panama Canal Treaties

Question-and-Answer Session by Telephone With Participants in a Townhall Meeting on the Treaties in Albuquerque, New Mexico. January 17, 1978

MARSHALL NASON. Good evening, Mr. President. This is Marshall Nason greeting you on behalf of the townhall meeting at the University of New Mexico in Albuquerque. Since you speak Spanish so nicely, I think we could say, muy buenas noches, Señor Presidente [a very good evening, Mr. President].

We greatly appreciate your willingness to share with us some of your views on the important issues of the Panama Canal treaties.

THE PRESIDENT. Muchas gracias, Dr. Nason. Es gran placer para mi tener esta oportunidad. Sería mejor si hables también, pero en inglés, yo creo. [Thank you, Dr. Nason. It is a great pleasure for me to have this opportunity. It would be better if you spoke in English, I believe.]

DR. NASON. Bien, señor. [Very well, sir.]

THE PRESIDENT. Do you have a question for me, Dr. Nason?

DR. NASON. Mr. President, we're aware that your time is limited and that you still have other commitments ahead of you this evening, even though it is 10 o'clock in Washington. So, we would now like to direct to you one question selected by our news media participants as being perhaps the most representative among those submitted by our audience.

This question was posed by Mr. William Bonney of Albuquerque and reads very briefly as follows: "Should the U.S. Senate fail to ratify the treaty, what would your next move be?"

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, let me thank Senator Schmitt, who is there, and also Ambassador Popper—I'm sure that they and you, Dr. Nason, have presented a very well balanced description of what the treaties mean to our Nation. I think they are fair to both the United States and Panama. Under six Presidents, three Republicans and three Democrats, there has been a recognition from the White House that the treaties that are presently in existence need to be modified.

These two treaties will give us, throughout this century and throughout the next century as well, the clear right to defend the canal, to ensure that it's open, neutral, available for the ships of all nations, that in a time of emergency or need, our ships can go to the head of the line and have rapid transit through the canal.

The negotiations have been going on ever since President Johnson was here, 14, almost 15 years ago, and they were just completed this past year. The Panamanians have negotiated in good faith; so have we. We've never been threatened. We've never had any unpleasantness in the negotiations. They have accepted the treaties that we signed, General Torrijos and I, and the Panamanian people have, through a plebiscite, approved them by almost a two-thirds majority, although there was a lot of opposition in Panama.

Now it's up to the Senate to act, and I believe that the Senate will ratify the treaties. However, if the treaties are not ratified, I think the Panamanian people will indeed doubt our good intentions and our good faith. I think the Latin American nations, and indeed the developing nations all over the world, will doubt that what we say about basic human rights and fairness prevails with our large and powerful country. And in spite of the commitment that I have from General Torrijos and other government leaders in Panama that they will do everything possible to hold down any attacks or violence—and I don't have any doubt that they will—I think that there will be some demonstrations there by the Communists and by others who would like to create dissension between us and Panama.

I'll say this: Our Nation is strong enough militarily to defend the canal, and I would certainly take that action as President to guarantee that the canal is defended. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, all five of whom, by the way, strongly support the treaties that we have signed, have estimated that it might take 100,000 American troops to keep the canal open and free of damage.

I would hate to have to do this. Of course, as I said earlier, I would, if necessary. I don't know how long the American people would support a major military action of this kind. I would like to avoid it, and that's the purpose of the treaties, to make Panama and us not enemies, but partners, to keep us in a position of guaranteeing that the canal is well-operated, well-maintained, is not a drain on the American taxpayer, and is open.

So, if the canal treaties should be rejected by the Senate, it would be a severe blow, not only to the Panamanian people but to the American people as well. And under those circumstances, I would probably have to take emergency action, and I would, if necessary, to guarantee that the canal was open and defended. This is a prospect, however, that I don't anticipate, because I believe that there's a growing sentiment, both in the United States among our people and also among the Senators who have studied this matter so carefully, that the treaties indeed should be ratified, and ratified without delay.

I hope I've answered your question adequately.

DR. NASON. Thank you most sincerely, Mr. President. On behalf of our audience, it's been a very real privilege for us to hear from you personally on this vital issue. And ahora, desde Nuevo Mexico decimos muy buenas noches, Señor Presidente, y mil gracias. [And now from New Mexico we say a very good evening, Mr. President, and many thanks.]

THE PRESIDENT. Muchas gracias a todos. [Many thanks to all of you.]

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:45 p.m. from the Oval Office at the White House to the meeting in the Ballroom at the Student Union Building at the University of New Mexico. Marshall Nason is director of the Latin American Center at the university.

In his remarks, the President referred to Senator Harrison H. Schmitt of New Mexico and David H. Popper, Deputy for Panama Canal Treaty Affairs, Department of State.

75th Anniversary of Wireless Communications

Statement by the President. January 18, 1978

Seventy-five years ago, a new era of international communications was heralded in by a historic exchange of messages across the Atlantic. On January 18, 1903, President Theodore Roosevelt first used the Marconi wireless to send the following message to Edward VII of England from a station on Cape Cod:

"In taking advantage of the wonderful triumph of scientific research and ingenuity which has been achieved in perfecting a system of wireless telegraphy, I extend on behalf of the American people most cordial greetings and good wishes to you and [to all] the people of the British Empire."

Edward VII replied via the Poldhu Station in Cornwall, England:

"I thank you most sincerely for the kind message which I have just received from you through Marconi's transatlantic wireless telegraphy. I sincerely reciprocate in the name of the people of the British Empire the cordial greetings and friendly sentiment expressed by you on behalf of the American nation, and I heartily wish you and your country every possible prosperity."

That exchange marked a milestone in the history of communications. Since then, we have built on the invention of the distinguished Italian physicist Guglielmo Marconi and others, a global communications system that allows instant contact not only between heads of state but peoples of all nations.

In recalling that historic message, it is fitting that we commemorate the event both with gratitude for the ways in which science and engineering have helped to unite us and with fervent hopes that such communications will serve the future course of peace and human progress everywhere.

United States Ambassador to Poland

*Nomination of William E. Schaufele, Jr.
January 19, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate William E. Schaufele, Jr., of Avon Lake, Ohio, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Poland. He will replace Richard T. Davies, resigned.

Schaufele was born December 7, 1923, in Lakewood, Ohio. He received a B.A. in 1948 from Yale University and an M.I.A. in 1950 from Columbia University. He served with the United States Army from 1942 to 1946.

He entered the Foreign Service in 1950 as Resident Officer to Pfaffenhofen/Ilm and Augsburg (Germany). From 1950 to 1967, he held a variety of Foreign Service positions, including Deputy Director of the Office of Central African Affairs (1965) and Ambassador to Upper Volta (1969-71). Schaufele was assigned to the United Nations Mission, where he served as Senior Adviser to the United States Representative from 1971 to 1973. He was Deputy Representative of the United States in the Security Council of the United Nations from 1973 to 1975. From 1975 to 1977, he was Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs.

United States Ambassador to Gabon and to Sao Tome and Principe

*Nomination of Arthur T. Tienken.
January 19, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Arthur T. Tienken, of Arlington, Va., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Gabonese Republic and to the Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe. He will succeed Andrew L. Steigman, resigned.

Mr. Tienken was born August 5, 1922, in Yonkers, N.Y. He received his B.A. in 1947 and M.A. in 1949 from Princeton University. He served in the United States Army from 1943 to 1946. He was with the Educational Testing Service of Princeton University from 1947 to 1948, part time.

Tienken entered the Foreign Service in 1949 as Resident Officer in Frankfurt and held various other positions through 1972. He was Diplomat in Residence at Marquette University from 1972 to 1973. From 1973 to 1975, he was Deputy Chief of Mission in Tunis and since 1975 has been Deputy Chief of Mission in Addis Ababa.

South Pacific Commission

*Appointment of Vernon A. Mund as an Alternate U.S. Representative.
January 19, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of Vernon A. Mund, of Seattle, Wash., to be an Alternate Representative of the United States on the South Pacific Commission for the term of 2 years. He will replace Frederick W. Rohlfing, term expired.

Mund was born June 5, 1906, in Larchmont, Iowa. He received a B.B.A., 1928, and an M.B.A., 1929, from the University of Washington. He received a Ph. D. in 1932 from Princeton University. From 1931 to 1932, he was an instructor at Princeton University. He was professor of economics at the University of Washington from 1937 to 1975.

Harry S Truman Scholarship Foundation and Legal Services Corporation

Recess Appointments to the Foundation and Corporation. January 19, 1978

The President today announced two recess appointments. The nominations were sent to the Senate on December 12 but were not confirmed before the session ended. They are John W. Snyder as a member of the Board of Trustees of the Harry S Truman Scholarship Foundation; and the following persons to be

American Heart Month, 1978

Proclamation 4546. January 19, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

Diseases of the heart and blood vessels afflict some thirty million Americans. Each year cardiovascular disorders claim nearly one million lives and cost our economy nearly forty-eight billion dollars in lost wages, lost productivity, and medical expenses.

Since 1948, a concerted national effort has been under way to reduce illness, disability, and death from heart and blood vessel diseases through nationwide programs of biomedical research in the cardiovascular field, training of research workers and clinicians, information and education programs for health professionals and for the general public, and community service activities concerned with prevention, detection, and control of cardiovascular disorders.

These efforts have been spearheaded by the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute, a federal agency, and the American Heart Association, a voluntary health organization supported through private contributions. Since 1948, their combined outlay in support of the national battle against cardiovascular diseases has totaled nearly three billion dollars.

During these thirty years, an immense amount of new knowledge about the cardiovascular system and its diseases has been amassed and much of it has found application in better methods of prevention, diagnosis, and treatment. In addition, many Americans have modified their diets, established sensible and regular exercise programs, changed their smoking habits, or have otherwise altered their lifestyles to achieve better cardiovascular health. As a result, mortality rates have declined steadily since 1950 in nearly all major cardiovascular disease categories and the total number of deaths among Americans from these diseases is the lowest it has been since 1965.

But these encouraging results are no excuse for complacency. On the contrary, they show that it is only through sustained dedication and cooperation among public officials, community leaders, private institutions, and the American people that we have any chance of controlling this threat to the health of our Nation.

Recognizing the need for all Americans to join forces in the battle against cardiovascular disease, the Congress, by joint resolution approved December 30, 1963 (77 Stat. 843; 36 U.S.C. 169b) has requested the President to issue annually a proclamation designating February as American Heart Month.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the month of February, 1978, as American Heart Month. I invite the Governors of the States, the appropriate officials of all other areas subject to the jurisdiction of the United States and the American people to join with me in reaffirming our commitment to the search for new ways to prevent, detect and control cardiovascular disease in all its forms.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this nineteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

JIMMY CARTER

The State of the Union

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the 95th Congress, ladies and gentlemen:

Two years ago today we had the first caucus in Iowa, and one year ago tomorrow, I walked from here to the White House to take up the duties of President of the United States. I didn't know it then when I walked, but I've been trying to save energy ever since. [Laughter]

I return tonight to fulfill one of those duties of the Constitution: to give to the Congress—and to the Nation—information on the state of the Union.

Militarily, politically, economically, and in spirit, the state of our Union is sound.

We are a great country, a strong country, a vital and a dynamic country—and so we will remain.

We are a confident people and a hard-working people, a decent and a compassionate people—and so we will remain.

I want to speak to you tonight about where we are and where we must go, about what we have done and what we must do. And I want to pledge to you my best efforts and ask you to pledge yours.

Each generation of Americans has to face circumstances not of its own choosing, but by which its character is measured and its spirit is tested.

There are times of emergency, when a nation and its leaders must bring their energies to bear on a single urgent task.

That was the duty Abraham Lincoln faced when our land was torn apart by conflict in the War Between the States. That was the duty faced by Franklin Roosevelt when he led America out of an economic depression and again when he led America to victory in war.

There are other times when there is no single overwhelming crisis, yet profound national interests are at stake.

At such times the risk of inaction can be equally great. It becomes the task of leaders to call forth the vast and restless energies of our people to build for the future.

That is what Harry Truman did in the years after the Second World War, when we helped Europe and Japan rebuild themselves and secured an international order that has protected freedom from aggression.

We live in such times now, and we face such duties.

We've come through a long period of turmoil and doubt, but we've once again found our moral course, and with a new spirit, we are striving to express our best instincts to the rest of the world.

There is all across our land a growing sense of peace and a sense of common purpose. This sense of unity cannot be expressed in programs or in legislation or in dollars. It's an achievement that belongs to every individual American. This unity ties together, and it towers over all our efforts here in Washington, and it serves as an inspiring beacon for all of us who are elected to serve.

This new atmosphere demands a new spirit, a partnership between those of us who lead and those who elect. The foundations of this partnership are truth, the courage to face hard decisions, concern for one another and the common good over special interests, and a basic faith and trust in the wisdom and strength and judgment of the American people.

For the first time in a generation, we are not haunted by a major international crisis or by domestic turmoil, and we now have a rare and a priceless opportunity to address persistent problems and burdens which come to us as a nation—quietly and steadily getting worse over the years.

As President, I've had to ask you, the Members of Congress, and you, the American people, to come to grips with some of the most difficult and hard questions facing our society.

We must make a maximum effort, because if we do not aim for the best, we are very likely to achieve little. I see no benefit to the country if we delay, because the problems will only get worse.

We need patience and good will, but we really need to realize that there is a limit to the role and the function of government. Government cannot solve our problems, it can't set our goals, it cannot define our vision. Government cannot eliminate poverty or provide a bountiful economy or reduce inflation or save our cities or cure illiteracy or provide energy. And government cannot mandate goodness. Only a true partnership between government and the people can ever hope to reach these goals.

Those of us who govern can sometimes inspire, and we can identify needs and marshal resources, but we simply cannot be the managers of everything and everybody.

We here in Washington must move away from crisis management, and we must establish clear goals for the future—immediate and the distant future—which will let us work together and not in conflict. Never again should we neglect a growing crisis like the shortage of energy, where further delay will only lead to more harsh and painful solutions.

Every day we spend more than $120 million for foreign oil. This slows our economic growth, it lowers the value of the dollar overseas, and it aggravates unemployment and inflation here at home.

Now we know what we must do—increase production. We must cut down on waste. And we must use more of those fuels which are plentiful and more permanent. We must be fair to people, and we must not disrupt our Nation's economy and our budget.

Now, that sounds simple. But I recognize the difficulties involved. I know that it is not easy for the Congress to act. But the fact remains that on the energy legislation, we have failed the American people. Almost 5 years after the oil embargo dramatized the problem for us all, we still do not have a national energy program. Not much longer can we tolerate this stalemate. It undermines our national interest both at home and abroad. We must succeed, and I believe we will.

Our main task at home this year, with energy a central element, is the Nation's economy. We must continue the recovery and further cut unemployment and inflation.

Last year was a good one for the United States. We reached all of our major economic goals for 1977. Four million new jobs were created—an alltime record—and the number of unemployed dropped by more than a million. Unemployment right now is the lowest it has been since 1974, and not since World War II has such a high percentage of American people been employed.

The rate of inflation went down. There was a good growth in business profits and investments, the source of more jobs for our workers, and a higher standard of living for all our people. After taxes and inflation, there was a healthy increase in workers' wages.

And this year, our country will have the first $2 trillion economy in the history of the world.

Now, we are proud of this progress the first year, but we must do even better in the future.

We still have serious problems on which all of us must work together. Our trade deficit is too large. Inflation is still too high, and too many Americans still do not have a job.

Now, I didn't have any simple answers for all these problems. But we have developed an economic policy that is working, because it's simple, balanced, and fair. It's based on four principles:

First, the economy must keep on expanding to produce new jobs and better income, which our people need. The fruits of growth must be widely shared. More jobs must be made available to those who have been bypassed until now. And the tax system must be made fairer and simpler.

Secondly, private business and not the Government must lead the expansion in the future.

Third, we must lower the rate of inflation and keep it down. Inflation slows down economic growth, and it's the most cruel to the poor and also to the elderly and others who live on fixed incomes.

And fourth, we must contribute to the strength of the world economy.

I will announce detailed proposals for improving our tax system later this week. We can make our tax laws fairer, we can make them simpler and easier to understand, and at the same time, we can—and we will—reduce the tax burden on American citizens by $25 billion.

The tax reforms and the tax reductions go together. Only with the long overdue reforms will the full tax cut be advisable.

Almost $17 billion in income tax cuts will go to individuals. Ninety-six percent of all American taxpayers will see their taxes go down. For a typical family of four, this means an annual saving of more than $250 a year, or a tax reduction of about 20 percent. A further $2 billion cut in excise taxes will give more relief and also contribute directly to lowering the rate of inflation.

And we will also provide strong additional incentives for business investment and growth through substantial cuts in the corporate tax rates and improvement in the investment tax credit.

Now, these tax proposals will increase opportunity everywhere in the Nation. But additional jobs for the disadvantaged deserve special attention.

We've already passed laws to assure equal access to the voting booth and to restaurants and to schools, to housing, and laws to permit access to jobs. But job opportunity—the chance to earn a decent living—is also a basic human right, which we cannot and will not ignore.

A major priority for our Nation is the final elimination of the barriers that restrict the opportunities available to women and also to black people and Hispanics and other minorities. We've come a long way toward that goal. But there is still much to do. What we inherited from the past must not be permitted to shackle us in the future.

I'll be asking you for a substantial increase in funds for public jobs for our young people, and I also am recommending that the Congress continue the public service employment programs at more than twice the level of a year ago. When welfare reform is completed, we will have more than a million additional jobs so that those on welfare who are able to work can work.

However, again, we know that in our free society, private business is still the best source of new jobs. Therefore, I will propose a new program to encourage businesses to hire young and disadvantaged Americans. These young people only need skills and a chance in order to take their place in our economic system. Let's give them the chance they need. A major step in the right direction would be the early passage of a greatly improved Humphrey-Hawkins bill.

My budget for 1979 addresses these national needs, but it is lean and tight. I have cut waste wherever possible.

I am proposing an increase of less than 2 percent after adjusting for inflation—the smallest increase in the Federal budget in 4 years.

Lately, Federal spending has taken a steadily increasing portion of what Americans produce. Our new budget reverses that trend, and later I hope to bring the Government's toll down even further. And with your help, we'll do that.

In time of high employment and a strong economy, deficit spending should not be a feature of our budget. As the economy continues to gain strength and as our unemployment rates continue to fall, revenues will grow. With careful planning, efficient management, and proper restraint on spending, we can move rapidly toward a balanced budget—and we will.

Next year the budget deficit will be only slightly less than this year. But one-third of the deficit is due to the necessary tax cuts that I've proposed. This year the right choice is to reduce the burden on taxpayers and provide more jobs for our people.

The third element in our program is a renewed attack on inflation. We've learned the hard way that high unemployment will not prevent or cure inflation.

Government can help us by stimulating private investment and by maintaining a responsible economic policy. Through a new top-level review process, we will do a better job of reducing Government regulation that drives up costs and drives up prices.

But again, Government alone cannot bring down the rate of inflation. When a level of high inflation is expected to continue, then companies raise prices to protect their profit margins against prospective increases in wages and other costs, while workers demand higher wages as protection against expected price increases. It's like an escalation in the arms race, and understandably, no one wants to disarm alone.

Now, no one firm or a group of workers can halt this process. It's an effort that we must all make together. I'm therefore asking government, business, labor, and other groups to join in a voluntary program to moderate inflation by holding wage and price increases in each sector of the economy during 1978 below the average increases of the last 2 years.

I do not believe in wage and price controls. A sincere commitment to voluntary constraint provides a way—perhaps the only way—to fight inflation without Government interference.

As I came into the Capitol tonight, I saw the farmers, my fellow farmers, standing out in the snow. I'm familiar with their problem, and I know from Congress action that you are too. When I was running Carters Warehouse, we had spread on our own farms 5–10–15 fertilizer for about $40 a ton. The last time I was home, the price was about $100 a ton. The cost of nitrogen has gone up 150 percent, and the price of products that farmers sell has either stayed the same or gone down a little.

Now, this past year in 1977, you, the Congress, and I together passed a new agricultural act. It went into effect October 1. It'll have its first impact on the 1978 crops. It will help a great deal. It'll add $6½ billion or more to help the farmers with their price supports and target prices.

Last year we had the highest level of exports of farm products in the history of our country—$24 billion. We expect to have more this year. We'll be working together. But I think it's incumbent on us to monitor very carefully the farm situation and continue to work harmoniously with the farmers of our country. What's best for the farmers, the farm families, in the long run is also best for the consumers of our country.

Economic success at home is also the key to success in our international economic policy. An effective energy program, strong investment and productivity, and controlled inflation will provide [improve] our trade balance and balance it, and it will help to protect the integrity of the dollar overseas.

By working closely with our friends abroad, we can promote the economic health of the whole world, with fair and balanced agreements lowering the barriers to trade.

Despite the inevitable pressures that build up when the world economy suffers from high unemployment, we must firmly resist the demands for self-defeating protectionism. But free trade must also be fair trade. And I am determined to protect American industry and American workers against foreign trade practices which are unfair or illegal.

In a separate written message to Congress, I've outlined other domestic initiatives, such as welfare reform, consumer protection, basic education skills, urban policy, reform of our labor laws, and national health care later on this year. I will not repeat these tonight. But there are several other points that I would like to make directly to you.

During these past years, Americans have seen our Government grow far from us.

For some citizens, the Government has almost become like a foreign country, so strange and distant that we've often had to deal with it through trained ambassadors who have sometimes become too powerful and too influential—lawyers, accountants, and lobbyists. This cannot go on.

We must have what Abraham Lincoln wanted—a government for the people.

We've made progress toward that kind of government. You've given me the authority I requested to reorganize the Federal bureaucracy. And I am using that authority.

We've already begun a series of reorganization plans which will be completed over a period of 3 years. We have also proposed abolishing almost 500 Federal advisory and other commissions and boards. But I know that the American people are still sick and tired of Federal paperwork and redtape. Bit by bit we are chopping down the thicket of unnecessary Federal regulations by which Government too often interferes in our personal lives and our personal business. We've cut the public's Federal paperwork load by more than 12 percent in less than a year. And we are not through cutting.

We've made a good start on turning the gobbledygook of Federal regulations into plain English that people can understand. But we know that we still have a long way to go.

We've brought together parts of 11 Government agencies to create a new Department of Energy. And now it's time to take another major step by creating a separate Department of Education.

But even the best organized Government will only be as effective as the people who carry out its policies. For this reason, I consider civil service reform to be absolutely vital. Worked out with the civil servants themselves, this reorganization plan will restore the merit principle to a system which has grown into a bureaucratic maze. It will provide greater management flexibility and better rewards for better performance without compromising job security.

Then and only then can we have a government that is efficient, open, and truly worthy of our people's understanding and respect. I have promised that we will have such a government, and I intend to keep that promise.

In our foreign policy, the separation of people from government has been in the past a source of weakness and error. In a democratic system like ours, foreign policy decisions must be able to stand the test of public examination and public debate. If we make a mistake in this administration, it will be on the side of frankness and openness with the American people.

In our modern world, when the deaths of literally millions of people can result from a few terrifying seconds of destruction, the path of national strength and security is identical to the path of peace.

Tonight, I am happy to report that because we are strong, our Nation is at peace with the world.

We are a confident nation. We've restored a moral basis for our foreign policy. The very heart of our identity as a nation is our firm commitment to human rights.

We stand for human rights because we believe that government has as a purpose to promote the well-being of its citizens. This is true in our domestic policy; it's also true in our foreign policy. The world must know that in support of human rights, the United States will stand firm.

We expect no quick or easy results, but there has been significant movement toward greater freedom and humanity in several parts of the world.

Thousands of political prisoners have been freed. The leaders of the world—even our ideological adversaries—now see that their attitude toward fundamental human rights affects their standing in the international community, and it affects their relations with the United States.

To serve the interests of every American, our foreign policy has three major goals.

The first and prime concern is and will remain the security of our country.

Security is based on our national will, and security is based on the strength of our Armed Forces. We have the will, and militarily we are very strong.

Security also comes through the strength of our alliances. We have reconfirmed our commitment to the defense of Europe, and this year we will demonstrate that commitment by further modernizing and strengthening our military capabilities there.

Security can also be enhanced by agreements with potential adversaries which reduce the threat of nuclear disaster while maintaining our own relative strategic capability.

In areas of peaceful competition with the Soviet Union, we will continue to more than hold our own.

At the same time, we are negotiating with quiet confidence, without haste, with careful determination, to ease the tensions between us and to ensure greater stability and security.

The strategic arms limitation talks have been long and difficult. We want a mutual limit on both the quality and the quantity of the giant nuclear arsenals of both nations, and then we want actual reductions in strategic arms as a major step toward the ultimate elimination of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth.

If these talks result in an agreement this year—and I trust they will—I pledge to you that the agreement will maintain and enhance the stability of the world's strategic balance and the security of the United States.

For 30 years, concerted but unsuccessful efforts have been made to ban the testing of atomic explosives—both military weapons and peaceful nuclear devices.

We are hard at work with Great Britain and the Soviet Union on an agreement which will stop testing and will protect our national security and provide for adequate verification of compliance. We are now making, I believe, good progress toward this comprehensive ban on nuclear explosions.

We are also working vigorously to halt the proliferation of nuclear weapons among the nations of the world which do not now have them and to reduce the deadly global traffic in conventional arms sales. Our stand for peace is suspect if we are also the principal arms merchant of the world. So, we've decided to cut down our arms transfers abroad on a year-by-year basis and to work with other major arms exporters to encourage their similar constraint.

Every American has a stake in our second major goal—a world at peace. In a nuclear age, each of us is threatened when peace is not secured everywhere. We are trying to promote harmony in those parts of the world where major differences exist among other nations and threaten international peace.

In the Middle East, we are contributing our good offices to maintain the momentum of the current negotiations and to keep open the lines of communication among the Middle Eastern leaders. The whole world has a great stake in the success of these efforts. This is a precious opportunity for a historic settlement of a longstanding conflict—an opportunity which may never come again in our lifetime.

Our role has been difficult and sometimes thankless and controversial. But it has been constructive and it has been necessary, and it will continue.

Our third major foreign policy goal is one that touches the life of every American citizen every day—world economic growth and stability.

This requires strong economic performance by the industrialized democracies like ourselves and progress in resolving the global energy crisis. Last fall, with the help of others, we succeeded in our vigorous efforts to maintain the stability of the price of oil. But as many foreign leaders have emphasized to me personally and, I am sure, to you, the greatest future contribution that America can make to the world economy would be an effective energy conservation program here at home. We will not hesitate to take the actions needed to protect the integrity of the American dollar.

We are trying to develop a more just international system. And in this spirit, we are supporting the struggle for human development in Africa, in Asia, and in Latin America.

Finally, the world is watching to see how we act on one of our most important and controversial items of business—approval of the Panama Canal treaties. The treaties now before the Senate are the result of the work of four administrations—two Democratic, two Republican.

They guarantee that the canal will be open always for unrestricted use by the ships of the world. Our ships have the right to go to the head of the line for priority of passage in times of emergency or need. We retain the permanent right to defend the canal with our own military forces, if necessary, to guarantee its openness and its neutrality.

The treaties are to the clear advantage of ourselves, the Panamanians, and the other users of the canal. Ratifying the Panama Canal treaties will demonstrate our good faith to the world, discourage the spread of hostile ideologies in this hemisphere, and directly contribute to the economic well-being and the security of the United States.

I have to say that that's very welcome applause. [Laughter]

There were two moments on my recent journey which, for me, confirmed the final aims of our foreign policy and what it always must be.

One was in a little village in India, where I met a people as passionately attached to their rights and liberties as we are, but whose children have a far smaller chance for good health or food or education or human fulfillment than a child born in this country.

The other moment was in Warsaw, capital of a nation twice devastated by war in this century. There, people have rebuilt the city which war's destruction took from them. But what was new only emphasized clearly what was lost.

What I saw in those two places crystallized for me the purposes of our own Nation's policy: to ensure economic justice, to advance human rights, to resolve conflicts without violence, and to proclaim in our great democracy our constant faith in the liberty and dignity of human beings everywhere.

We Americans have a great deal of work to do together. In the end, how well we do that work will depend on the spirit in which we approach it. We must seek fresh answers, unhindered by the stale prescriptions of the past.

It has been said that our best years are behind us. But I say again that America's best is still ahead. We have emerged from bitter experiences chastened but proud, confident once again, ready to face challenges once again, and united once again.

We come together tonight at a solemn time. Last week the Senate lost a good and honest man—Lee Metcalf of Montana.

And today, the flag of the United States flew at half-mast from this Capitol and from American installations and ships all over the world, in mourning for Senator Hubert Humphrey.

Because he exemplified so well the joy and the zest of living, his death reminds us not so much of our own mortality, but of the possibilities offered to us by life. He always looked to the future with a special American kind of confidence, of hope and enthusiasm. And the best way that we can honor him is by following his example.

Our task—to use the words of Senator Humphrey—is “reconciliation, rebuilding, and rebirth.”

Reconciliation of private needs and interests into a higher purpose.

Rebuilding the old dreams of justice and liberty, and country and community.

Rebirth of our faith in the common good.

Each of us here tonight—and all who are listening in your homes—must rededicate ourselves to serving the common good. We are a community, a beloved community, all of us. Our individual fates are linked, our futures intertwined. And if we act in that knowledge and in that spirit, together, as the Bible says, we can move mountains.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9 p.m. in the House Chamber at the Capitol. He was introduced by Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives. The address was broadcast live on radio and television.

The State of the Union

*Annual Message to the Congress.
January 19, 1978*

To the Congress of the United States:

Tonight's State of the Union Address concentrates on this year's highest priorities—a strong energy bill; a coordinated economic program of job creation, tax reduction, tax reform and anti-inflation measures; making the government more effective and efficient; maintaining the peace through a strong national defense; and ratifying both the Panama Canal Treaties and, if completed, the SALT II treaty.

It is important that the Congress and the Nation also understand what our other important initiatives and goals will be for 1978. I am therefore sending to Congress this separate, more detailed State of the Union Message, which describes Administration priorities in the areas not fully covered in the Address.

DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

A number of serious domestic problems faced the Nation when I took office one year ago. The economy had not yet fully recovered from the recession; our country had no sound energy policy; the Federal government was operating inefficiently and ineffectively in many areas; concerns about the openness and integrity of our government remained in the aftermath of Watergate; and many of our most pressing social problems had not been addressed.

In 1977, my Administration did not solve all of those problems. But Congress joined us in tackling many of these issues, and together we made progress. Now that a year has passed, I believe we are a more confident people, with more trust in our institutions. We are a country on the move again, prepared to address our problems with boldness and confidence, at home and abroad. We have reasserted our concern for the problems of people here at home and reaffirmed our position of moral leadership in the world.

This year, my domestic goals will continue to reflect those concerns that guided my actions in 1977: restoring economic prosperity; meeting our Nation's human needs; making the government more efficient and more responsive; and developing and protecting our natural resources.

RESTORING ECONOMIC PROSPERITY

I am devoting a substantial part of my State of the Union Address to the need for a comprehensive economic program, and I will devote the bulk of my Economic Report to Congress, to be delivered tomorrow, to a complete description of my Administration's economic goals and objectives. In this Message, therefore, I will not repeat those statements but I want to set forth briefly the key elements of those proposals:

- a $23 billion income tax cut in 1979, with $17 billion going to individuals and their families and $6 billion going to businesses;
- a tax reform program designed to make our tax laws fairer and simpler;

- an anti-inflation program, designed to reduce annual increases in wages and prices, with the cooperation of labor and business and with the Federal government setting an example; reductions of $2 billion in excise and payroll taxes will also make a contribution to reducing inflation;
- an extension of the funding for 725,000 public service (CETA) jobs, and a $700 million increase in spending for our youth employment efforts;
- a major new $400 million private sector jobs initiative, designed primarily to encourage businesses to hire unemployed minorities and youth.

I plan to work very closely with Congress to secure prompt action on these economic proposals. Their adoption will help achieve the kind of economic prosperity for our Nation that all of us want. Along with a sound energy bill, enactment of these economic proposals will be my highest domestic priority for 1978.

ENERGY

There can be no higher priority than prompt enactment of comprehensive energy legislation along the lines submitted to the Congress last spring.

Huge oil price increases in 1973–74 contributed to the double-digit inflation of 1974, and to the worst recession in 40 years. These price hikes were also the principal cause of our foreign trade deficit, which has contributed to the weakness of the dollar abroad.

Unless we act now, our energy problems will rapidly get worse. Failure to act will fuel inflation, erode the value of the dollar, render us vulnerable to disruptions in our oil supply, and limit our economic progress in the years to come.

I am confident that the Congress will respond to the Nation's clear need, by enacting responsible and balanced energy legislation early this year.

EMPLOYMENT

Last year we made considerable progress in our efforts to reduce unemployment. The unemployment rate decreased from 7.8% to 6.4%. During the year, 4.1 million new jobs were created. Unemployment fell by 1.1 million workers. The actions we took as part of our $21 billion economic stimulus package substantially helped us achieve these favorable results.

In 1978, the Administration will continue its efforts to reduce unemployment still further and to increase employment opportunities for all Americans. As part of the budget I will propose:

- additional funds to increase youth programs 260% above the 1976 level, providing $2.3 billion in outlays and 450,000 man-years of employment and training for young workers;
- a $400 million private sector employment program focused on youth and other disadvantaged workers and aimed at mobilizing private industry to work with government in finding jobs. It will be implemented through business councils established throughout the country;
- maintenance of the 725,000 CETA jobs through 1979, while tying them in future years to national unemployment rates;
- beginning of a demonstration program for the jobs component of the Better Jobs and Income Program.

Humphrey-Hawkins Legislation

The Administration will seek passage of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act.

This Act will help the Administration and the Congress in planning our efforts to reduce unemployment and to create jobs, while maintaining reasonable price stability. Its enactment would serve as a living memorial to the late Senator Hubert Humphrey.

Private Sector Jobs

The Administration plans a major $400 million effort to involve business and labor in the training and hiring of the hard-core unemployed.

The program will closely tie the Federal employment system with the private sector, through the use of business councils. I am confident that the private sector will respond positively to the call to help the Nation solve one of its most serious problems—the employment of our youth and minorities.

INFLATION

Although inflation is lower now than in the recent past, we still must do more to keep it down. The steps my Administration will take include:

- incentives for business investment, contained in our tax proposals, which will increase productive investment, and thereby help us hold down prices and costs;
- reduction in excise and unemployment taxes, proposed in the new budget;
- continuing reductions in needlessly complex Federal regulations. We have established a high-level inter-agency committee to review the effects of regulation in our economy, and we will continue our efforts for regulatory reform in the airline industry and elsewhere; —a special effort to hold down the soaring costs of health care, through enactment of the Hospital Cost Containment Act.

But the government cannot solve this problem alone—especially once business, labor, and consumers have accepted inflation as a fact of life, and adjusted their behavior accordingly. I have therefore asked business and labor to undertake, voluntarily, a new program to reduce inflation. I will ask each industry to aim for smaller price and wage increases in 1978 than it averaged over the last two years. As a major employer the Federal government should take the lead in this effort. Voluntary cooperation is one way—perhaps the only way—to reduce inflation without unacceptable government interference and coercion.

URBAN ASSISTANCE AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

The Administration and Congress took major steps last year to meet the needs of our cities. We increased funding for Community Development Block Grants by $2.7 billion over three years, and provided an alternative formula for allocating funds that was more responsive to the needs of distressed urban areas. Next year we will recommend an increase of $150 million over the 1978 level for the Community Development Block Grant program. We enacted a new program of Urban Development Action Grants at an annual level of $400 million, and extended and expanded Anti-Recession Fiscal Assistance (ARFA).

I am proposing that the ARFA program, which expires September 30, 1978, be extended. We are evaluating possible revisions in programs and funding, and will make our recommendations to the Congress within two months.

The Administration is also studying closely the possible need for extended Federal lending to New York City. The current legislation expires on June 30, 1978. We are committed, along with the State and City, to preserving the City's solvency. If such extended lending is necessary for that purpose, we will propose it. However, all the interested parties must contribute to a permanent solution.

This spring I will submit to Congress a message outlining this Administration's urban policy, based on the work of the Urban and Regional Policy Group, chaired by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. It will be designed to make existing Federal programs more effective, and will involve new initiatives and resources to address our urban needs. The long-standing problems of our cities are structural in nature and cannot be corrected by short-term or one-time efforts. This Administration is committed to a long-term and continuing effort to meet stubborn problems and changing needs. Our urban policy proposals will:

- build a more effective partnership between the Federal government, State and local governments, the private sector, neighborhood groups and concerned citizens;
- be sufficiently flexible to meet the diverse needs of our urban areas and to respond to particular problems of distressed areas;
- address the fiscal needs of hard-pressed urban governments, as well as the economic and social needs of city residents;
- improve the urban physical environment and strengthen urban communities;
- use Federal assistance to stimulate job-creating investments by the private sector and to encourage innovative actions by the State and local governments.

AGRICULTURE AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Decent farm income and a strong family farm system are vital to our national economic stability and strength. For too long farm prices for many commodities have been severely depressed. Working with the Congress in the past year, we have adopted new programs and policies designed to strengthen farm income and to ensure abundant, reasonably priced food for consumers. Partially as a result of these policies and programs, farm prices are now improving. Nevertheless, we cannot be satisfied with the economic condition of many American farmers today. We will continue to monitor our agricultural economy and to work with Congressional and farm leaders to make certain that Federal programs and policies are carried out effectively.

Food and Agriculture Act

In the past year we have worked with the Congress to enact a new comprehensive Food and Agriculture Act, which will protect producers and consumers. We have also exercised set-aside authority for wheat and feed grains, which will protect farm income. This year we expect to pay farmers $7.3 billion for all price support programs. The new farm bill which became effective October 1, 1977, achieves long-needed changes in our agricultural policies, including:

- minimal governmental intervention in markets and in the decisions farmers make;
- price support loans for major commodities that permit us to remain competitive in world markets;
- a grain reserve designed to remove excess products from the market and hold them until supplies are short;
- income support levels based on cost-of-production.

Grain Reserve

Last year we initiated a plan to place 30–35 million metric tons of food and feed grains in reserve. Establishing this reserve will add further strength and stability to the market and provide a hedge against export control on grain. Most of this grain will be owned and controlled by farmers. To strengthen farmer control of the grain and to help keep the grain out of government ownership, terms of the farmer storage facility loan program were liberalized. In 1978, the Administration will propose an international emergency grain reserve of up to 6 million metric tons to help us meet our food aid commitments abroad.

Agricultural Disaster and Drought Aid

Because of the record droughts in 1977, I worked with Congress to pass an $844 million Emergency Drought Assistance Program. This year we will ask Congress to eliminate the many inconsistencies and inequities in existing disaster aid programs, and we will continue to give high priority to addressing the effects of the drought, which has begun to abate.

We are taking other steps to improve life in rural America. I recently signed a law to encourage better delivery of health services in rural communities. We will continue to expand the assignment of the National Health Service Corps' doctors, dentists and other health professionals to underserved rural areas. We will shortly be announcing methods to improve the effectiveness of rural housing programs with greater emphasis on home ownership for rural Americans.

Agricultural Exports

I want to increase our agricultural exports. To do so we need competitive prices, high quality products, and reserve supplies to meet all contingencies. We must remove unnecessary barriers to exports. And we must have an affirmative export policy. In 1977, the Administration more than doubled (to $1.7 billion) the short-term export credit program, increased Soviet grain purchase authorization to 15 millions tons, developed a risk assurance program, and expanded efforts to develop export markets around the world.

This year we will continue these efforts, especially to reduce barriers to agricultural trade.

Sugar

To stabilize world sugar prices and to protect domestic sugar-producers, we negotiated an international sugar agreement this year with the major sugar-producing countries. We will seek Congressional ratification of the agreement early in 1978. The sugar program required by the 1977 Food and Agricultural Act will protect the domestic sugar industry in the meantime.

Rural Development and Credit Policy

In fiscal year 1977, the Farmers Home Administration provided nearly $7 billion in loans in four areas: farming, housing, community facilities and business and industrial development. We expect to provide at least $1 billion more in the current fiscal year.

SMALL BUSINESS

This Administration took several steps in 1977 to strengthen small business. The Small Business Administration expanded its financial and management assistance to these firms and developed an advocacy program to represent small business interests before all Federal departments and agencies. In 1978, we will continue efforts to support small business through tax cuts and special tax incentives, reduced regulations and other programmatic reforms, and expanded SBA loan authority.

MEETING OUR NATION'S HUMAN NEEDS

This Administration's constant concern has been with meeting the human needs of all Americans. Over the past year, we have moved on a number of fronts to make certain our citizens will be well housed, better educated, and properly cared for when they are in need. This year we will pursue our current initiatives in these areas and launch new ones.

HEALTH

This past year we were very active in the effort to improve the health of our citizens and to restrain skyrocketing health care costs, through:

- Establishment of a Mental Health Commission to help develop a national mental health program. The Commission will issue its final report later this year, and I expect to carefully consider the Commission's findings.
- A campaign to immunize the more than 20 million children not yet protected against communicable childhood diseases.
- Reorganization of part of HEW to allow more efficient delivery of Medicare/Medicaid services. The cost savings from the reorganizations will be realized more fully this year.
- Signing legislation to attack fraud and abuse in Medicare/Medicaid programs.
- Signing legislation to make Medicare/Medicaid reimbursement available to physician extenders in rural clinics. The beneficial effects of that bill will be felt in our Nation's rural areas for the first time this year.

In 1978, the Administration will continue these and other efforts to bring us better and less costly health care.

Hospital Cost Containment

One of my main legislative goals for this year is the Hospital Cost Containment Bill. That bill, which would save hospital users more than $7 billion in the first two years after enactment, is our principal weapon in the effort to decrease health care costs, which now double every five years.

National Health Insurance

I will submit to Congress later this year a National Health Insurance proposal. While Congress will not have the time to complete action on this proposal in 1978, it is important to begin the national debate on the many complex issues involved in National Health Insurance.

National Health Insurance will not solve all our health problems. A sensible national health policy also requires more effective delivery of preventive services, better nutrition, vigorous abatement of environmental and occupational threats to health, and efforts to change individual lifestyles that endanger health.

But National Health Insurance is a crucial step. It will protect our people from ruinous medical bills and provide each citizen with better access to sound and balanced health insurance coverage.

Medicaid Improvements for Children

Last year I proposed the Child Health Assessment Program to improve the early and preventive screening, diagnosis and treatment program for lower-income children under Medicaid. The Administration will press for enactment of this measure, and will urge its expansion to make an additional 1.7 million lower-income children eligible.

Teenage Pregnancy Proposal

I will propose legislation to establish networks of community based services to prevent unwanted adolescent pregnancies. We need and will urge expansion of existing family planning services to reach an additional 280,000 teenagers.

Drug Abuse

Drug Abuse threatens the health and safety of our children, here and abroad. We will continue the efforts begun last year to make our drug abuse prevention and control programs more effective and efficient.

World Health

This year I will present a strategy for working directly with other nations and through international organizations to raise the standards of health and nutrition around the world.

EDUCATION

Last year the Congress adopted with our cooperation a 15% increase in education funding—the largest increase since enactment of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

This year we will continue to demonstrate our commitment to improving the Nation's education programs. HEW's education budget expenditures will be increased by 14%, with the most significant increases coming in education of the disadvantaged, assistance to State programs for education of the handicapped, and college student financial aid.

The Administration will also work with the Congress for the creation of a separate Cabinet-level Department of Education, and for legislation to replace and reform expiring Federal education acts.

These legislative proposals will concentrate on:

- increasing basic literacy;
- ensuring that students are prepared for jobs;
- supporting post-secondary education and lifelong learning; and,
- strengthening the partnership between Federal, State, and local governments.

To augment existing programs, I will propose legislation to help low and middle-income families meet rising college tuition costs, and will also support a significant expansion of student aid programs.

INCOME ASSISTANCE

Over the past year we have made many far-reaching improvements in the programs that provide income assistance to the needy. My Administration will continue to assign great importance to this area in 1978.

Welfare Reform

I proposed last year a reform of the Nation's welfare system, through the Better Jobs and Income Act. This Act would fundamentally reform current programs to assist the poor by:

- consolidating the Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Supplemental Security Income and Food Stamps programs into a single consolidated cash assistance program that provides a basic nationally uniform Federal benefit;
- improving efforts to find jobs for the poor in the private sector, and creating up to 1.4 million public service jobs for heads of families who cannot be placed in unsubsidized employment; and
- improving work incentives by expanding the Earned Income Tax Credit.

We will work actively with the Congress in the coming year to pass the Better Jobs and Income Act, and we will provide in this year's budget for pilot employment programs so we will be ready to implement the welfare reform program.

Family and Children

My Administration will continue its strong commitment to strengthening the American family and to expanding programs for children.

The Administration will propose this year that the school breakfast program be made mandatory in schools with high concentrations of needy children. Further, we will propose a major expansion in special supplemental food programs for women, infants, and children.

Among other major actions in 1978 will be:

- convening a White House Conference on Families;
- pressing for enactment of our proposed reforms in foster care programs including new financial assistance to aid in the adoption of hard-to-place children;
- more than doubling the budget outlays for child welfare services, with an emphasis on services that help keep families together;
- continuing $200 million in special funding for day care under Title XX of the Social Security Act.

We will also depend upon the revitalized Community Services Administration to develop new approaches to assist the poor.

THE ELDERLY

Last year saw the enactment of Social Security financing legislation that will assure the system's financial integrity into the next century. This year the Administration will continue to work for strengthened legislation against unwarranted age discrimination in the Federal and private sector. We will propose legislation to extend and strengthen the Older Americans Act and we will seek a 13% increase in funding for programs providing daily meals to the elderly, raising the total of daily meals served to 385,000. In addition, the Administration will work to assure that the contributions of older Americans are sought in our efforts to meet national needs.

HOUSING

Last year we made progress toward our national goal of a decent home in a suitable environment for every American family. 1977 was a good year for housing, generally, with total new starts exceeding two million. And we have renewed the Federal government's commitment to housing for the needy.

Early last year, the Administration proposed major new initiatives to meet the housing needs of low- and moderate-income Americans—initiatives which are central to our urban development strategy. We had about 118,000 starts under section 8 and public housing subsidized programs in 1977. We look forward to another 30 percent increase in subsidized housing starts in these programs for 1978, and 92,000 starts in the Assisted Housing Rehabilitation Loan Programs. We will reassess our national housing needs and goals and our current housing and credit policies designed to meet those needs.

In 1978, the Administration will strengthen its commitment to meet the housing needs of all communities with a variety of expanded programs and new initiatives:

—Rental housing assistance to an additional 400,000 low-income families, and help to enable an additional 50,000 moderate-income families to own their own homes. The total number of families receiving housing assistance will increase from 2.6 million in 1977 to 3.1 million in 1979.

—More funds for the rehabilitation loan program under section 312, with an expansion of existing programs for substantial renovations and the creation of a new moderate rehabilitation program under section 8.

—A major new operating subsidy program for 1979. This new program, coupled with improved management controls and the monitoring of troubled projects, is intended to reduce the inventory of defaulted projects and aid in restoring distressed urban areas. The Department of Housing and Urban Development has made substantial progress in 1977 in reducing the stock of defaulted projects. This new program will give the Department additional tools. Outlays for this program are estimated to total $52 million in 1979.

—A Federal financing mechanism for assisted housing projects through use of the GNMA Tandem program.

—A targeted GNMA Tandem program which will provide subsidies designed to bring middle-income families back to the cities.

—Targeting of rural housing programs to lower-income residents, including a special program to help very poor families own their own homes.

—Continuing high levels of production of housing for the elderly and handicapped.

TRANSPORTATION

This year we will build on the efforts we made last year to strengthen the Nation's transportation system by decreasing consumer costs, pursuing increased energy efficiency, and improving safety:

- negotiation of a new US-UK bilateral air services agreement;
- approval of new international air routes from a number of American cities;
- requiring passive restraint systems on all new automobiles by 1984;
- setting new fuel efficiency standards for 1981-1984 model automobiles;
- beginning work on the Northeast Corridor Railroad Improvement Program;
- passing an all-cargo airline deregulation bill.

We will also continue our policy of increasing competition and reducing airfares in international flights, and pursue additional bilateral agreements. Consumers have already benefited from reduced international fares and improved service.

Highway and Transit Programs

We will soon propose a comprehensive highway and transit program, which will provide more than $45 billion in total authorizations in the 1979-1982 period. The program will give states and localities more flexibility in planning and programming their highway and transit funding, by reducing the number of narrow, categorical accounts and by using consolidated accounts for a wider range of potential transportation projects.

In addition, we will make funding of transportation programs more uniform and give localities more control over highway and mass transit funds in large urban areas.

Highway Safety

The Administration will propose legislation to strengthen our efforts for highway safety and to reduce restrictions on the states' use of Federal highway safety grant funds. That legislation will earmark funds for the Department of Transportation to support important highway safety projects, such as the 55 mile per hour speed limit program.

Inland Waterway User Fees

Users of Federal inland waterways should pay fees which will pay a substantial part of the cost of constructing, operating and maintaining those waterways. My Administration will continue to work closely with Congress toward passage of a bill that will, for the first time, establish inland waterway user fees.

Aircraft Noise Abatement

My Administration will again seek passage of legislation to control aircraft noise.

No-Fault Automobile Insurance

We continue to support legislation to establish Federal minimum standards for no-fault automobile insurance.

VETERANS

In 1977, we took a number of steps to make certain that the country continues to meet the special needs of our millions of veterans. Legislation was passed to increase compensation benefits for service-connected disabilities, benefits under the G.I. Bill, and veterans pension benefits. Millions of veterans will feel the effects of these increases this year.

In 1978, we will further improve our veterans programs by:

—initiating a government-wide review of the problems of Vietnam veterans and the means by which current programs can be made more effective in meeting their needs;

—beginning new programs to deal with problems of alcohol, drug abuse and psychological readjustment;

—proposing increased benefits for service-connected disabilities, and improvements in the veterans pension program;

—continuing special employment programs for Vietnam-era veterans.

ARTS AND HUMANITIES

Americans are increasingly aware that the arts and humanities preserve and transmit our heritage, enrich our lives, and contribute significantly to the social and economic well-being of our Nation. This Administration is committed to fostering the highest standards of creativity and scholarship in an open partnership between public and private sectors—and we believe that the products of this commitment must be available to the many Americans who wish to share in them. This year's substantial increases in the budgets for the Arts and Humanities Endowments demonstrate my strong belief in the value of these programs.

MAKING THE GOVERNMENT MORE EFFICIENT AND MORE RESPONSIVE

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Civil Service Reform

The Civil Service System is too often a bureaucratic maze which stifles the initiative of our dedicated Government employees while inadequately protecting their rights. Our 2.8 million civil servants are governed by outdated rules and institutions that keep them from being as efficient as they would like to be. No one is more frustrated by this system than hard-working public servants. Therefore, one of my major priorities in 1978 will be to ensure passage of the first comprehensive reform of the system since its creation nearly a century ago—reforms developed with the direct involvement of civil servants. Early this year, Congress will receive legislation and a reorganization plan to:

- restructure the institutions that run the Civil Service;
- increase safeguards against abuses of official power;
- provide greater incentives for managers to improve the Government's efficiency and responsiveness;
- reduce the system's red tape and delays;
- speed the procedures for dealing with employee grievances and disciplinary actions;
- make equal employment opportunities more effective.

Last year the Administration acted to protect Federal employees from the loss of a job due to reorganization. Such protection will be maintained.

Hatch Act Reform

I will continue to support reform of the Hatch Act, which would restore the right of most Civil Service employees to participate in the political process.

Part-time and Flexi-time Employment

To help obtain Federal jobs for the elderly, the handicapped, women, and others with family responsibilities, all Federal agencies will carry forward renewed efforts to increase part-time and flexi-time employment opportunities.

REORGANIZATION, MANAGEMENT AND REGULATORY REFORM

The Government Reorganization Project will keep working to make the Government more responsive and efficient. Last year we combined parts of 11 agencies into one Department of Energy, streamlined the Executive Office of the President and reduced the White House Staff, and proposed the abolition of nearly 500 advisory committees and small agencies.

In addition to the upcoming Civil Service and education reform efforts, we will soon submit proposals:

- to restructure our equal employment programs to provide better protection for the rights of minorities and women, and to ease the burden of compliance on State and local government as well as business;
- to improve the administration of justice; and
- to reorganize our disaster assistance programs.

Additional studies are under way in many other areas, and several of these will result in reorganization proposals later this year. Efforts to improve Federal cash management continue.

We are also vigorously pursuing the effort begun last year to reduce the burden of outdated, ineffective, and nit-picking regulations. For example, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare eliminated 5% of their regulations, the Federal Trade Commission rescinded 111 outdated sets of rules on trade practices and both the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission have moved to allow more competition, which has led to lower prices. In 1978, we will continue these efforts.

Worker Health and Safety

The Occupational Health and Safety Administration has already slashed its paperwork requirements by 50% and eliminated 1,100 unnecessary regulations, while improving its capacity to protect workers. This spring the Task Force on Worker Safety will make further recommendations to increase protection for workers and minimize employer cost.

Airline Regulatory Reform

Last year, I signed legislation deregulating all cargo air transportation. This year, I will continue to work for passage of the airline regulatory reform bill for passengers. That bill will allow air carriers to compete through lower fares, new services, and new markets, without excessive government interference or disruption of service to small communities.

Trucking Regulatory Reform

Forty years of tight government controls have not done enough to bring us competitive prices, good service, and efficient use of fuel. We will consider measures to bring more competition into the motor carrier area.

Drugs

We will propose legislation to reform regulation of the drug industry, which will protect the consumer and make regulations fairer and less burdensome.

Regulatory Process

Early in 1978, I will issue an Executive Order to improve the regulatory process. This Order will require officials responsible for regulations to sign them; assure that policy-level officials are fully involved in the process; require that regulations be written in plain English; make it easier for the public to participate in the process; increase coordination between agencies with overlapping responsibilities; require a closer look at the cost of regulations before they are issued; and require "sunset" reviews of existing regulations.

I have also set up an interagency committee to help regulatory agencies review the economic effects of major regulations, so that we can be sure that the costs of each proposed regulation have been fully considered. In this way we will be able to identify the least costly means of achieving our regulatory goals.

Paperwork Reduction

In 1977, my Administration decreased by 12% the paperwork burden that the Government imposes on the people. This was done by eliminating, consolidating, simplifying, and decreasing the frequency of reports. That savings is the equivalent of 50,000 full-time workers filling out Federal forms for a full year. All departments and agencies are currently setting goals for further substantial reductions in 1978. All reporting requirements associated with grant-in-aid programs will be subject to "sunset" review, and ended unless they are found necessary. In addition, we are reviewing the recommendations of the Commission on Federal Paperwork.

LABOR LAW REFORM

Last year we proposed legislation to reform our Nation's labor laws, in order to streamline the conduct of elections for employee representation and strengthen the enforcement powers of the National Labor Relations Board. We will work closely with Congress to ensure early passage of this bill, which is one of my highest legislative goals this year.

ELECTION REFORM

Last year, I supported proposals to make our elections fairer and more honest. These included public financing of Congressional campaigns, amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act and other election reforms. The Administration will continue to support Congressional action on these measures.

CONSUMER REFORM

We have taken many actions to benefit consumers by reducing the costs and improving the quality and safety of products. But one consumer initiative merits separate emphasis—the creation of the Office of Consumer Representation. We supported legislation last year to create such an Office, so that the interests of consumers could be represented in one government agency. The Office would not require additional government employees or expenditures since it would merely consolidate the consumer offices that already exist throughout the government. I am strongly committed to this legislation, and regard its enactment as one of the year's primary legislative priorities.

PUBLIC BROADCASTING REFORM

I proposed legislation last year to strengthen the public broadcasting service by providing increased long-term Federal support, insulation from political pressure, better coordination among the national organizations that run public broadcasting, and more opportunity for citizens to participate at the local level. My Administration will work with Congress this year to pass these reforms.

OPENNESS AND INTEGRITY

One of our primary goals is to make certain that the government's ethical standards are high, and that they are fully observed. And we must ensure that our government is open and responsive to the American people.

Last year, I took steps in that direction by requiring that the senior officials of my Administration publicly disclose their income and assets and pledge not to do business with their agencies for two years after leaving government service. To increase the government's openness, we took steps to make certain that the spirit as well as the letter of the Freedom of Information Act was observed. And we tried to bring the Presidency to the people with citizen forums and discussion panels throughout the country.

This year, we will continue these efforts, concentrating our primary attention on these areas:

Lobby Reform

The Administration will press for legislation requiring registration of lobbyists and thorough public disclosure of their lobbying activities. This long-overdue legislation will help reestablish confidence and trust in government.

Ethics

I applaud the strong ethical codes adopted last year by the House and Senate. I believe those codes and the standards established for my Administration's officials should be made law, so that they will clearly apply to public officials in the future. I urge Congress to pass the Public Officials Integrity Act this year.

Classification

We are completing a study of classification systems for government documents and I will shortly issue an Executive Order designed to eliminate improper and unnecessary classification and to ensure that documents are declassified more rapidly.

JUSTICECivil Rights and Equal Opportunity*

All Americans have fundamental civil rights requiring government protection, and all must be afforded equal opportunities to participate as full members in our society. In 1977, this principle guided my Administration in numerous areas, and I plan to make certain that this year our efforts on behalf of civil rights and equal opportunities continue unabated. Our Nation's concern for human rights must be heard as clearly at home as abroad.

Educational Opportunities

In 1977, my Administration vigorously attacked educational discrimination on the elementary, secondary and higher education levels. A major suit was pursued to ensure non-discrimination at the university level. At the same time, we recognized and reaffirmed the importance of affirmative action programs to ensure equal opportunities at educational institutions through our brief in the Bakke case. Our efforts to eliminate discrimination and promote affirmative action programs, relying on flexible goals rather than on quotas, will continue in full force.

Handicapped

HEW issued regulations and guidelines to implement legislation guaranteeing equal access to programs receiving financial assistance from HEW. This year the other Cabinet Departments will issue similar regulations, so that the rights of handicapped Americans will begin to be fully observed. We are providing a $50 million loan fund to States and institutions to enable them to comply with these regulations and to eliminate barriers which prevent access by our handicapped citizens to federally assisted programs and activities. We are proposing a major increase in funding under the Education of all Handicapped Children Act.

Equal Opportunity

This past year the Administration reaffirmed Executive Order 11375, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex in Federal employment. In addition,

I voluntarily placed the Executive Office of the President under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. This year, as part of our effort to eliminate sex discrimination in unemployment and education, I will continue to urge the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.

This past year the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was reorganized to increase its efficiency. As a result, the Commission made substantial progress on reducing its backlog of complaints. With the more than 40% increase in funding that will be proposed in the 1979 budget, the EEOC will be able to further reduce its backlog. Early this year I will propose to Congress a reorganization plan concerning equal opportunity enforcement which will strengthen the EEOC.

Anti-Foreign Boycott

I strongly supported, and signed, legislation to prohibit American participation in secondary economic boycotts by foreign countries. That law will be strictly enforced by my Administration this year through the regulations just issued by the Department of Commerce.

Minority Business

Last year, we started a number of programs to make more opportunities available for minority-owned businesses. That effort will be continued and strengthened this year:

—We are half way toward our two-year goal of $2 billion in Federal purchases of services and goods from minority-owned firms. We will reach that goal by the end of the year.

—We will raise the goal for Federal deposits in minority-owned banks above the 1977 level of $100 billion.

—We will continue to enforce the $400 million minority business set-aside provision in the local public works act, and may exceed that target.

—We will continue to implement the minority business set-aside policy established for contracts let in the Northeast Corridor Railroad Improvement Program.

Undocumented Aliens

Last year, I proposed legislation to impose sanctions on employers who hire undocumented aliens and to change the legal status of the many undocumented aliens now residing in this country. That legislation would afford undocumented aliens residing here continuously since before 1970 the opportunity to apply for permanent resident status. It would create a new five-year temporary resident status for those undocumented aliens who resided here continuously from 1970 to January 1, 1977. I want to work with Congress this year toward passage of an undocumented aliens bill, for this social and economic problem can no longer be ignored.

Native Americans

The Administration has acted consistently to uphold its trusteeship responsibility to Native Americans. We also have elevated the post of Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the level of Assistant Secretary of Interior. In 1978, the Administration will review Federal Native American policy and will step up efforts to help Indian tribes assess and manage their natural resources.

LEGAL AND JUDICIAL REFORM

Last year, my Administration began a number of major efforts to improve our Nation's legal and judicial system, and we intend to pursue those and related efforts fully this year.

Criminal Code Reform

We have worked closely with members of Congress to develop a proposed revision of the Nation's Criminal Code. That revision will codify in one part of the U.S. Code all Federal crime laws and will reform many outdated and inconsistent criminal laws. My Administration will work closely with Congress this year to seek passage of the first complete codification of the Nation's criminal laws.

Judicial Reform

The Federal judicial system has suffered for many years from an inadequate number of judges, and we will continue to work with Congress on an Omnibus Judgeship Bill to correct this problem. We will also continue our efforts to use our judges more effectively, through legislation which we have proposed to expand significantly the authority of magistrates, to increase the use of arbitration, and to tighten Federal jurisdiction. We will work this year to complete Congressional action on these bills.

Wiretap Reform

Last year we proposed legislation reforming our approach to electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes, and affording greater protection to our citizens. Essentially, that legislation would require the government to obtain a court order before beginning any foreign intelligence wiretaps in this country. My Administration supports early passage of this much needed legislation.

Anti-trust Enforcement and Competition

Our Nation's anti-trust laws must be vigorously enforced. Therefore, I recently established a Presidential Commission to review Federal anti-trust enforcement, and to make its recommendations this year.

Last year, we initiated a new program, administered by the Department of Justice, to provide grant funds to State Attorneys General in order to strengthen anti-trust enforcement at the State level. We expect to see the results of this program this year.

By reducing government regulation, we can increase competition and thereby lower consumer costs. This year we will continue our deregulatory efforts in the legislative and administrative areas in order to reduce anti-competitive practices and abuses.

Crime Reduction and Criminal Justice

This past year the Reorganization Project and the Justice Department have been developing proposals to reorganize and to improve our Nation's criminal justice system, in order to strengthen enforcement and ensure equal justice. This year I will be sending a Message to Congress on criminal justice and crime reduction. My Message will include proposals to:

- reorganize the Federal Law Enforcement Assistance Administration;
- improve our criminal research efforts;
- develop better law enforcement methods against organized crime, white collar crime, drug abuse, and public corruption; and
- develop minimum standards for Federal correctional institutions.

FBI and Intelligence Agencies' Charters

I plan to issue a comprehensive Executive Order to govern the intelligence activities of the FBI, CIA, NSA and the Defense Department. That Executive Order will be the basis for the Administration's recommendations on legislative charters governing the activities of the FBI and various intelligence agencies.

Privacy

The Privacy Protection Study Committee recently proposed an extensive list of new legislative and regulatory safeguards. My Administration is analyzing these recent proposals and will develop this year a program to ensure that personal privacy is adequately protected.

District of Columbia

We proposed last year a series of reforms, including full voting representation in Congress, designed to give the residents of the District significantly greater control over their local affairs. My Administration will continue to work for the passage of those reforms this year.

DEVELOPING AND PROTECTING OUR NATURAL RESOURCES

ENERGY

National Energy Policy

In April 1977, I proposed to the Nation a comprehensive national energy policy. That policy is based on three principles, which will continue to guide our progress in 1978:

- we must learn to use energy more efficiently and more carefully, through conservation measures, including retrofitting our buildings, factories and homes;
- we must shift from oil and natural gas, which are becoming more scarce, to coal and renewable sources of energy which we have in abundance;
- we must provide fair prices to producers of energy, so as to encourage development of new supplies without permitting windfall profits.

The debate on this comprehensive policy has been long and arduous. A number of difficult, contentious issues remain to be settled. I am confident, however, that the Congress recognizes the seriousness of our energy problem and will act expeditiously on this program early this year. Securing passage of an acceptable energy bill—one which is fair to consumers, provides needed energy savings, and is prudent from a fiscal and budgetary standpoint—will continue as our highest and most urgent national priority in 1978.

Energy Statutes and Actions

We have already begun to lay a strong foundation for implementation of a national energy policy. In 1977 we took steps to put in place important policies and structural reforms needed to meet our energy goals:

—Creation of a new Department of Energy which combines, for the first time, major governmental functions of energy research, regulation, pricing policy, information collection and dissemination, and overall policy development. Without a strong organization, we would not hope to implement a comprehensive national policy.

—Congress has approved our proposed route for a pipeline to bring natural gas from the North Slope of Alaska to the lower 48 states.

—Passage of the Emergency Natural Gas Act to cope with the hardships of last winter's freeze and assure that high priority gas users were not cut off during supply emergencies.

—Funding of more than $4 billion to store the first 500 million barrels of oil in a strategic petroleum reserve. We have already begun to fill that reserve, and we remain committed to a 1 billion barrel strategic reserve by 1985.

Outer Continental Shelf Legislation

Legislation to improve the management of the Outer Continental Shelf for oil and gas development is a major item of unfinished business pending before Congress. Prompt passage is necessary so that we can have the benefit of the new law as we move to open more offshore areas to development and production. This bill mandates long-needed reforms in the leasing program to provide for the necessary development of offshore oil and gas while enhancing competition among oil companies, assuring that the public receives a fair return for the sale of the public's oil and gas resources, and protecting our marine and coastal resources.

Nuclear Energy

The United States has also advanced a policy to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons around the world. An International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation has been established with wide international participation to examine alternatives to existing proliferation-prone technologies. In addition, legislation was proposed last year to establish better controls on export of nuclear fuels and technologies. We will work with Congress to secure passage of that legislation early in 1978.

Our commitment to preventing the spread of nuclear weapons has led us to reorient our own domestic nuclear policies. I have deferred indefinitely the commercial reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel and plutonium recycling.

The Clinch River Plant itself would waste more than $2 billion while teaching us little that we do not already know, or cannot learn from our existing nuclear research and development program. I have recommended that the Clinch River Breeder Project be stopped, because it represents a premature and unwise commitment to commercialization of technology that we do not now need.

However, we intend to continue to develop the nuclear energy the Nation needs.

We will continue to move forward with a major research program on breeder technology.

We will begin to implement our program for government management of spent fuel from nuclear reactors.

In 1978, my Administration will work towards a policy for safe, permanent disposal of nuclear wastes.

In 1978 and beyond, we will carry on a vigorous nuclear research and development program designed to give us safe technologies that will reduce the danger of nuclear proliferation and will be environmentally responsible. We will also seek to improve the current system of licensing nuclear power reactors in order to cut bureaucratic delays, while firmly maintaining and strengthening health, safety and environmental requirements. I will propose nuclear licensing legislation to the Congress this year.

ENVIRONMENT

One of my deepest personal commitments is to a clean, healthy environment for all of our citizens. Last May, I outlined this Administration's environmental priorities and policies in a comprehensive Environmental Message. Working closely with the Congress, we have made good progress on many of the measures contained in that Message; it will continue to guide our administrative and legislative actions in 1978. Overall, we will:

- increase our environmental outlays by more than 10%, and provide the new staff resources necessary to ensure that the Nation's environmental laws are obeyed;

- determine the best way of enforcing the landmark environmental statutes enacted in 1977, taking considerations of science and public policy into account;

- pursue several important initiatives, including a National Heritage program and designation of national interest lands in Alaska, to manage our precious natural resources better and to preserve our heritage.

Environmental Statutes

In 1977, we worked closely with Congress to enact three of the most significant environmental statutes in recent years:

- The Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act establishes a joint Federal-State program to make sure we use economically and environmentally sound strip-mining practices. It also sets up a fund to reclaim lands which have been ravaged by uncontrolled, careless mining, and provides clear, stable policy direction for operators.

- The Clean Air Act Amendments establish strict but achievable standards for auto emissions and ensure continued progress in reducing pollution from stationary air pollution sources.

- The Clean Water Act authorizes many of our most important water clean-up programs and will protect our Nation's wetlands without unnecessary Federal requirements. The Act also reforms the sewage treatment construction grant program and gives strong emphasis to the control of toxic chemicals in our environment.

We will provide the leadership and the funding necessary to carry out these new laws.

Water Policy

In 1977, an effort was begun to ensure that Federal programs and policies provide sound and fair management of our limited and valuable water resources. We began a complete review of Federal water policy, which will be completed this year. After close consultation with the Congress, the States, and the public, we will propose measures needed to carry out the recommendations of that study.

We will also continue with the strong dam safety inspection program which was initiated late last year to make sure our dams, public or private, are safe.

Alaska Lands

Last year, I sent Congress a proposal for use of Federal lands in Alaska. This proposal will protect 92 million acres for the public, will create or expand 13 national parks and reserves, 13 national wildlife refuges, and will confer wild and scenic river status on 33 waterways. I hope Congress will adopt these measures, which are needed this year to preserve the unique natural treasures of Alaska and, at the same time, permit the orderly development of Alaskan resources.

Redwood National Park

Redwood National Park contains some of the Nation's largest and oldest trees. Last year, to protect these trees from destruction by commercial logging at the edges of the Park, legislation was proposed to expand its boundaries. We will press for Congressional action on this bill in 1978.

National Heritage Program

We will shortly be proposing a Federal-State program to preserve unique elements of our natural and cultural heritage. This program, modeled after successful ones in several states, will be administered by the Department of the Interior. Although many of the necessary steps can be taken administratively, we will seek some new legislative authority in 1978.

Federal Compliance with Environmental Laws

My Administration is committed to the principle that the Federal government must set a good example of compliance with those environmental laws and regulations which have been established for the private sector. So far, unfortunately, the Federal record has been found wanting. My 1979 budget includes money to bring Federal facilities into compliance with existing environmental laws and regulations.

Federal Reclamation

In 1977, we began a thorough review of the 1902 Reclamation Act. After the study has been completed and reviewed this year, I will propose to Congress any changes needed to modernize the law.

Mining Law Reform

Last year the Administration proposed legislation to replace the archaic 1872 Mining Law with a modern leasing system for publicly-owned mineral resources. The 1872 system has resulted in withdrawal of large areas of land from mineral exploration as the only tool for environmental protection. The Administration's proposal would establish a balanced system where the public interests in mineral development, environmental protection and revenue to the U.S. Treasury will all be accomplished. Special provisions would minimize burdens on small operators and provide incentives for exploration.

Oil Spills

Last year I proposed to Congress legislation which would establish strict liability standards for oil tanker spills and would improve regulations aimed at preventing future oil spills. That legislation is still needed.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

The health of American science and technology and the creation of new knowledge is important to our economic well-being, to our national security, to our ability to help solve pressing national problems in such areas as energy, environment, health, natural resources. I am recommending a program of real growth of scientific research and other steps that will strengthen the Nation's research centers and encourage a new surge of technological innovation by American industry. The budget increase of 11% for basic research will lead to improved opportunities for young scientists and engineers, and upgraded scientific equipment in the Nation's research centers. I am determined to maintain our Nation's leadership role in science and technology.

We will continue America's progress in the field of space exploration with continued development of the space shuttle system and procurement of four shuttle orbiters for operations from both East and West coasts, development of a spacecraft to study for the first time the polar regions of the Sun, and increased outlays for demonstrations of the practical applications of space-based systems and development of space technology.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

A year ago I set five goals for United States foreign policy in the late 1970s and early 1980s: to reassert America's moral leadership; to strengthen our traditional ties with friends and allies; to work toward a more just international system; to promote regional reconciliation; and to preserve peace through preparedness and arms control. These goals continue to underlie my agenda for 1978.

MORAL LEADERSHIP

During the past year, we have placed American foreign policy on a new course consistent with the values and highest ideals of the American people. We are trying to limit the worldwide sale of arms; we are trying to prevent nuclear explosives—and the ability to make them—from spreading to more countries; we are building a new relationship with the developing countries, and we are promoting human rights throughout the world.

Human Rights

Virtually everywhere, human rights have become an important issue—especially in countries where they are systematically violated. There has been real progress, and for that the United States can take some credit.

We have taken the lead among Western nations at the Belgrade Review Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Working closely with our Allies, and with neutral and non-aligned nations, our delegation—led by Ambassador Arthur Goldberg—has conducted a thorough review of implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, in all its aspects. We have made clear the United States is committed to the full implementation of the Final Act in this and other areas. We will seek a further Review Conference in two years; meanwhile, we will press for better implementation of the Helsinki Final Act.

Non-Proliferation

We must not ignore the enormous dangers posed by the unrestrained spread of nuclear weapons technology. We recognize the benefits of commercial nuclear power, but we also must acknowledge the risks. We believe that all countries can enjoy the benefits, while the risks are minimized, by developing safer technologies and creating new institutions to manage and safeguard all phases of the nuclear fuel cycle. Meanwhile, we have decided to postpone a premature commitment to technologies we cannot yet safely manage on a commercial scale; and we are seeking to persuade others that there are sound economic and energy reasons for them to do likewise.

Arms Sales

The world is threatened by the spiraling increase in trade of conventional arms. Not only do these arms increase the likelihood of conflict, they also divert resources from other human needs. It will not be easy to slow this spiral. We will begin to cut back on our own sales in recognition of the fact that, as the world's principal seller, we have a duty to take the first step. But we know that our efforts can only succeed if other major arms suppliers and recipients cooperate.

TIES WITH FRIENDS AND ALLIES

The energy crisis has underscored the reality of interdependence among nations and the need for a stable international financial and trading system. Our own actions reflect the belief that consultations with traditional friends and dialogue with developing nations are the only way that the United States can provide the economic and political leadership which the world expects of us.

Working with the Allies

During the past year, the United States restored our traditional friends and allies to the center of our foreign policy. Within days after his inauguration, the Vice President visited Brussels, Rome, Bonn, Paris, Reykjavík, and Tokyo. I met frequently in Washington with European and Japanese leaders. I participated in the Economic Summit in London, the 1977 NATO Summit, and a Four-Power Summit with leaders of Britain, Germany, and France. At the beginning of 1978, I visited France and Belgium—and while in Brussels, made the first visit by an American President to the headquarters of the European Community. We have also consulted with our European Allies on such diverse subjects as SALT, MBFR, the Middle East, Africa, human rights, the Belgrade Conference, energy, non-proliferation, the global economy, and North-South relations. We will intensify these efforts this year, expanding the list to include close consultations with the Allies on major arms control issues.

On May 30–31, we will host a NATO Summit in Washington, and we are also planning another Economic Summit this year.

We have shown in our dealings with Japan that close allies can find solutions to shared problems. Early in the year, we were concerned about nuclear reprocessing in Japan, but through flexibility and goodwill on both sides a suitable accommodation was reached on the building of a nuclear reprocessing plant there. Most recently, we reached agreement with the Japanese on ways to deal with their large current account surplus. Our trade and economic talks are another example of constructive action.

International Economic Cooperation

We are working to improve and extend the international economic system, to strengthen international economic institutions, and to ensure that international economic competition takes place in an orderly fashion. We will seek to improve cooperation among nations in the IMF, the GATT, the World Bank, the OECD, and other international organizations which have enabled us to maintain an open, liberal, trade and payments system.

The American economy remains strong. Our competitive position in international trade is excellent. In 1977 our merchandise exports exceeded imports (except for oil) by a large amount. Our inflation rate is among the lowest in the industrial world.

But our balance of trade and payments incurred a large and worrisome deficit. There were two main causes:

—In 1977, $45 billion flowed out to pay for imported oil. This wiped out what would otherwise have been a trade surplus.

—The demand here for foreign goods was much greater than the demand for American goods abroad. In 1977, American GNP increased roughly twice as fast in real terms as the GNP of our main trading partners.

Against this background, the exchange rate of the dollar declined relative to the currencies of Japan, Germany, Switzerland, and other European countries. These developments led to disorderly conditions in the exchange markets. In December I made clear that the United States would intervene to counter these disorders, and we have done so.

To assure the integrity of the dollar we must act now:

—We need a healthy and growing United States economy, with adequate investment, a prudent budget, and declining inflation. This will make us more competitive and more attractive to foreign investors.

—We need to conserve energy and develop alternative sources of supply. This will reduce our dependence on imported oil, and cut the outflow of dollars.

—We need to see a more vigorous world economy. Stronger growth, particularly in countries like Germany, Japan, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, can help reduce our own deficits and bring stability to international payments.

Factors already at work will reduce our trade deficit. Economic activity in Europe and elsewhere should rise. Our oil imports should level off this year. The effect of new exchange rates that have already occurred will, when their full effect is realized, improve our trade balance by several billions of dollars. While our trade and payments deficit in 1978 will be large, our external position should show some improvement.

We must also augment our capacity to deal with possible strains and pressures by strengthening our international trade and monetary system. I urge the Congress to act promptly to approve United States participation in the IMF's Supplementary Financing Facility.

The trading nations of the world are engaged in negotiations to reduce barriers and improve the international trading system by a reciprocal and balanced opening of markets. Freer trade will enable us all to use the world's resources more efficiently and will contribute to economic growth.

We will also attempt to strengthen the rules that have regulated international trade during the last 30 years. International competition must take place within a framework of agreed rules that are recognized as appropriate and fair.

THE DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

One of the most critical issues facing the United States is our economic and political relationship with developing countries. Our economy has become visibly dependent on the developing world for supplies and markets.

North-South Dialogue

Throughout 1975 and 1976 the United States and other developed countries worked with a group of developing nations in the Conference of International Economic Cooperations (CIEC). That "North-South Dialogue" reached agreement on some issues in June 1977, but there remain a number of unresolved questions. The United States will continue to consult and negotiate with developing countries on questions like commodity price stabilization, technology, and a common fund for international buffer stocks. We will pursue the North-South dialogue in the months ahead, confident that the developed nations and the developing nations can agree upon measures that will let all nations participate more fully in the management of the world economy.

Africa

Our relations with Africa involve energy, human rights, economic development, and the North-South dialogue. The Maputo and Lagos Conferences demonstrated that African countries can discuss difficult problems with us, to mutual advantage. Our relations with Nigeria have improved dramatically.

The Administration's FY 79 budget substantially increases development assistance to Africa, including continued support for the African Development Fund, and other programs to help African governments meet their people's basic human needs. The growth of African regional institutions like the Sahel Development Fund is important to African development.

Latin-America/Caribbean

The Administration's approach to Latin America and the Caribbean recognizes this region's diversity. We have placed great importance on the protection and defense of human rights, on halting the proliferation of nuclear weapons capabilities, on restraining conventional arms sales, on contributing to the settlement of disputes, and on engaging Latin governments in global economic negotiations.

We are now seeking Senate ratification of Protocol I of the Treaty of Tlatelolco, and the American Convention on Human Rights. Through the Caribbean Group, we are trying to promote regional development. And we intend to help several nations develop alternative energy sources.

Panama

General Torrijos and I signed the two Panama Canal Treaties on September 9 [7], 1977. These treaties meet the legitimate interests of Panama and the United States and guarantee our permanent right to protect and defend the Canal. They will contribute importantly to regional stability.

Asia

The United States has sought to underline our desire for a close relationship with the developing countries of Asia through my visit to that continent and through regular contacts with the member countries of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. We welcome the cooperation with ASEAN of the developed countries of the region, such as Japan and Australia.

PROMOTING REGIONAL RECONCILIATION

The greatest danger to world peace and stability is not war among the great powers, but war among small nations. During the past year, the United States has helped to promote productive negotiations in two troubled regions: the Middle East and Southern Africa. We have also tried to settle conflicts in the Horn of Africa and on Cyprus. And we have negotiated two Panama Canal Treaties that will enhance our country's relations with all the nations of Latin America.

The Middle East

In an effort to break with the rigid approaches of the past and bring about an overall peace settlement, I have looked to three basic principles: normalization of political, economic and cultural relations through peace treaties; withdrawal of armed forces from occupied territory to recognized and secure borders and the establishment of effective security measures; and a resolution of the Palestinian question.

Significant progress toward peace in the Middle East was made last year; we particularly applaud President Sadat's courageous initiative, reciprocated by Prime Minister Begin, in launching direct negotiations. The United States will continue this year to encourage all parties to resolve this deep-seated conflict.

Southern Africa

The entering Administration inherited problems in Rhodesia, Namibia, and South Africa.

—With the British, the United States launched new Rhodesian discussions last year. The Anglo-American Plan of September 1 sets forth fair and workable principles for majority rule: a transition period leading to free elections, a UN presence, a constitution with a judicially protected bill of rights, and a Zimbabwe Development Fund.

—The five-power Contact Group, in which the United States participates, has held discussions with South Africa and with the Southwest Africa Peoples Organization and other interested parties on an internationally acceptable settlement for an independent Namibia under majority rule. This effort has produced wide agreement, including provisions for a substantial UN presence.

—The United States has told the South African Prime Minister that unless his nation begins a progressive transformation toward full political participation for all its people, our relations will suffer. We supported a Union Nations arms embargo on South Africa, prohibited "gray area" sales, and began a review of US/South African economic relations.

The Horn of Africa

Arms supplied by the Soviet Union now fuel both sides of a conflict in the Horn of Africa between Somalia and Ethiopia. There is a danger that the Soviet Union and Cuba will commit their own soldiers in this conflict, transforming it from a local war to a confrontation with broader strategic implications.

We deplore the fact that disagreements in this region have grown—with the assistance of outside powers—into bloody conflict. We have made clear to both sides that we will supply no arms for aggressive purposes. We will not recognize forcible changes in boundaries. We want to see the fighting end and the parties move from the battlefield to the negotiating table.

Cyprus

We hope that the groundwork was laid in 1977 for a permanent settlement in Cyprus and we are encouraging movement in that direction.

PRESERVING PEACE

During the past year, the Administration has assessed the threats to our own and our Allies' security, as well as our collective strength to combat these threats.

We have sought to promote responsible arms control efforts and to reduce competition in arms. Recognizing that a strong defense is the foundation of our security, we have made certain that our defense spending will be sufficient and used to maximum effect.

Arms Control

The fundamental purposes of our arms limitations efforts are to promote our own national security and to strengthen international stability, thereby enhancing the prospects for peace everywhere.

—We are trying to move the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks toward more ambitious objectives. We want to reduce, not just contain, the competition in the number of strategic weapons possessed by the United States and the Soviet Union, and to limit qualitative improvements in weapons which merely raise the risks to all of us. Precisely because of our determination to obtain both of these objectives negotiations have been difficult and prolonged. However, I am confident that the agreement that we will present to the Congress will meet them.

—We have also made solid progress toward an objective that the United States has pursued for many years: a comprehensive treaty banning all nuclear explosions. This treaty will be open to all nations of the world. It will be a major step toward reduced reliance on these weapons and toward halting their further spread in the world.

—At the same time we are seeking arms limitations agreements with the Soviet Union that will contribute to security and stability in various regions of the world. In Europe we and our NATO Allies are seeking a mutual and balanced force reductions agreement that will achieve greater stability and balance at lower levels of forces. In the Indian Ocean, where neither we nor the Soviet Union has yet deployed military power on a large scale, we are working for an agreement to prevent a major military competition.

—For the first time, we have begun to negotiate with the Soviet Union the outlines of a treaty banning chemical warfare.

—An essential element of American security is the maintenance of stability in the Western Pacific, where the United States plays a major role in maintaining a balance of power. We are seeking to re-adjust our military presence in Korea by reducing our ground forces on the Peninsula and undertaking compensatory measures to ensure that an adequate balance of forces remain. We are talking with the Filipino government about the future of our military bases there.

—We are continuing the process of normalization of our relations with the People's Republic of China within the framework of the Shanghai Communiqué.

—In the last year, we have sought to halt the worldwide spread of nuclear weapons capacity. Nearly 40 nations have joined with us in an effort to find nuclear power sources that cannot be readily used for building nuclear weapons.

Defense Posture/Budget

The defense budget that I am recommending to Congress will fulfill our most pressing defense needs. I am requesting increases in defense spending that more than compensate for inflation. They are needed to maintain an adequate military balance in the face of continued Soviet military efforts.

—As we negotiate with the Soviets over strategic arms, we are continuing to preserve essential equivalence in strategic nuclear strength. Here our technological advantage over the Soviet Union is most apparent. We are building cruise missiles, which together with upgraded B-52s will assure the capability of this element of our Triad. We are continuing to develop the M-X missile system in case we need to deploy them. In this budget, I am requesting funds for continued increase in our Trident submarine force, which is our most important strategic program because submarines are so hard for any enemy to destroy.

—With our NATO Allies we are trying to improve the initial combat capability of NATO forces. We will improve the readiness of critical combat units, enhance American capability to send ground and tactical air forces reinforcements, and increase our permanent forces there. To lay the foundation for future improvements, the budget I propose requests 18% increases in the procurement of equipment for the Army. The United States is not taking these steps alone; we are participating in a mutual effort.

—The importance of sea forces to United States national security is undisputed. The Navy receives the largest share of the defense budget, and I am requesting funds to continue its modernization. But, we need to examine the appropriate size and mix of United States naval forces in the future. Therefore, I have deferred spending for new aircraft carriers until a current Defense Department study is completed early this year. While we maintain our naval strength, we should have the capability to deploy rapidly a light but effective combat force worldwide, if necessary, without overseas base support. To this end, I am requesting funds for a vigorous airlift enhancement program.

In these and other ways, we are seeking to develop a foreign policy which is wider in scope; a foreign policy which recognizes global diversity; and a foreign policy which builds a more just and stable international system.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
January 19, 1978.

Economic Report and Tax and Budget Messages

*Remarks at the Signing Ceremony.
January 20, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. It's a pleasure this morning to come and sign three very important documents, I think, which describe what our Nation has done this past year and what we expect to do this coming year and in the years afterwards.

As I mentioned last night in my State of the Union speech, the economy has made great progress in 1977, and we hope through proper economic decisions and careful planning and cooperation between me, the Congress, and the public sector of our Nation, to continue this progress during 1978.

We anticipate that the increase in the gross national product will be almost 5 percent, that the unemployment rate will continue to go down—perhaps not as rapidly as in 1977, but at a steady pace—and that we can indeed control inflation.

We have a strong economy. Our Nation quite often forgets in transient times of adverse monthly reports that we are still the strongest nation on Earth. We've been blessed with a free enterprise system that encourages initiative. We've been given great natural resources by God, and we've husbanded them very well and we can do better. And I think we have an attitude and a confidence that augers success for us in the future.

This Economic Report is one that describes very clearly the challenges for this coming year, and it also describes how we can indeed continue the good progress that has been shown in our Nation during the last 12 months.

I want to congratulate all the people behind me for having helped to make it possible to give this good report and who will help me during the coming year to carry out these programs and to reach the goals that we've described here.

[At this point, the President signed the Economic Report.]

Charlie, thank you very much. Would you like to add anything?

DR. SCHULTZE. No, sir. I think you did so well on it that I'm afraid anything I added would detract. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. The next document that I'd like to sign today is the tax message, which I outlined in very brief terms last night.

This is a very far-reaching and complicated tax proposal, but at the same time, it greatly simplifies the tax laws of our Nation. It makes them much more fair and equitable, easier to understand, and also gives a $25 billion reduction of the tax burdens on the American people.

Included in the tax message is a delineation of substantial tax reforms, quite far-reaching; some have said the most far-reaching set of tax proposals in the history of our country. These, I hope, will be acted upon by the Congress expeditiously. Without the tax reforms, the amount of the tax reduction would not be advisable. So, tax reform and tax reduction are tied very intimately together.

I think that the Treasury Department has done an outstanding job. And even at this signing ceremony, I would like to say that throughout this document, which is highly professional in its quality, the hand of Larry Woodworth can be seen on almost every page. He will be receiving an award, posthumously, in a few moments. But I think I would be remiss if I didn't point out the great contribution that he made, the profound professionalism that he brought to his job, and the, I think, unequaled trust and confidence that Members of both the House and the Senate, the executive branch of Government, and the public placed in this wonderful man. Unfortunately, he died this past fall, but his memory lives with us. And I think the superb quality of the tax message is attributable in a great degree to his contribution.

Secretary Blumenthal, I'd also like for you to congratulate all your people for the good work that has been done. I look forward to a rapid passage of this legislation. It will be effective, according to our proposal, on the 1st of October 1978.

We anticipate fairly good economic news for the United States the first two quarters of this year. We have a good momentum going, fairly low inventories which will encourage production to continue to go up. But without this tax reduction, the dampening effect of the present trends will be felt the last half of this year. And we want to be sure that this progress that has been realized is uninterrupted and that tax reduction will be the key to sustaining growth, reduction in unemployment, and the containment and control of inflation.

So, I'd like now to sign the tax measure that will go to Congress. The tax measure will go up when?

SECRETARY BLUMENTHAL. Saturday.

[At this point, the President signed the tax message.]

THE PRESIDENT. Saturday. In both these instances, Charlie Schultze and Mike Blumenthal would have given the press a detailed briefing on them, and then the messages will go to Congress quite soon.

The third document that I'd like to sign—and this is just a part of it—is the 1979 fiscal year budget. This is the first budget that I've had a chance to prepare as President. I inherited the 1978 fiscal year budget, and we could make some last-minute changes in it.

This has been completely evolved using the new zero-based budgeting technique. It was an extraordinarily gratifying experience for me and, I think, for the officers and workers in the Office of Management and Budget. It's tight. It's well-considered. It meets the human needs of our people. It improves greatly our own national defense capability. It doesn't waste money. It has a relatively low increase in expenditures compared to previous years. It's a good step toward a balanced budget if we can sustain the economic prosperity that seems to be in progress. And I think it's a great tribute to the professionals who have helped in its preparation.

I've spent a great deal of time this past year in meetings with the budget officers and also in meetings with the leaders of the departments and agencies who will be served well by this budget. We have, I think, a good presentation to make to the Congress, and I believe it will be well received.

So, I'm proud of the '79 fiscal year budget and believe that in the future, we can do an even better job as the innovative and progressive consequences of a zero-based budgeting technique are learned even better by the agencies of our Government.

[At this point, the President signed the budget message.]

Mike, would you or Jim like to add a word?

SECRETARY BLUMENTHAL. No, Mr. President. I think you've said it all.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I won't answer questions this morning on these, but as I said earlier, Jim McIntyre, on the budget, and Mike Blumenthal, on the tax reductions and reform measure, and Charlie Schultze, on the economy, will be available for complete briefings on these documents and on our proposals.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10 a.m. in the Roosevelt Room at the White House.

Present at the ceremony were Charles L. Schultze, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, Secretary of the Treasury W. Michael Blumenthal, and James T. McIntyre, Jr., Acting Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Alexander Hamilton Award for Laurence N. Woodworth

Remarks of the President and Secretary of the Treasury Blumenthal at the Presentation Ceremony. January 20, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. As I mentioned earlier as I signed the tax message, there was a special feeling in the minds and hearts of everyone who knew Larry Woodworth that he exemplified every attribute of what a public servant should be.

He occupied a position with the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee where he worked closely with both groups, and he had such a high integrity and such superb professional competence that his word was accepted in the most detailed and controversial issues facing our Nation's tax decisions. I don't know of another public servant, a professional, who can equal the esteem with which Larry Woodworth was known.

I got to know Larry Woodworth before I became President. He came down to Plains to describe to me some of the questions, some of the problems, some of the opportunities with the tax structures of our Nation. He was the first Assistant Secretary that I was privileged to appoint. And as he moved from the legislative into the executive branch of Government, the move was an uninterrupted means for him to continue to contribute.

This is the highest award that the Treasury Department can give, the Alexander Hamilton Award, for outstanding service to a man who was not only outstanding in his professional life but also in his private life. He was a deeply religious man, and the morality that permeated his activities and his attitudes was an inspiration to all who knew him.

He was a Sunday school teacher. He was a good family man. And his loss, which was quite unexpected, came in the service of his Nation. And I know that Secretary Blumenthal, who is the one who grants this award, would like to add a word to what I've said about Larry Woodworth.

I wish he was here to accept the award in person, but his wife is here, Mrs. Woodworth.

Mr. Secretary, I'll give the award to you now for presentation.

SECRETARY BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. President. I merely wish to echo what you have said about Larry Woodworth and to say that his expertise and his professionalism were a great inspiration to all of us in the Treasury and, particularly, I learned a great deal from him.

I came very quickly to admire him and to rely on his judgment and to follow his advice. He had more to do than any single person in helping the President shape this program, which he's sending to the Congress today, and virtually every page of that document and every recommendation that the President is making, in one way or another, has the stamp and the flavor of Larry Woodworth printed on it.

So, this is a very special day for all of us. I therefore would like to present to you the Alexander Hamilton Award, Mrs. Woodworth, for Larry, together with the certificate and the citation.

THE PRESIDENT. He was also a good guy and a good friend. There was a personal thing about Larry, a warmth that just made everybody care for him.

MRS. WOODWORTH. Well, he thought very highly of you, as you know. And I always thought that we should have a double Sunday school lesson sometime. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. Thank you, everybody.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:11 a.m. in the Roosevelt Room at the White House. Laurence N. Woodworth was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy from February 24, 1977, until his death on December 7, 1977.

Executive Schedule

Executive Order 12035. January 20, 1978

RELATING TO CERTAIN POSITIONS IN LEVEL IV OF THE EXECUTIVE SCHEDULE

By virtue of the authority vested in me by Section 5317 of Title 5 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States of America, Section 1 of Executive Order No. 11861, as amended, placing certain positions in Level IV of the Executive Schedule, is further amended by deleting "Adviser to the Secretary (Counselor, Economic Policy Board), Department of the Treasury" in subsection (13) and inserting in lieu thereof "Assistant Secretary (Enforcement and Operations), Department of the Treasury”.

The Cyprus Conflict

*Message to the Congress Reporting on Progress Toward a Negotiated Settlement.
January 20, 1978*

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by Public Law 94-104, this report describes the progress that has been made during the last sixty days towards a negotiated settlement on Cyprus.

In my last such report to the Congress, submitted on October 28, I described with cautious optimism the efforts that the Administration had been undertaking to promote an early resumption of meaningful intercommunal negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations. Over the past sixty days we have continued to discuss the Cyprus issue extensively with Turkish, Greek and Cypriot representatives and with U.N. officials, our purpose remaining that of persuading the parties to resume intercommunal talks at the earliest possible date and to be prepared to come to the table with substantive, negotiable proposals.

The Cyprus situation was discussed in the bilateral meetings that Secretary Vance held with Greek Foreign Minister Papaligouras and Turkish Foreign Minister Caglayangil in Brussels in early December. These conversations and contacts with the two Cypriot communities have fortified our belief that a Cyprus settlement is earnestly desired by the parties concerned, and that they accept the need to resume negotiations to this end. Foreign Ministers Papaligouras and Caglayangil also met bilaterally in Brussels, and in a joint communique stated that Greece and Turkey would continue to encourage a prompt resumption of negotiations as a means of promoting a comprehensive solution of the Cyprus problem.

We hope that the recent elections in Greece will give new momentum to the search for a Cyprus settlement. Prime Minister Caramanlis said in his policy statement to the Chamber of Deputies in Athens on December 14 that his government “will continue to support the intercommunal talks under U.N. aegis and will provide its full support to the people of Cyprus . . .”

The Turkish Government has in recent weeks given public evidence of its favorable attitude towards a settlement on Cyprus. In a series of public interviews late in November, Foreign Minister Caglayangil declared his support for an early resumption of negotiations and indicated Turkish flexibility with respect to both territorial and constitutional aspects of a package agreement. He also called for economic cooperation between the two Cypriot communities, and reaffirmed the Turkish Government's intent to withdraw its troops from the island once a settlement is in effect. This Administration has welcomed Foreign Minister Caglayangil's statements as containing a number of positive elements, and we have also noted as steps in the right direction the Turkish Government's decisions to withdraw an air force unit and 700 of its ground forces from Cyprus. It is our hope and expectation, based on the Turkish Government's announcement, that additional troop withdrawals will be made. Steps such as these might improve the general atmosphere so as to encourage the sense of trust required to make meaningful talks possible.

Since late October the Administration has actively encouraged the two Cypriot communities to reach agreement on formulation of a joint committee—with International Red Cross participation—to investigate cases of persons reported as missing and unaccounted for since the intercommunal violence of the 1960's and the Turkish intervention of 1974. Work towards establishment of such a committee is proceeding. Tracing missing persons is, of course, a humanitarian rather than a political matter. Nevertheless, the experience of these past two months demonstrates that practical solutions to the problems that divide Greek and Turkish Cypriots might indeed be attainable. The readiness of both Cypriot parties to accept a simple and non-controversial resolution on missing persons in the U.N. General Assembly's Third Committee testified to a constructive attitude on this issue.

The United Nations General Assembly conducted its annual debate on Cyprus November 7–9, and the Security Council approved on December 15 the extension for a further six months of the mandate of the U.N. peacekeeping force on Cyprus (UNFICYP). The General Assembly debate provided the opportunity for a thorough debate of the issues involved in the Cyprus dispute. Renewal of the UNFICYP mandate, in itself an important step, was significant also for the commendable spirit of compromise displayed by the several parties concerned.

Resolute movement towards intensified negotiations is still required, and in the weeks and months ahead we will persist in our efforts to achieve this goal. We believe we are proceeding in the right direction, and we remain hopeful that substantive progress towards a just and lasting Cyprus settlement can be achieved.

National Science Board

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. January 20, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to submit to the Congress the Ninth Annual Report of the National Science Board, entitled Science Indicators—1976. This report is the third in a series of reports describing key aspects of the status of American science and technology.

The data and indicators presented herein should prove useful to anyone needing an authoritative source of information on various aspects of the scientific enterprise in this country.

Many of these indicators show that the United States continues to rank high in most areas of science. It is particularly important to maintain this strength through an adequate level of national investment in basic, long-term research because that type of research precedes and underlies advances in many areas of national interest such as health, energy, defense, agriculture, and industrial productivity.

I commend Science Indicators—1976 to the attention of the Congress.

Economic Report of the President

*Annual Message to the Congress.
January 20, 1978*

To the Congress of the United States:

I will be working closely with the Congress in 1978 to enact a program addressed to the immediate and the long-term needs of our economy. I am proposing tax reductions and reforms to continue our strong economic recovery, to encourage increased investment by American businesses, and to create a simpler and fairer tax system. I am seeking legislation to address the special problems of the disadvantaged and the unemployed. And I am taking new steps to combat inflation.

This report to the Congress on the condition of the economy sets forth the overall framework within which my economic proposals were formulated. It outlines, for you and for the Nation, my economic priorities for the years ahead and my strategies for achieving them.

I have begun from the premise that our economy is basically healthy, but that well-chosen Government policies will assure continued progress toward our economic goals.

Last year more than four million new jobs were created in our country—an all-time record—and unemployment was reduced by more than one million persons. Output rose by almost 6 percent, and the benefits of this large increase were widely shared. The after-tax income of consumers, adjusted for inflation, rose substantially during 1977. Wages of the typical American worker increased by more than the rise of prices, and business profits also advanced.

The American economy is completing three years of recovery from the severe recession of 1974–75. Recovery in most other nations has lagged far behind our own. In the economies of our six major trading partners, seven million persons were unemployed at year's end—more than at the depths of the 1974–75 recession. Our inflation rate is also lower than in most other nations around the world. We have a great many accomplishments. But much progress remains to be made, and there are problems to be dealt with along the way.

The recession of 1974–75 was the worst in 40 years, and the substantial increase in output over the past three years still leaves the economy operating below its productive potential. We cannot be content when almost 6½ million people actively seeking jobs cannot find work, when 3¼ million workers take part-time jobs because they cannot find full-time employment, and when one million people have stopped looking for a job because they have lost hope of finding one. We cannot be content when a substantial portion of our industrial plant stands idle, as it does today.

We cannot be satisfied with an economic recovery that bypasses significant segments of the American people. Unemployment among minorities is more than twice as high as that among whites—and unemployment among minority teenagers is tragically high. Women have fewer satisfying job opportunities than men, and older Americans often find their access to the job market blocked. Farm incomes have dropped precipitously.

We must also address other problems if we are to assure full restoration of prosperity. Inflation is a serious economic concern for all Americans. The inflation rate is too high and must be brought down. Moreover, a residue of unease and caution about the future still pervades the thinking of some of our people. Businesses are still hesitant in their long-term investment planning, and the stock market remains depressed despite the substantial increase in business profits.

The economic difficulties that we face in the United States also confront most nations around the world. Our mutual problems are the legacy of the trauma suffered by the world economy during the early 1970s. The massive escalation of oil prices since 1973 continues to impose great burdens on the world economy. Oil imports drain away the purchasing power of oil-importing nations and upset the international balance of payments.

Many foreign governments have been reluctant to adopt policies needed to stimulate economic growth because they are concerned that inflationary pressures might be renewed or that their balance of international payments might be worsened. Abroad, as well as at home, concerns about the future have deterred business investment in new plants and equipment. As a consequence, economic growth has stagnated in many countries, and the rise in the capital stock needed to increase productivity, raise standards of living, and avoid future inflationary bottlenecks is not occurring.

The problems we face today are more complex and difficult than those of an earlier era. We cannot concentrate just on inflation, or just on unemployment, or just on deficits in the Federal budget or our international payments. Nor can we act in isolation from other countries. We must deal with all of these problems simultaneously and on a worldwide basis.

Our problems cannot be solved overnight. But we can resolve them if we fix our sights on long-term objectives, adopt programs that will help us to realize our goals, and remain prepared to make adjustments as basic circumstances change.

In making my decisions on tax and budget policies for fiscal 1979, and in planning more generally for our Nation's future, I have been guided by four objectives for our economy that I believe our Nation should pursue.

We must continue to move steadily toward a high-employment economy in which the benefits of prosperity are widely shared. Progress in reducing unemployment of our labor and capital resources must be sure and sustainable. Over the next several years I believe we can increase our real output by 4½ to 5 percent per year, and reduce unemployment by about one-half of a percentage point each year. An especially high priority is to increase job opportunities for the disadvantaged, particularly for black and Spanish-speaking Americans, and to deal more effectively with local pockets of unemployment, such as those in urban areas. We should eliminate unfair advantages through reform of the tax system, and restructure our welfare system to assure that the fruits of economic growth are enjoyed by all Americans.

We should rely principally on the private sector to lead the economic expansion and to create new jobs for a growing labor force. Five out of every six new jobs in the economy are created in the private sector. There are good reasons for continuing to rely mainly on the private sector in the years ahead. By emphasizing the creation of private jobs, our resources will be used more efficiently, our future capacity to produce will expand more rapidly, and the standard of living for our people will rise faster. Reliance upon the private sector does not mean neglecting the tasks that government can and must perform. The Federal Government can be an active partner to help achieve progress toward meeting national needs and, through competent management, still absorb a declining portion of the Nation's output.

We must contain and reduce the rate of inflation as we move toward a more fully employed economy. Inflation extracts a heavy toll from all Americans, and particularly from the poor and those on fixed incomes. Reducing inflation would benefit us all. A more stable price environment would make it easier for business firms and consumers to plan for the future. Thus, reduced inflation would substantially enhance our chances to maintain a strong economic expansion and return to a high-employment economy. In the years ahead we must seek to unwind the inflation we have inherited from the past and take the steps necessary to prevent new inflationary pressures as we approach high employment.

We must act in ways that contribute to the health of the world economy. As the strongest economy in the world, the United States has unique responsibilities to improve the international economic climate. The well-being of the United States depends on the condition of other nations around the world. Their economic destiny is, in turn, shaped by ours. The United States can retain its stature in the world only by pursuing policies that measure up to its role as a leader in international economic affairs.

These four economic objectives are sufficiently ambitious to constitute a serious challenge, but sufficiently realistic to be within our reach. A well-designed program will permit us to achieve them. The principal elements of my economic strategy are:

- Adopting promptly an effective national energy program;
- Managing Federal budget expenditures carefully and prudently, so that we can meet national needs while gradually reducing the share of our national output devoted to Federal spending;
- Using tax reductions to ensure steady growth of the private economy and reforming the tax system to make it fairer, simpler, and more progressive;
- Working to reduce the Federal deficit and balance the budget as rapidly as the developing strength of the economy allows;
- Improving existing programs and developing new ones to attack the problem of structural unemployment among the disadvantaged;
- Promoting greater business capital formation in order to enhance productivity gains, increase standards of living, and reduce the chances that capacity shortages would inhibit expansion later on;
- Adopting more effective programs to reduce the current rate of inflation and prevent a reacceleration of inflation as we approach high employment; and
- Pursuing international economic policies that promote economic recovery throughout the world, encourage an expansion of world trade, and maintain a strong international monetary system.

PROMPT ADOPTION OF THE NATIONAL ENERGY PLAN

It has now been over four years since our economy was buffeted by the oil embargo and its aftermath of sharply increased oil prices. The massive oil price increase in 1973–74 contributed to the double-digit inflation of 1974 and to the worst recession in 40 years. It is a primary factor today behind the large deficit in our international balance of payments. Yet the United States still has not enacted a comprehensive and effective energy policy.

Our dependence on imported oil is sapping the strength of the American economy. Last year our imports of oil reached a total of about $45 billion, compared with $8½ billion in 1973. The increased expenditures on those imports have been like a sudden and massive tax imposed on the American people. Only part of the revenues have been returned to the United States in the form of higher exports of American goods to oil-producing countries. As a consequence, that "tax" has become a major obstacle to economic growth.

The huge deficit in foreign trade arising from our oil imports has contributed to the fall in the value of the dollar abroad. The dollar's decline has raised the cost of the goods we import and contributed to inflation. Our deficit also has unsettled international monetary markets, with adverse consequences for our international trading partners. Our response to the energy crisis is therefore a central element in our international and domestic economic policy. The energy program will not solve our problems at once, but it will pave the way for a balanced foreign trade position and a strong and sound dollar.

Our energy problems will worsen in the years to come unless we curb our appetite for oil and gas. Without decisive action, we will put additional pressure on the world oil market, aggravate inflationary pressures at home, and increase our vulnerability to the threat of oil supply disruptions. Together, these forces could severely limit the potential for continued economic progress over the coming decade.

The United States has no choice but to adjust to the new era of expensive energy. We can only choose when and how. If we act today, we have time to make a gradual transition to more efficient energy use—by conserving energy, increasing domestic energy production, and developing alternative sources of energy. If we delay, adjustment later will be harsh and painful, requiring draconian measures to accomplish what can now be done gradually and with far less anguish.

The energy problem we face is enormously complex. Finding an acceptable and effective solution has not been easy for me or for the Congress. I look forward to working closely with the Congress early this year to assure a speedy resolution. An acceptable bill must satisfy the following principles:

- First, the program must effectively reduce our consumption of limited energy supplies—oil and gas—while encouraging energy production and promoting a transition to the use of resources that are more abundant.
- Second, the program must be fair. No segment of the population should bear a disproportionate share of the cost or burden of adjustment, and no industry should reap unnecessary and undeserved windfall gains.
- Third, the program must be consistent with our overall economic strategy. It must neither undermine our efforts to continue the recovery nor obstruct achievement of our long-term budgetary goals.

Dealing with the energy problem is a difficult test for our Nation. It is a test of our economic and political maturity. Our people would surely react if there were an immediate crisis. But I am asking them to undertake sacrifices to prevent a crisis. If we fail to act today, we will bring a crisis upon ourselves and our children in years to come.

CAREFUL MANAGEMENT OF FEDERAL BUDGET EXPENDITURES

My Administration has given high priority to making more effective use of limited Federal resources. In fiscal 1976, Federal outlays amounted to 22½ percent of the Nation's gross national product. This is considerably higher than the share devoted to government spending that prevailed for many years. To some degree, the recent higher share reflects the fact that the economy is still performing below its capacity, and that Federal programs to support the unemployed and the needy are larger than they would be in a high-employment economy. But it also stems from very rapid growth in a number of Federal programs instituted over the past 10 to 15 years.

Most of our Federal expenditure programs are designed to achieve important national goals that the private sector of the economy cannot accomplish. Only the government can provide for the national defense, and government resources are essential to cushion the hardships created by economic recession, to preserve our national resources, to protect the environment, and to meet other critical needs.

The Federal Government has a particular obligation to provide assistance to those who remain in need even during good times. Last year I presented to the Congress a program to reform the welfare system—the Better Jobs and Income Act of 1977—that is a concrete example of our commitment to devote resources to the most pressing national needs. My program will cost money. But it also will establish a more easily understood welfare system that is less costly to administer, less subject to abuse, and more responsive to the true needs of those who receive a helping hand from government. This program will create up to 1.4 million jobs for those able to work, and it will replace the patchwork of Federal, State, and local programs with a consistent income-support system that will relieve much of the enormous burden now placed on State and local governments.

In the management of a business enterprise, efficiency is enforced by the discipline of the market place. The collective judgments of millions of consumers establish an environment in which waste and efficiency are eventually penalized. The government, however, is not subject to that discipline. We in government must therefore impose stringent controls on ourselves to ensure greater efficiency and to make better choices among the possible uses of the taxpayers' money.

To assist us in this endeavor, I have adopted methods of budgetary control that have been tested in the business community. Early last year I asked the Office of Management and Budget to inaugurate a system of zero-based budgeting throughout the Federal Government. Within this budgetary system, every Federal program is given careful scrutiny—no matter how large or how small it may be, no matter how long it has been in existence or how recently established. This new system of budgetary planning helped to hold down less essential outlays in the budget for fiscal 1979 and focus our resources on our important national needs. It will produce even greater savings in subsequent years. A process of multiyear budgeting also has been inaugurated within the Federal Government that will require tentative budget plans to be developed and reviewed for three years ahead. With this system we can more effectively control future expenditures—by avoiding commitments now to endeavors that would grow in the future beyond the proportions we desire.

In formulating my recommendations for the 1979 budget, I have exercised very strict controls over spending. Adjusted for inflation, the increase in outlays has been held to less than 2 percent and the share of Federal expenditures in GNP will fall to 22.0 percent. I intend to continue prudent expenditure controls in the future. With good management we can, I believe, achieve our Nation's important social goals and still reduce over time the share of gross national product committed to Federal expenditures to about 21 percent.

USING TAX REDUCTIONS TO PROMOTE STEADY ECONOMIC EXPANSION

I propose to rely principally upon growth in the private sector of the economy to reduce unemployment and raise incomes. Special Federal efforts will, of course, be necessary to deal with such problems as structural unemployment, but tax reductions will be the primary means by which Federal budget policy will promote growth. Careful management of budget outlays and a growing economy should permit substantial reductions in the years ahead. Tax reductions will be needed to strengthen consumer purchasing power and expand consumer markets. Stable growth in markets, together with added tax incentives for business, will lead to rising business investment and growing productivity.

As inflation and real economic growth raise the incomes of most Americans, they are pushed into higher income tax brackets. The tax burden on individuals is raised just as if higher rates had been enacted. The payroll taxes levied on workers and business firms for social security and unemployment insurance will also increase substantially over the years ahead. These are very large increases, but they are needed to keep our social security and unemployment insurance systems soundly financed.

Between 1977 and 1979, taxes on businesses and individuals will rise very sharply as a result of these several factors. Even though our economy is basically healthy, this increasingly heavy tax burden would exert a mounting drag on economic growth. It must, therefore, be counteracted by tax reductions. The magnitude and timing of the reductions should be designed to maintain economic growth at a steady pace, taking into account the effects both of the growing tax burden and of other factors at work in the economy.

Consistent with this strategy, I am proposing a $25 billion program of net tax reductions accompanied by substantial tax reforms.

Individual income taxes will be reduced primarily through across-the-board reductions in personal tax rates, with special emphasis on low- and middle-income taxpayers. Personal taxes also will be simplified by my proposal to replace the existing personal exemption and credit with a tax credit of $240 for each person in the taxpayer's family.

There also will be important reforms that will improve the individual income tax system and raise substantial revenues, enabling me to recommend larger personal tax reductions.

Overall, I am proposing personal tax reductions of $24 billion, offset by $7 billion in tax reforms. These tax cuts, which will take effect next October 1, will significantly improve the progressivity of the tax system. The typical four-person family with $15,000 in income will receive a tax cut of $258—or more than 19 percent. As a result of the changes I am recommending, filling out tax returns will be simpler for many people.

Individuals also will benefit from reductions I have proposed in the Federal excise tax on telephone bills, and in the Federal payroll tax for unemployment insurance. These two proposals will add about $2 billion to consumers' purchasing power that will be realized principally through lower prices.

Business taxes will be reduced by more than $8 billion in 1979 under my tax program, offset partially by more than $2 billion in business tax reforms for a net tax reduction of nearly $6 billion. I have recommended that the overall corporate tax rate be reduced on October 1 from the current 48 percent to 45 percent, and be cut further to 44 percent in 1980. I also recommend that the existing 10-percent investment tax credit be made permanent, and that the benefits of this credit be extended to investments in industrial and utility structures. My proposal will enable businesses to use the investment tax credit to offset up to 90 percent of their Federal tax liability, compared with the 50-percent limit now imposed.

Important new tax reforms also will affect businesses. I am, for example, proposing to reduce the deductibility of a large class of business entertainment expenses. I have also proposed changes in the tax status of international business transactions that are of significant cost to taxpayers but that benefit the public insufficiently.

Because tax reform measures will raise $9 billion in revenue, it has been possible for me to recommend $34 billion in overall tax reductions while keeping the net loss in revenues to $25 billion, the level I believe is appropriate given the state of our economy and the size of the budget deficit.

These proposals do not include any adjustment to take account of congressional action on my energy proposals. I proposed last April that the Congress pass a wellhead tax and rebate the proceeds of that tax directly to the American people. This is the best course to follow because it protects the real incomes of consumers and avoids a new source of fiscal drag. If the final energy bill includes a full rebate of the net proceeds of the wellhead tax, no further action on my part will be necessary. However, if the final bill allows for a rebate only for 1978—as provided in the House version—I will send a supplemental message to the Congress recommending that the individual tax reduction I am now proposing be increased by the amount of the net proceeds of the wellhead tax.

These tax reductions are essential to healthy economic recovery during 1978 and 1979. Prospects for continuation of that recovery in the near term are favorable. Consumers have been spending freely, and many other economic indicators recently have been moving up strongly. Without the tax reductions I have proposed, however, the longer-term prospects for economic growth would become increasingly poor. Because of the fiscal drag imposed by rising payroll taxes and inflation, economic growth would slow substantially in late 1978, and fall to about 3½ percent in 1979. The unemployment rate would stop declining and might begin to rise again, and the growth of investment outlays for new plant and equipment would slow significantly.

With the reductions in taxes I have proposed, on the other hand, the economy should grow by 4½ to 5 percent in both 1978 and 1979. Nearly one million new jobs would be created. Unemployment would therefore continue to fall and by late 1979 should be down to around 5½ to 6 percent. Capacity utilization and after-tax business profits would both improve, and thus the rate of investment in new plants and equipment should increase significantly.

Success in keeping a firm rein on spending will permit further tax reductions in years to come. Our ability to foresee the future course of the economy is not good enough, however, to enable us to know when additional reductions will be needed or how large they should be. It would therefore be imprudent to plan specific policy measures now for more than the current and the next fiscal year. But I will make recommendations for budget and tax policies for 1980 and beyond that are in keeping with our objectives of steady growth in the economy, more stable prices, and principal reliance on the private sector to achieve economic expansion.

WORKING TO REDUCE THE FEDERAL DEFICIT AND BALANCE THE BUDGET AS SOON AS THE STRENGTH OF THE ECONOMY ALLOWS

Federal budgetary policy can play a constructive role in maintaining the health of the economy. There are times when large deficits in the Federal budget must be tolerated because they are needed to bolster the purchasing power of consumers and businesses. A budget deficit that persisted during a period of high employment and strong further growth of private demand, however, would put upward pressures on prices and would aggravate our inflationary problem. Under those circumstances, a budget deficit would also absorb savings that would be better used by the private sector to build new factories and offices and to purchase new machines. In order to assure that our economic progress remains on a solid footing and is not undermined by inflation, we must reduce the Federal budget deficit and achieve a balanced budget as soon as the developing strength in the economy allows.

The first requisite is careful management and control of Federal spending. The second is a prudent weighing of the need for tax reductions against the goal of budget balance.

This year I have proposed budgets that call for a deficit of $62 billion in 1978, and one only slightly smaller in 1979. Had I decided not to recommend a tax cut to put additional purchasing power in the hands of consumers and businesses, the deficit in 1979 could have been $15 to $20 billion smaller. But I believe that tax reduction is essential to continued progress in an economy still characterized by substantial unemployment and idle plant capacity.

How rapidly we can restore budget balance depends on the strength of the private economy. Over the next few years, two factors will be of particular importance.

The first is the financial condition of State and local governments. In the past, the aggregate budget of these governments tended to be approximately in balance. Today the State and local sector as a whole is in surplus. In 1977, for example, aggregate State and local receipts from all sources exceeded expenditures by nearly $30 billion. This overall surplus does not mean that every State and local government is in good financial condition. Many are hard pressed. Moreover, a large part of the aggregate surplus represents accumulations of pension funds for the 13 million employees of State and local governments.

Substantial surpluses in the State and local sector are likely to continue in the future. They absorb the incomes of consumers and business, and so act as a drag on the economy.

The second factor affecting the pace at which we can expect to move toward budget balance is the large deficit in America's foreign trade in goods and services. Imports into the United States have been swollen by the enormous quantity of oil we buy abroad to drive our cars, heat our homes, and fuel our industry. Our exports have grown only slowly, in large measure because economic growth abroad has been much slower than in the United States. As a result, the United States last year recorded a deficit of close to $18 billion in our current international accounts. This deficit has the same general effect on economic activity as a multibillion dollar increase in taxes.

Enactment of an effective energy program ultimately will reverse our growing dependence on oil imports. Moreover, economic growth in other countries should be improving over the next few years. But we may expect a current account deficit of some size to continue in the near future.

If strong economic expansion is to be maintained in the face of these major drains on the economy, additional tax reductions may be necessary beyond those I have proposed for 1979. But we will be better able to judge this question in a year or two, and we should not prejudge it now.

In formulating my budgetary decisions thus far, I have been careful to avoid commitments that would make it impossible for us to balance the budget by 1981. With unusually strong growth in the private economy, we would need a balanced Federal budget. In an economy growing less strongly, however, balancing the budget by 1981 would be possible only by forgoing tax reductions needed to reach our goal of high employment. In those circumstances, the date for reaching the goal of budget balance would have to be deferred.

What is important is that the planning and execution of Federal fiscal policies proceed in a prudent manner. Every decision on spending and taxes during my Administration has been, and will continue to be, made in the context of long-run budgetary planning that avoids the creation of excess demand during periods of high employment. That is an essential ingredient of responsible budgetary policy.

PROGRAMS TO ATTACK THE PROBLEM OF STRUCTURAL UNEMPLOYMENT

Meaningful job opportunities ought to be available for all Americans who wish to work. But overall fiscal and monetary policy alone will not provide employment to many in our Nation. If we are to reduce unemployment satisfactorily, we must do more.

Eleven percent of adult American workers from minority groups are now jobless—close to the rate a year ago, and over twice as high as the unemployment rate for white adults. About 17 percent of our teenagers are unemployed today; among black teenagers the unemployment rate is nearly 40 percent. These intolerably high rates of unemployment must be brought down. This is an important goal, but achieving it will be a difficult task.

A generally healthy and growing economy is a prerequisite for dealing effectively with structural unemployment, but it is not enough. Even in good times some groups suffer from very high unemployment, which adds to the difficulty of achieving low unemployment and low inflation simultaneously. As the economy moves toward high employment, employers try to fill job vacancies from those groups of workers with substantial training and experience. Wage rates are bid up and prices follow, while large numbers from other groups are still looking unsuccessfully for work. Efforts to reduce unemployment among the unskilled and otherwise disadvantaged can be frustrated by inflationary pressures set off in those sectors of the labor market already fully employed.

To reach high levels of employment while maintaining reasonable price stability, we must take effective and adequate measures now to increase the employment opportunities of the disadvantaged. This principle is a key element of the Humphrey-Hawkins Bill—The Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act. I support this legislation and hope the Congress will enact it.

We have already taken several significant steps in this direction. Last year I proposed and the Congress appropriated $8.4 billion to expand the Public Service Employment Program to 725,000 jobs. These jobs are more sharply targeted on the long-term unemployed and the poor than previous programs under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act. Direct opportunities for youth also have been expanded. The Youth Employment and Demonstration Projects Act of 1977, which is providing job experience and training in skills to unemployed youths, also was proposed by my Administration and enacted in 1977, providing 166,000 work and training positions for unemployed youths.

Several further measures are proposed in my 1979 budget. I have recommended that Public Service Employment be continued at the 725,000 job level throughout 1979, and that the number of jobs be phased down gradually in subsequent years as progress is made in reducing the overall level of unemployment. I have also recommended an expansion to $1.2 billion of the Youth Employment and Demonstration Projects Act to provide work opportunities and skill training for the unemployed youth who most need help. The Better Jobs and Income Program that I sent to the Congress in mid-1977 will create up to 1.4 million jobs, supplemented by cash allowances, for poor people who are able to work. An initial demonstration project for this program that will create 50,000 jobs is proposed in my 1979 budget, and more jobs will be phased in gradually once the welfare reform program is enacted.

Government programs can provide valuable assistance to the unemployed. In the end, however, we must turn to the private sector for the bulk of permanent job opportunities for the disadvantaged. It is in private industry that most productive jobs with opportunity for advancement are found. For this reason, I am requesting $400 million in my 1979 budget to begin a major new initiative for private sector hiring of the disadvantaged. Details of this proposal will be submitted to the Congress shortly. I am requesting the fullest cooperation of the business community in this initiative and have been assured by business leaders that it will be forthcoming.

GREATER EMPHASIS ON PROMOTING BUSINESS CAPITAL FORMATION

Over a broad expanse of years, improvement of the standard of living in this Nation depends primarily on growth in the productivity of the American work force. During the first two decades of the postwar period, the productivity of American labor increased at an average annual rate of about 3 percent. Over the past ten years, however, productivity growth has slowed markedly—to about 2 percent or less a year.

The reasons for this break with past trends are complex, but one factor that clearly stands out is the relatively slow growth in the stock of business plant and equipment. Historically, improvements in productivity have been linked closely to investment in plant and equipment. Investment in new facilities has embodied new and more productive technology and has provided our work force with more and better tools.

Business investment has lagged during the recovery for several reasons. Some of the fears engendered by the steep recession and severe inflation of 1973–75 have remained and have reduced the incentive for businesses to invest. Uncertainties about energy supplies and energy prices have also been a deterrent to investment, and so have concerns about governmental regulations in a variety of areas. Finally, high costs of capital goods and a depressed stock market have diminished the incentives and raised the costs to businesses of investment in new plant and equipment.

Industrial capacity is ample now. But without a substantial increase in investment over the next few years, problems would build for the future. Rapid growth of capacity is needed to assure that shortages of particular products do not emerge before we regain high employment. If capacity is not sufficient, bottlenecks may develop in some sectors, forcing up prices of industrial commodities. Inadequate rates of capital formation will also hold back the gains in productivity needed to improve standards of living and to avoid further aggravation of our inflation problem.

My tax and other economic proposals will encourage a greater rate of business investment in several ways. By promoting a sustainable rate of economic recovery, they will assure businesses of an expanding market for the output from new factories and equipment. The specific tax reductions for business I have proposed will increase after-tax profits and so directly provide additional incentives for investment.

We must also have conditions in financial markets that permit businesses to raise the funds they need for investment. Prudent Federal budgetary policies will contribute significantly to that end, as will policies that deal effectively with inflation. Both will ease the Federal Reserve's task of pursuing monetary policies that support full recovery.

MORE EFFECTIVE PROGRAMS TO REDUCE THE RATE OF INFLATION

We cannot achieve full prosperity unless we deal effectively with inflation. We must take steps to reduce the high rate of inflation inherited from the past and to guard against a renewed outbreak of inflation as we regain a high-employment economy.

Our economy is not suffering at present from excess demand. Monetary growth in recent years has not been excessive, and Federal budget deficits have occurred in an economy with high unemployment and excess capacity. Yet prices continue to rise as a result of an inflationary process that has been under way for a decade.

Our present inflation began back in the late 1960s and accelerated sharply in the early years of the 1970s. Since 1974 the rate of consumer price inflation has declined substantially—from 12 percent to between 6 and 6½ percent at present. But that improvement is due largely to the termination of special influences affecting prices during 1974—the sharp rise of food and fuel prices, and the bulge in prices following the removal of wage and price controls.

Recent experience has demonstrated that the inflation we have inherited from the past cannot be cured by policies that slow growth and keep unemployment high. Since 1975, inflation has persisted stubbornly at a 6 to 6½ percent rate—even though unemployment went as high as 9 percent and still stands above 6 percent, and even though a substantial proportion of our industrial capacity has been idle. The human tragedy and waste of resources associated with policies of slow growth are intolerable, and the impact of such policies on the current inflation is very small. Moreover, by discouraging investment in new capacity, slow growth sows the seeds of future inflationary problems when the economy does return to high employment. Economic stagnation is not the answer to inflation.

Our first task in combating inflation is to guard against a renewed outbreak of higher price increases in the future. Firm discipline over the Federal budget and a prudent monetary policy are the most important steps that can be taken. Programs to attack structural pockets of unemployment among our people will make it possible to achieve higher levels of employment without exerting pressures on prices. Greater investment also will make a major contribution toward assuring that the capacity of our industry will be adequate to meet the needs of a high-employment economy.

Enactment of an energy program will eventually reduce the demand for oil imports—contributing to market conditions that discourage substantial oil price increases, and combating the inflation that results from a decline in the exchange value of the dollar. The programs I have inaugurated to build a 30- to 35-million metric ton grain reserve will provide a buffer against sudden upward movements in food prices in the event of bad weather.

Our second task—reducing the current rate of inflation—will be harder. Yet we must tackle the problem. Unless the inflation rate is brought down, the rate of price increase may well rise as unemployment falls to lower levels in later years, with consequences that would thwart our efforts to bring about full recovery.

The government has an obligation to set an example for the private sector, and we can play an important role in moderating inflation by reducing the effects of our own actions on prices. By adopting tax incentives and other policies to improve the growth of investment and productivity, we will help reduce the rise in costs and hence in prices.

The excise tax reductions I have proposed in my 1979 budget also will contribute moderately to lower costs and prices.

Government regulations also add to costs and raise prices. To some extent, this is the inevitable cost of much needed improvements in the environment and in the health and safety of workers and consumers. But there is no question that the scope of regulation has become excessive and that too little attention is given to its economic costs. We should not, and will not, give up our efforts to achieve cleaner air and water and a safer workplace. But, wherever possible, the extent of regulation should be reduced. We have eliminated hundreds of unneeded regulations already and will continue to pare down the remainder.

I also intend to put a high priority on minimizing the adverse effects of governmental regulations on the economy. To this end, I have established a high-level interagency committee that—together with the relevant regulatory agency—will review the economic effects of major regulations. This committee will seek to assure that the costs of each regulation have been fully considered, and that all alternatives have been explored, so that we may find and apply the least costly means of achieving our regulatory objectives. I have also directed my advisers to explore ways in which we can undertake an assessment of the impact of regulation on the economy as a whole and within each major sector. We need to find a way to set priorities among regulatory objectives and understand more fully the combined effects of our regulatory actions on the private economy.

Where regulation of economic activity has become outmoded and substantial overhaul is called for, I will pursue effective legislation. For example, I have supported actively congressional efforts to reform regulation of the airline industry, and I am considering proposals to reform the regulation of other industries.

I have given special attention to reducing the runaway cost of health care. The cost of a day in the hospital has more than doubled since 1970. Continuing escalation in the charges for hospital care can no longer be tolerated. I have submitted legislation, the Hospital Cost Containment Act of 1977, that would limit sharply the rate of growth in hospital spending, and I urge the Congress to enact this legislation in 1978.

The States can also play a role in moderating the current inflation. In 1976, State governments collected $50 billion in sales taxes. For the most part, these taxes enter directly into the cost of goods we buy and thus increase the price level. Today, State governments with significant surpluses are considering tax reductions. I urge those in a position to do so to consider the advantages to the national economy of reducing sales taxes, thereby helping to slow inflation.

Government alone cannot unwind the current inflation, however. Today's inflationary process is largely the consequence of self-fulfilling expectations. Businessmen, expecting inflation to continue, are less resistant to cost increases than they might be, since they have come to believe that, with all prices rising, their own increased costs can be passed on to consumers through higher prices. Wage increases are based on the expectation that prices will continue to rise. Wage gains in one sector spur similar demands in others.

There are gainers and losers in this process, since some groups in the economy are more successful than others at defending themselves against inflation. On the whole, however, the main result is continued inflation. No one group—neither business, nor labor, nor government—can stop this spiral on its own. What is needed is a joint effort.

Since the current inflation has developed strong momentum, it cannot be brought to a sudden halt. But we can achieve a gradual but sustained deceleration—having each succeeding year's inflation lower than the previous one. The benefits of slower growth of prices and wages would be broadly shared. Everyone would be better off. A conscious effort should be made by those who make wage and price decisions to take the individual actions necessary to bring about an economy-wide deceleration of inflation.

I am therefore asking the business community and American workers to participate in a voluntary program to decelerate the rate of price and wage increase. This program is based on the initial presumption that prices and wages in each industry should rise significantly less in 1978 than they did on average during the past two years.

I recognize that not all wages and prices can be expected to decelerate at the same pace. For example, where profit margins have been particularly squeezed, or where wages are lagging seriously, deceleration in 1978 would be less than for other firms or groups of workers. In exceptional cases deceleration may not be possible at all. Conversely, firms or groups that have done exceptionally well in the recent past may be expected to do more.

To enhance the prospects for success of this deceleration program, I have asked that major firms and unions respond to requests from members of my Administration to discuss with them on an informal basis steps that can be taken during the coming year to achieve deceleration in their industries. In reviewing the economic situation prior to making my recommendations to the Congress on the size of the pay raise for Federal workers, due to take effect next October, I will keep this objective of deceleration in mind.

This program does not establish a uniform set of numerical standards against which each price or wage action is to be measured. The past inflation has introduced too many distortions into the economy to make that possible or desirable. But it does establish a standard of behavior for each industry for the coming year: every effort should be made to reduce the rate of wage and price increase in 1978 to below the average rate of the past two years.

I have chosen this approach after reviewing extensively all of the available options. There is no guarantee that establishing a voluntary deceleration standard will unwind the current inflation. I believe, however, that with the cooperation of business and labor, this proposal will work. Deceleration is a feasible standard of behavior, for it seeks restraint in wage and price actions in exchange for a general reduction in inflation. It is also a fair standard. Industries and workers with far different histories and current situations will not be asked to fit within the constraint of a single numerical guideline.

The inflation problem will not be easy to overcome. It will take time and patience. But the importance of these efforts cannot be overestimated. Unless we gain better control over the inflation rate, the prospects for regaining a fully employed economy will be seriously reduced. My Administration cannot and will not pursue policies in the future that threaten to trigger a new and more virulent round of inflation in this country. To do so would be the surest way of destroying the hopes of our citizens for a long-lasting prosperity.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC POLICIES THAT PROMOTE ECONOMIC RECOVERY
THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

Outside the United States, the world economy has seen a hesitant recovery from the deep recession of 1974-75. The rapid pace of economic growth that was widespread over most of the postwar years has all but disappeared. Unemployment is high, and in most industrial countries except the United States it is rising. Inflation is at high levels and declining only very slowly.

The imbalances in the international economic system continue to strain the world economy. Because of the surpluses of oil-exporting countries, many countries have sizable deficits, including the United States. Some industrial nations are also running large and persistent surpluses—thus increasing the pressures on countries in deficit. These imbalances have been a major factor contributing to disorder in exchange markets in recent months.

The condition of the world economy requires above all that nations work together to develop mutually beneficial solutions to global problems. If we fail to work together, we will lose the gains in living standards arising from the expansion of world commerce over the past three decades. If the world economy becomes a collection of isolated and weak nations, we will all lose.

The first priority in our international economic policy is continued economic recovery throughout the industrial world. Growth of the U.S. economy—the largest and strongest in the world—is of vital importance. The economic program that I have proposed will ensure that America remains a leader and a source of strength in the world economy. It is important that other strong nations join with us to take direct actions to spur demand within their own economies. World recovery cannot proceed if nations rely upon exports as the principal source of economic expansion.

At the same time all countries must continue the battle against inflation. This will require prudent fiscal and monetary policies. Such policies must be supplemented by steps to reduce structural unemployment, measures to avoid bottlenecks by encouraging investment, and cooperation in the accumulation of commodity reserves to insulate the world from unforeseen shocks.

Reducing the widespread imbalances in international payments will require several parallel steps. To begin with, each individual country must ensure that its own policies help relieve the strains. The United States will do its part. In 1977 we had a current account deficit of about $18 billion. While not a cause for alarm, this is a matter of concern. We can take a most constructive step toward correcting this deficit by moving quickly to enact the National Energy Plan.

Countries in surplus should also do their part. Balance of payments surpluses in some countries have contributed to the economic stagnation among their trading partners. Where their own economies have slack, it is appropriate for nations in surplus to stimulate the growth of domestic demand—thereby increasing their imports and improving the prospects for growth in deficit countries. In some countries, lifting restraints on imports from abroad and reducing excessive government efforts to promote exports would be useful. After consultations with the United States, the Japanese have indicated they will take a series of steps toward reducing their large surplus.

The system of flexible exchange rates for currencies also can be helpful in correcting unsustainable imbalances in payments among countries. Since its inception in 1973, this system has operated well under unprecedented strains.

During 1977 the U.S. dollar has fallen in value against several key currencies. The decline in the dollar's value has occurred primarily against the currencies of those nations that have large trade and payments surpluses, and was not surprising in view of our large payments deficit and their surpluses. Late in 1977, however, movements in our exchange rate became both disorderly and excessively rapid. The United States reaffirmed its intention to step in when conditions in exchange markets become disorderly and to work in close cooperation with our friends abroad in this effort.

Under the flexible exchange rate system basic economic forces must continue to be the fundamental determinant of the value of currencies. However, we will not permit speculative activities in currency markets to disrupt our economy or those of our trading partners. We recognize fully our obligation in this regard, and we have taken steps to fulfill it.

Although substantial progress can be made toward a balanced world economy, some imbalances will persist for a substantial period of time. Financing requirements will remain large while adjustments occur. The private markets can and will continue to channel the bulk of the financing from surplus to deficit countries. But it is essential that adequate official financing also be available, in case of need, to encourage countries with severe payments problems to adopt orderly and responsible corrective measures. To meet this critical need the United States has strongly supported a proposal to strengthen the International Monetary Fund by the establishment of a new Supplementary Financing Facility.

The United States also will continue to contribute resources to promote growth in the economies of the developing nations. International assistance efforts—through bilateral aid and multilateral institutions—must continue to expand. We must also keep our doors open to imports from developing countries, so that their economies can grow and prosper through expanded trade.

A keystone of our international economic policy is to work with our trading partners to protect a free and open trading system. The American economy benefits by exporting those products that we make efficiently, and by importing those that we produce least efficiently. An open trading system increases our real incomes, strengthens competition in our markets, and contributes to combating inflation.

The United States will firmly resist the demands for protection that inevitably develop when the world economy suffers from high unemployment. The ensuing decline in world trade would worsen our problem of inflation, create inefficiencies in American enterprise, and lead to fewer jobs for American workers. But international competition must be fair. We have already taken and we will, when necessary, continue to take steps to ensure that our businesses and workers do not suffer from unfair trade practices.

I place great importance on the Multilateral Trade Negotiations now under way in Geneva. I believe our negotiators will bring home agreements that are fair and balanced and that will benefit our economy immensely over the years to come. The importance of these discussions can hardly be overemphasized. The trading system that emerges from the negotiations will set the tone for international commerce well into the 1980s. Our commitment to a successful conclusion to these talks underscores our long-term emphasis on the retention and expansion of open and fair trade among nations.

THE CHALLENGE BEFORE US

In this message I have outlined my fundamental economic goals and the strategy for attaining them. It is an ambitious, but I believe a realistic, agenda for the future. It calls for a broad range of actions to improve the health and fairness of the American economy. And it calls upon the American people to participate actively in many of these efforts.

I ask the Congress and the American people to join with me in a sustained effort to achieve a lasting prosperity. We all share the same fundamental goals. We can work together to reach them.

Sugar, Sirups, and Molasses Imports

*Statement on Signing Proclamation 4547.
January 20, 1978*

On the recommendation of Secretary of Agriculture Bob Bergland, and in consultation with other Federal agencies, I am announcing the following actions:

—Effective January 21, 1978, all imported sugar will be subject to fixed fees of 2.7 cents per pound for raw sugar and 3.22 cents per pound for refined sugar, not to exceed 50 percent of the value of imported sugar.

—Directions have been given to the International Trade Commission to expand its investigation in imported sugar to determine whether sugar-containing products are being or will be imported in quantities and under conditions that will result in national interference to the sugar price support operations being conducted by the Department of Agriculture. I have asked that their report be completed as soon as possible and be accompanied by specific recommendations for corrective actions.

My decisions today address critical problems that have arisen since the issuance of my November 11 proclamation:

—Our price objectives for imported sugar are protected. Our objective on imported refined sugar is 4.0 cents a pound above the imported raw sugar price objective, an amount equal to the refining loss and refining costs.

—Current and prospective market conditions indicate that had we continued the system of variable fees, imported refined sugar would not be subject to import fees, and there would be strong incentives to import sugar in refined, rather than raw form. Refined sugar has been entering the United States at an unprecedented rate.

—Because I have instructed the International Trade Commission to conduct an investigation and report to me their recommendations, the fixed fees that I have announced are being implemented in a temporary program under emergency authorities.

—The fixed fee system eases the administrative burden, reduces the potential for price manipulation, and is familiar to the trade.

—If I find, based on the new fixed fee system, that efforts continue to be made to take advantage of the system, I will not hesitate to take even more stringent actions. The dumping of imported sugar on our domestic market will not be tolerated.

Sugar, Sirups, and Molasses Imports

IMPORT FEES ON SUGAR, SIRUPS, AND MOLASSES

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

By Proclamation No. 4538 of November 11, 1977, I imposed import fees on certain sugars, sirups, and molasses. I also requested the United States International Trade Commission to make an immediate investigation with respect to this matter pursuant to section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended (7 U.S.C. 624), and to report its findings and recommendations to me as soon as possible.

The Secretary of Agriculture has since informed me that the fees established by Proclamation No. 4538 are insufficient.

He has again advised me that he has reason to believe that sugars, sirups, and molasses, derived from sugar cane or sugar beets, classified under items 155.20 and 155.30, of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS) (19 U.S.C. 1202), hereinafter referred to as "sugars", are being, or are practically certain to be, imported into the United States under such conditions and in such quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective, or to materially interfere with the price support operations now being conducted by the Department of Agriculture for sugar cane and sugar beets, or to reduce substantially the amount of any product being processed in the United States from such domestic sugar beets and sugar cane. The Secretary of Agriculture has reaffirmed his determination that the condition requires emergency treatment.

I agree there is reason for these beliefs and I find and declare that:

(a) Sugars, described below by use and physical description, are being imported, or are practically certain to be imported, into the United States under such conditions and in such quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective, or materially interfere with, the price support operations being conducted by the Department of Agriculture for sugar cane and sugar beets, or reduce substantially the amount of any product processed in the United States from domestic sugar beets or sugar cane;

(b) A condition exists which requires the immediate imposition of the import fees hereinafter set forth, without awaiting the report and recommendations of the United States International Trade Commission.

(c) The imposition of the import fees hereinafter proclaimed is necessary in order that the entry, or withdrawal from warehouse, for consumption of such sugars will not render or tend to render ineffective, or materially interfere with, the price support operations being conducted by the Department of Agriculture for sugar beets and sugar cane, or reduce substantially the amount of products processed in the United States from such domestic sugar beets or sugar cane.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, acting under the authority vested in me by the Constitution and Statutes of the United States of America, including section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, do hereby proclaim that Part 3 of the Appendix to the TSUS is amended as follows:

1. Headnote 4 is amended to read as follows:

4. Sugar, sirups, and molasses

(a) Licenses may be issued by the Secretary of Agriculture or his designee authorizing the entry of articles exempt from the fees provided for in items 956.05, 956.15, and 957.15 of this part on the condition that such articles will be used only for the production (other than by distillation) of polyhydric alcohols, except polyhydric alcohols for use as a substitute for sugar in human food consumption. Such licenses shall be issued under regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture which he determines are necessary to insure the use of such articles only for such purposes.

(b) "Not to be further refined or improved in quality" as used in item 956.05 means not to be further refined or improved in quality by being subjected substantially to the processes of (1) affination or defecation, (2) clarification, or (3) further purification by absorption or crystallization.

2. Items 956.10, 956.20, 957.10, and 957.20 are deleted.

3. The following new items, in numerical sequence, are added following item 955.06:

Item	Articles	Rates of Duty (Section 22 Fees)
	Sugars, sirups, and molasses, derived from sugar cane or sugar beets, except those entered pursuant to a license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with headnote 4(a):
	Principally of crystalline structure or in dry amorphous form, provided for in item 155.20, part 10A, schedule 1:
956. 05 . . . .	Not to be further refined or improved in quality . .	3.22¢ per lb., but not in excess of 50% ad val.
956. 15 . . . .	To be further refined or improved in quality . . . .	2.70¢ per lb., but not in excess of 50% ad val.
957. 15 . . . .	Not principally of crystalline structure and not in dry amorphous form, containing soluble non-sugar solids (excluding any foreign substance that may have been added or developed in the product) equal to 6% or less by weight of the total soluble solids, provided for in item 155.30, part 10A, schedule 1 . . . . .	3.22¢ per lb. of total sugars, but not in excess of 50% ad val.

With the following exceptions, this proclamation applies to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption after 12:01 a.m. (Eastern Standard Time) on the day following its issuance. One exception shall be for the sugars of Malawian origin which entered the United States before February 15, 1978, pursuant to contracts for delivery to the United States entered into before November 11, 1977. Further, if it is established to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Customs that articles subject to proclamations 4538 and 4539 exported to the United States before November 11, 1977, or imported to fulfill forward contracts for delivery to the United States entered into before November 11, 1977, could have been, but were not, entered for consumption on or before January 1, 1978, as a result of the delay in transportation to a point within the limits of a Customs port of entry of the United States because of windstorm, fog, or similar stress of weather, the provisions of proclamations 4538 and 4539 shall not apply to the articles even though they are entered for consumption after January 1, 1978 nor shall the provisions of this proclamation be applicable to them. The proclamation shall continue to apply until I have acted on the Report of the United States International Trade Commission.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twentieth day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Digest of Other White House Announcements

The following listing includes the President's daily schedule and other items of general interest as announced by the White House Press Office during the period covered by this issue. Events and announcements printed elsewhere in the issue are not included.

January 16

The President met at the White House with:

- Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs;
- Senator Howard H. Baker, Jr., of Tennessee;
- the Cabinet;
- Attorney General Griffin B. Bell.

January 17

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives;
- members of the Democratic Caucus of the 94th and 95th Congresses;
- Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, Adm. Stansfield Turner, Director of Central Intelligence, and Dr. Brzezinski;
- Representative Morris K. Udall of Arizona;
- Representative Al Ullman of Oregon;
- Senator Howard W. Cannon of Nevada;
- members of the House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee.

January 18

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Representative Joe D. Waggoner of Louisiana;
- Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin;

- Senator William Proxmire of Wisconsin;
- members of the Board of Trustees of the Council of the Americas and Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, to discuss the Panama Canal treaties;
- Secretary Brown;
- a group of consumer leaders.

In a ceremony in the Oval Office, the President received diplomatic credentials from Ambassadors Roberto Quinonez Meza of El Salvador and Jorge Lamport Rodil of Guatemala.

At a news conference at the White House, representatives of the 1977 Inaugural Committee announced a surplus of more than $800,000, and the creation of a perpetual trust to finance public events in future Inaugurations.

The White House announced that the President telephoned President Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt to discuss the Middle East negotiations.

January 19

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Representative Richard Bolling of Missouri;
- Senator Russell B. Long of Louisiana;
- Representative John J. Rhodes of Arizona;
- Mrs. Carter, for lunch.

At a news conference at the White House, Attorney General Griffin B. Bell announced the President's intention to nominate William H. Webster, of St. Louis, Mo., United States Circuit Judge for the Eighth Circuit, to be Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Following his State of the Union address, the President attended a White House reception for a group of supporters from Iowa.

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Senator Frank Church of Idaho;
- Thomas J. Watson, Jr., chairman of the executive committee of IBM Corp.;
- members of the President's Commission on White House Fellowships.

The President declared an emergency for the State of Arkansas because of the impact of tornadoes which struck Cross, St. Francis, and Woodruff Counties on January 7.

The President left the White House for a weekend trip to Georgia.

Middle East Negotiations

*Question-and-Answer Session With Reporters on Board Air Force One en Route to Georgia.
January 20, 1978*

REPORTER. You know what we're all interested in is whether President Sadat is going to come to Washington in the near future to confer with you.

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. We've not made any plans about it, and there have been no discussions with him about it.

Q. There was some talk over there that he would like to do this, or he thinks it might be helpful.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've seen in the news that he has proposed this as a possibility for the future. And I notice that Prime Minister Begin has also said that it would be a possibility for the future. But I don't know of any discussions that there have been between either those two nor with me.

Q. How serious is this apparent setback in that progress toward negotiations?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I'm afraid it's very serious. Secretary Vance has spent hours the last 2 days both with Prime Minister Begin and with President Sadat. They are planning to go ahead with the military talks, and we hope that there won't be anything other than a brief interruption in the political talks.

We are acting as an intermediary the best we can, trying to convince both sides of the other's good intentions, and hope that we can succeed. It's been a relief to us the last number of weeks to have those two nations negotiating directly.

Secretary Vance, who's been involved in some very difficult discussions in the past with Vietnam and in the Cyprus question, in years gone by, says this is a normal procedure when adversaries first begin to discuss specifics with one another. It's one major step just to agree to talk at all. But in the aftermath of the good will following the personal acquaintance and introduction, to start discussing ancient differences is always a letdown and a disappointment. But he's encouraged. He's not discouraged. And we're determined to carry out our own schedule.

Secretary Vance will be back in Washington this weekend, and I will talk to him directly. We have had two or three communications from him daily. So, it's a temporary setback. It has been and can be serious, but we have hopes that we'll see it all straightened out and that political and military talks recommence.

Q. What kind of sense did you get from Mr. Sadat when you spoke with him? Did he seem discouraged?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, he seemed discouraged and, I'd say, deeply concerned. My request to him was to leave his negotiators in Jerusalem and not withdraw them that day. He said that his decision could not be reversed then. So, we shifted our conversation to the prospect of keeping open the invitation for the military negotiators to meet, and he agreed that that should continue. But he was quite concerned.

Q. He almost sounded like he was continuing the military portion almost as a favor to you.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I don't think it was that. I don't think my role was that significant. But my belief is that both Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat have a standard political problem—one is that they have large constituencies on their own side whom they have to represent, and at the same time, they are trying to lead those constituencies toward a reconciliation.

I'm sure there is some strategic and tactical component of what their speeches have been. I believe that at least up until this moment, they both trust us to act in good faith, and that's what we are trying to do. The more responsibility they take on themselves to negotiate directly, though, the better the prospects are for a rapid agreement.

Q. What is the next step now? Assuming the military talks do commence tomorrow, I believe, what is the next step to get those political talks going again?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. I think a lot of it will depend upon President Sadat's speech to his own Parliament tomorrow. I don't know what he will say. Obviously, one of the great things that brought the leaders together was a direct appeal through the news media to millions of people, to the world, indeed.

I think one of the obstacles now in progress is that overinclination to negotiate through the news media, because these matters in which we've been involved as an administration for a full year are very sensitive, very sharply defined, and they are much better worked out privately, where there can be a discussion of a word or a nuance or a phrase or an idea among negotiators without arousing the sharp feelings of millions of people, and where they can be resolved and substitute words or phrases or ideas can be initiated. That's very difficult to do in a public forum through the news media.

So, we hope to get, all of us, reconciled to the fact that the negotiators should deal with these items, recognize that there will be public statements that tend to aggravate and exacerbate the situation, but that that ought not to be a call or a reason for the negotiators to stop their work.

It's going to be a tedious process, and I'm sure we'll have ups and downs in the future.

Q. You know, in that connection, what you just mentioned, there's a theory that President Sadat did this, this dramatic move, trying to get you to put pressure on Israel to make more concessions.

THE PRESIDENT. I don't agree with that. In my own private communications with President Sadat, both through diplomatic dispatch and the telephone, my assessment is that he has been quite sincere in what he's done, that it's not posturing and not designed to influence our action one way or the other.

My guess is that President Sadat knows quite well that our influence on Israel is limited, and I think that Prime Minister Begin knows quite well that our influence on President Sadat and the Egyptians is quite limited.

But we are always there to assuage ill feelings and to offer substitute wording and, when the talks and discussions stagnate, to try to add some momentum to them; when they have a momentum of their own, for us to withdraw and play a lesser role.

What is now publicly identified as a very difficult negotiating process has been apparent to us as difficult for a long time, and not just in this administration but in the previous one as well. But I think the prospect for peace now, compared to what it was a year ago, is very good.

Q. How much money are you going to raise tonight?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. They feel good about it in Georgia. All the States around, plus Puerto Rico, are healthy. I think later we'll have a fundraiser in Texas, right?

Strauss has told me that whatever we raise in Georgia, they're going to double it in Texas. So, we hope to set a good base for him to meet.

MR. STRAUSS. He's setting goals for the administration now. [Laughter]

NOTE: The question-and-answer session was held during the flight from Andrews Air Force Base, Md., to Dobbins Air Force Base, Ga.

Ambassador Robert S. Strauss is Special Representative for Trade Negotiations and a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Question-and-Answer Session With Reporters on Arrival. January 20, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. [Inaudible—with President Sadat. Well, we're trying to keep both the military and the political talks going on there.

Q. Mr. President, how do you apprise the reaction of Congress to your State of the Union address?

THE PRESIDENT. It was surprisingly good. The last speech I made to them was not one that aroused any applause at all. It was devoted entirely to energy. But I thought that the response last night was excellent.

Q. When are you going to get around to actually working out the difficulty with the Dallas-London route and putting your signature on the transatlantic route—[inaudible]?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, that was not a difficult decision for me. My own inclination is, wherever possible, to encourage competition both in the international routes and also in the domestic routes. And I hope that the domestic carriers that have benefited from the flights overseas would be just as eager to have competition here on the domestic routes.

Q. Can we get a commitment from you to come to Atlanta to play a softball game with the media this summer—[laughter—when it's warmer.

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. I hope I get a chance to come back to Georgia this summer.

Q. Mr. President, some of the big city mayors were unhappy, and they expressed that unhappiness with the fact that you did not mention more help for the cities in your State of the Union address. What do you say to that?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, almost every item that's in the domestic budget is directly helpful to the major cities. We proposed hundreds of millions of dollars for basic education, for training programs, for public service jobs, for transportation, for housing, for crime control.

These moneys go into the urban centers, sometimes in much larger quantities than they do in other parts of the country, because the problems there are greater. And the fact that we don't have a special allotment of funds just for large cities is to be expected, and it certainly is no cause for concern by them.

I think the budget that I've put forward now—and our urban policy report that will be coming forward in March—will be very adequate for the cities, including Atlanta.

REPORTER. Thank you, Mr. President. Thank you very much.

THE PRESIDENT. It's good to see all of you. It's nice to be home. I think this is the first time I've been to Atlanta since I was President.

REPORTER. Welcome back.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

Atlanta, Georgia

Remarks at a Reception for Georgia Campaign Volunteers. January 20, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Rosalynn and I just ate supper in what Omni International calls the Carter Suite. [Laughter] It's the first thing that was ever named after us, you know, except maybe bank mortgages, and so forth. And they've got a plaque up, it's just as you go in, a big brass plaque about this big, and it said that "Jimmy and Rosalynn Carter and their family, sitting in this suite on November 3, 1976, learned that he was elected President of the United States." And as I read that plaque and looked around the room, I remembered the long evening and the fearful wait. And I thought about a lot of things. But at the top of my list of thoughts were you, 900, maybe 1,000 volunteers who came here to our headquarters in Atlanta months and months and months ahead of the time when the rest of the Nation knew who I was or cared or thought that I might possibly be President, and you worked for me.

You didn't get paid for it. A lot of you worked all day long, 5 or 6 days a week, because you had confidence in me and because you wanted to see a better nation and you wanted to see the South and the country become one.

I thank you for it. I hope so far we haven't disappointed you. And I pledge that I'll try not to ever do it.

I think it showed a lot of things. I won't go into all of them tonight because I don't want to make another long speech, but—[laughter]—but one of the things that I know it indicated was that there's a place in our free America for voluntary service, where you don't get paid in money and quite often you don't get paid in recognition even, but you get paid in the satisfaction of having participated in making decisions for the future of the greatest country on Earth. And it also indicates that one person can make a difference.

It's a very difficult thing to leave Plains, Georgia, 3 years ago—3 years ago today—and to work for a whole year, with your help, to enter the Iowa caucuses 2 years ago yesterday, to be inaugurated President 1 year ago today, to realize that when all of that occurred, when all of it began, you were there.

There were people in our headquarters and here tonight who were 9, 10, 11, 12 years old. There were people who had full-time jobs, professionals who, after working hours, came down and contributed their time and their knowledge and their experience and their thoughts for the future.

There were college students who came over from Georgia Tech and Georgia State and from Atlanta University complex, from Oglethorpe, to help us plan for the future. There were housewives who had families to care for, and there were retired people, men and women who were 65 or 75 or even 80 years old. And that kind of a conglomerate group of Georgians made the difference between whether I won or whether I lost. And I'm thankful to you that you were there, and the difference was that I won. Thank you very much.

I see one or two faces in the crowd who were down in Plains in 1966 and 1970 when I began to run for Governor. And I want to thank you in a special way and let you know that we're partners in everything I do every day. And I want you to stay close to me, because I need all the help and all the advice, all the counsel, all the criticism, all the prayers that I can get.

You'd be amazed at how many times we stand in a receiving line at the White House or go down a crowd of people at an airport or when I walked across the front of this room tonight, and people say, "We pray for you" or "Every month, our church has a special prayer service for you." And I say, "Look, make it every week"—[laughter]—"or every day because I really need it."

I feel at ease with the job that I have. I don't claim to know all the answers. I'm not any better qualified than many of you. But I sense that as President, as I did 2 or 3 years ago, I still have you behind me. And that makes the job easy for me. Thank you very much.

I had another supporter, as you know, way back then who traveled around the country for me. Mother kept Amy. But I want to let Rosalynn say just a word, if you don't mind.

MRS. CARTER. I just want to thank you for all you've done for tonight to get ready for this big banquet, for what you've done for us over the past year and before that in the campaign. It means so much to us. I know when we were campaigning, we always were very confident because we knew we had you at home and we knew that no matter where we were in the whole country, that you supported us. We feel that same way.

Jimmy's doing, I think, a great job for the country. There's so much that needs to be done. And I'm working and Jimmy's working, but we always know that you're here and that you care for us and that you support us. I just want to say that we need your continuing support, we need your continuing prayers and we love you all.

Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. How many of you think we have a great country? How many of you are going to join with me and Rosalynn and the rest of us to make it even greater? [Applause]

Well, thank you again. The only thing that I feel kind of strange about is me being way up here and you being way out there. It's not the way I ran my campaign, and that's the thing that I don't like about it. But I love every one of you.

Thank you very much. God bless you all.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:07 p.m. in Room 300 at the Georgia World Congress Center.

Atlanta, Georgia

Remarks at the Southern Salute to the President Dinner. January 20, 1978

It's a wonderful thing in the South to get almost as much applause as Bert Lance, and I thank you for it. [Laughter]

It's really nice to be back down here at home where I don't need an interpreter. A lot of people say that I had a hard time with an interpreter in Poland. But where I really have a hard time is in Washington, trying to get my message out to the people and explain what we're trying to do with the Federal Government. It got so bad this Christmas that when Amy and I sent our letters to Santa Claus, I got the dollhouse and she got a chain saw. [Laughter]

I never have quite made the transition from Plains to Washington successfully.

And when I've asked for advice around our Capital City, I've always heard back, "Well, you need to go to more Washington cocktail parties." I've tried to accommodate that recommendation and do the best I could. I can't go to all the Embassy parties. I just don't have time. So, I decided to send Hamilton Jordan. [Laughter]

Later on, I was told that the best way to deal with Congress to get your programs passed was to go to the cocktail parties, and Jody Powell went. And he tried to sell all 4-year programs in one night. It took him a week to get over it. [Laughter] Later, we have thought about converting some of the key Members of Congress to get our energy bill passed. My sister Ruth is planning on going to see Russell Long very shortly, maybe get an energy bill. [Laughter]

The only one that's really been completely successful so far has been Bert Lance. He's come out of Washington a hero. He's the only one in the Carter administration that's paid off all his debts. [Laughter] He's made more friends in the last 3 or 4 months than anybody I know. He's just embarked, or is embarking on a new career in television. There's a lot of openings at the top since Walter Cronkite became Acting Secretary of State. [Laughter]

And I know that all of you agree with me that tonight Joel and Wallace, Ken Curtis, Bert Lance have done an outstanding job in one of the greatest Democratic fundraisers in the history of our country. And I want all of us to express our thanks to them. We're proud of them.

How many of you heard the State of the Union speech last night, anybody? It was 45 minutes long, and I said all I wanted to say last night. So, I'm going to be very brief this evening, but there are a few things that I want to say.

This is the first time I've been back to Atlanta since Inauguration Day, a year ago tonight. And as I mentioned last evening, 2 years ago yesterday, we had the first Democratic caucus in Iowa. But long before that, many of you here in Georgia, and in Alabama and Mississippi and Florida and Tennessee and South Carolina, North Carolina, Kentucky, had confidence in me and gave me your support. And, of course, there's one region of the country, even though I am President of the whole Nation, that will always be close to my heart, and that's the South.

Tonight, with this banquet, I thought about the fact that we didn't have to join the Democratic Party when I was young. We were born into it. It became part of our life, part of our consciousness.

We grew up on a farm during the depression years. And we struggled from a time of hopelessness and despair and poverty, sometimes even hunger, with a sense that the future could be greater.

We had a President, Franklin Roosevelt, and we had memories and a history of the past with the fathers of our country, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and others, who had always had faith in common, ordinary, honest, hard-working American people. They trusted the judgment of those who are not powerful and influential, who sometimes are not wealthy or even well-educated, who do have a deep sense of what our Nation has been, is, and can be, a deep religious faith, a belief that the family, if it's tight-knit and filled with love, is the best source of inspiration, education, and preparation for an adult life. We learned what it meant to struggle and to obtain a good education.

And this region of the country has always been highly patriotic, maybe because our families, our ancestors remember the devastation of the War Between the States, when Atlanta itself was destroyed, and the values that we reobtained when our Nation was united, but we've always been committed to the strong defense of our country. We've always been a people who could see and who had a deep desire to see the product of each day's work.

I had a good life as a young boy on a farm, but I remember a sense of accomplishment and pride and inspiration for the future each day after I worked in the field with my father and others, to look back and see how many rows had been plowed, how much land had been broken, how much corn had been pulled, how much cotton had been picked. And there was a tangible measure of work well done in preparation for the future, when the wood box was filled with stove wood that my mother could burn the next day and when the water bucket was pumped full from a hand pump.

These kinds of things were specific assignments of responsibility. And it was a sense of community and common purpose and harmony and a sense of fulfillment and a sense that we were contributing in our own small way, but an identifiable way, to the welfare of our family, our community, and indeed, sometimes even the Nation itself.

That's the kind of spirit that's not too far in the past to be forgotten. Those kinds of commitments, those kinds of experiences, those kinds of hopes, those kinds of dreams, those kinds of accomplishments are the standards by which the strength of America can be preserved in our own individual lives.

All of us don't have to be rich. All of us don't have to hold political office. All of us don't have to be influential or well-known. But none of us who hold public office, who are influential, who are well-known can accomplish the ideals and the potentials of our Nation unless we work in harmony. And when there's a separation between government and people, between the rich and the poor, between blacks and whites, between the North and the South, between new cities and old cities, our Nation suffers. And we who have seen the devastation of war and the social and psychological devastation of racial segregation know the value of harmony, of family, and of a common purpose.

This month was a month when two great men of the South were born. One of them, Martin Luther King, Jr., who was not welcomed by most of us when he began with his lonely voice to point out the potentials of the South and the damage that was accruing to both blacks and whites by racial discrimination. But he had courage. And he gave his life that the South and the people he loved, both black and white, might reach our full potential. And as I said dozens of times in my 2 years of campaigning, there would have been absolutely no chance for me, a southerner, to ever think of becoming President of the United States had it not been for him and what he stood for and what he accomplished.

He saw that in a 30-year period the greatest thing that the South lost was our young people. Three million young whites left the South. Five million young blacks left the South. And now they are coming back home, because the stable, God-given resources of our Nation were waiting for them. And to utilize those resources, there is a united people, bound together by a sense of equality and common purpose and mutual respect, compassion, and even love.

And the other person who was born in January was a great leader, Robert E. Lee. Robert E. Lee was a man who understood the values of a region which he represented. He was never filled with hatred. He never felt a sense of superiority. He led the southern cause with pride, yes, but with a sense of reluctance as well. He fought his battles courageously. And he said on one occasion that the word that was the most sublime in the English language was "duty"—duty to our country, duty to our region, duty to our neighbors, duty to the high standards spoken to us by God.

Well, my heart really overflows when I think about the responsibilities that you have helped me to assume and the confidence you had in me and what you mean to me as neighbors, as advisers, as counselors, and as friends. It means a lot to me to come back here at home where I served this State for 4 years as Governor and 4 years in the legislature, 7 years on a county school board and 5 years on the hospital authority, and 3 years on the library board. And my roots are still the same as they were.

We learned from the Bible about the fallibilities even of people who were given great responsibility. I remember the story of the escape of the Israelites from Egypt, when Moses was a man anointed by God to lead. And when the Israelites were in a battle, God told Moses, "Hold up your arm." And as long as Moses held up his arms, the Israelites won. But after an hour or two or three, his arm got weary and it began to sink, and the Israelites began to lose. And his brother, Aaron, went and propped up his arm for a while. And later on Hur propped up Moses' arm for a while, and the Israelites won.

Well, I don't under any circumstances equate myself with Moses. But I would like to remind you of this: You elected me to be President. You gave me a job to do. As long as I'm in the White House, I'm going to try to do a good job, because you have confidence in me.

I'm not afraid of the responsibility. I'm not afraid of the past, the present, or the future. I'll do the best I can. Together we'll tackle the tough problems. But I'm depending on you that if my arm gets heavy and it starts to sag, I'm going to depend on you to help me prop it up.

And I believe that together, you and I, southerners, Americans, even people here from all over the world who have come to pay their own respects to the greatest nation on Earth, I believe that together we can realize the potential that's on our shoulders, to show that those ideals that we cherished as young people on the farms and in the cities can overcome the greatest obstacles, temptations for weakness, and show the strength that's in us and make America proud of us all.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:20 p.m. in Exhibit Hall C at the Georgia World Congress Center.

In his remarks, the President referred to Joel W. McCleary, treasurer of the Democratic National Committee, Wallace Hyde, co-chairman of the dinner, Kenneth M. Curtis, chairman of the DNC, and Bert Lance, former Director of the Office of Management and Budget and cochairman of the dinner.

Tax Reduction and Reform

Message to the Congress. January 20, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I recommend that Congress enact a series of proposals that will reform our tax system and provide $25 billion in net tax reductions for individuals and businesses.

Fundamental reform of our tax laws is essential and should begin now. Tax relief and the maintenance of a strong economy are essential as well. The enactment of these proposals will constitute a major step towards sustaining our eco-conomic recovery and making our tax system fairer and simpler.

THE NEED FOR TAX REDUCTION

I propose net tax reductions consisting of:

- $17 billion in net income tax cuts for individuals, through across-the-board rate reductions and a new personal credit, focused primarily on low and middle-income taxpayers.
- $6 billion in net income tax cuts for small and large corporations, through reductions in the corporate tax rates and extensions of the investment tax credit.
- $2 billion for elimination of the excise tax on telephone calls and a reduction in the payroll tax for unemployment insurance.

These tax reductions are a central part of the Administration's overall economic strategy, which will rely principally upon growth in the private sector to create the new jobs we need to achieve our high-employment objective. The tax reductions will more than offset the recent increase in social security taxes and will provide the consumer purchasing power and business investment strength we need to keep our economy growing strongly and unemployment moving down.

Together with the programs that I will outline in my Budget Message, these tax cuts should assure that our economy will grow at a 4½ to 5 percent pace through 1979, with unemployment declining to between 5½ and 6 percent by the end of 1979. Without the tax cuts, economic growth would slow markedly toward the end of 1978 and fall to about 3½ percent in 1979. Unemployment would be unlikely to fall below 6 percent and, by the end of 1979, might be moving upward.

This tax program will mean up to one million additional jobs for American workers. It should lead to a pattern of economic growth which is steady, sustainable, and noninflationary.

In addition, I believe that our taxpayers, particularly those in the low and middle-income brackets, deserve significant tax relief—I am determined to reduce Federal taxes and expenditures as a share of our Gross National Product.

THE NEED FOR TAX REFORM

The $25 billion in tax reductions are net reductions, after taking account of $9 billion in revenue-raising reforms which I am also proposing. Indeed, the full cuts in personal and corporate tax rates which I recommend would not be desirable in the absence of significant reform.

But these reforms stand on their own merits and would be long overdue even if I were not proposing any net tax reductions to accompany them. They focus on simplification for the individual taxpayer and the elimination of some of the most glaring tax preferences and loopholes.

Guided by the need for tax simplification and tax equity, I propose that Congress adopt reforms that would:

- Sharply curtail tax shelters.
- Eliminate the deductions claimed by businesses for theater and sporting tickets, yachts, hunting lodges, club dues, and first-class airfare and limit the deduction for the cost of meals to 50 percent.
- Provide a taxable bond option for local governments and modify the tax treatment of industrial development bonds.
- Strengthen the minimum tax on items of preference income for individuals.
- Repeal the special alternative tax on capital gains, which only benefits individuals in the highest tax brackets.
- Replace the personal exemption and general tax credits with a $240 per person credit.

—Simplify return preparation and recordkeeping by:

- eliminating the deductions for sales, personal property, gasoline, and miscellaneous taxes;
- combining the separate medical and casualty deductions and allowing them only to the extent they exceed 10 percent of adjusted gross income;
- repealing the deduction for political contributions but retaining the credit; and
- liberalizing and modifying the Subchapter S and depreciation rules applicable to small businesses.

—Include unemployment compensation benefits in the taxable income of taxpayers above certain income levels.

—Ensure that the tax preferences available for fringe benefits assist rank-and-file workers as well as executive officers.

—Eliminate the special bad debt deduction for commercial banks, reduce the bad debt deduction available to savings and loan associations, and remove the tax exemption for credit unions.

—Phase out the tax subsidies for Domestic International Sales Corporations (DISCs) and the deferral of tax on foreign profits.

These reforms will make our tax system both fairer and simpler. Many of them are targeted at tax preferences and subsidies for activities that do not deserve special treatment and that largely benefit those who have no need for financial assistance. The average working man and woman pay for the loopholes and the special provisions in our tax laws—because when some do not pay their fair share, the majority must pay higher taxes to make up the difference.

Low and middle-income workers, struggling to make ends meet, are discouraged by tax laws that permit a few individuals to live extravagantly at the expense of government tax revenues. The privileged few are being subsidized by the rest of the taxpaying public when they routinely deduct the cost of country club dues, hunting lodges, elegant meals, theater and sports tickets, and night club shows. But the average worker's rare "night on the town" is paid for out of his own pocket with after-tax dollars.

Likewise, individuals who pay taxes on nearly every penny of earnings are treated unfairly compared to the few who are able to "shelter" their high incomes from taxes. Some persons with incomes exceeding $200,000 have little or no tax liability, while other high-income individuals return to the Federal government nearly 60 cents of every dollar received. There is no good reason for next-door neighbors, in the same economic circumstances, to have vastly different tax bills because one has found tax shelters and loopholes.

In addition to the preferences for expense account items and tax shelter activities, there are a number of equally inappropriate and inefficient corporate tax subsidies. For example, there is no justification for the DISC export subsidy under which we pay over $1 billion a year in foregone tax revenue (mostly to our largest corporations) to encourage our firms to do what they would do anyway—export to profitable foreign markets. Nor can we rationalize proposals to reduce business taxes to increase investment at home while the deferral subsidy encourages multinational corporations to invest overseas by letting them pay lower taxes on their foreign profits than they pay on money earned in the United States.

I ask Congress to join with me to end these unwarranted subsidies and return the revenue to the vast majority of our taxpayers who want no more or less than to pay their fair share.

The tax reforms and tax reductions which I am proposing have been carefully balanced to coordinate with our overall economic and budgetary strategy. Large tax reductions are premised on substantial reforms.

I must, therefore, caution that fiscal prudence will require significantly reduced tax cuts for low and middle-income taxpayers if we cannot help finance the reductions I have proposed through enactment of these revenue-raising reforms. I am proposing a balanced tax program, and I urge Congress to consider these recommendations as an integrated package.

TAX REDUCTION AND SIMPLIFICATION FOR INDIVIDUALS

Under this tax program, virtually all Americans will receive substantial tax relief, principally through a simple, across-the-board reduction in personal tax rates. Lower withholding rates will be put into effect October 1, 1978, and taxpayers will experience an increase in take-home pay and purchasing power as of that date.

The typical taxpayer in all income classes up to $100,000 will pay lower taxes. But the bulk of relief has been targeted to low and middle-income taxpayers.

The $240 credit will be especially beneficial for low and middle-income families. It will remove millions of Americans at or near the poverty level from the income tax rolls. No longer will the tax savings for dependents be worth more to high income than low income families. Instead, the credit will be worth just as much to the moderate income blue-collar worker as to the wealthy executive.

Over 94 percent of the net individual tax relief will be provided to individuals and families earning less than $30,000 per year, and every income class up to $30,000 will bear a smaller share of the overall tax burden than it does now. (See Table 4.) Under my proposals, the typical family of four that earns $15,000 a year will save almost $260, a 19 percent tax reduction.

For most persons in the low and middle-income brackets, there will be a sizeable net reduction in combined income and payroll taxes even after the scheduled social security tax increases are taken into account. (See Table 10.) Without this cut in income taxes, the social security tax increases would cause a reduction in the take-home pay of American workers. With this tax program, we will have restored the integrity of the Social Security system—returning that system to a sound financial basis and assuring the stability of future benefits for retired workers—without increasing total taxes for most working people or causing a slowdown in our economic recovery.

We must also act to ease the burdens of tax return preparation and recordkeeping. We have a tax system that requires millions of individuals to compute their own tax liability. The government relies upon the good faith and conscientiousness of our taxpayers to an extent unparalleled in the rest of the world. But in order for our system to remain successful, it must be comprehensible to the average taxpayer.

Judged by this standard, the current tax structure is seriously defective. Millions of honest and intelligent Americans find themselves confused and frustrated by its complexity. The cost of this complexity is enormous in terms of hours and dollars spent.

Accordingly, tax simplification has been a goal of this Administration from the outset. The tax return individuals will file between now and April 15 has been simplified as a result of the Tax Reduction and Simplification Act which I proposed and Congress enacted last year. The short form 1040A has been reduced from 25 lines to 15 lines. Form 1040 has been restructured so that it can be completed more systematically. Tax tables have been revised to reduce arithmetic computations. The language of the tax forms and the instructions has been made more understandable.

The simplification efforts that were begun in 1977 will be continued and expanded in the tax program I am presenting today. The replacement of the existing personal exemption and general tax credits by the $240 personal credit will simplify return preparation for taxpayers and enable millions of individuals at or below the poverty level to file no tax return. Changes in itemized deductions (which will be more than offset by the rate cuts) will increase the number of nonitemizers to 84 percent of all taxpayers. Six million Americans will be able to switch to the standard deduction and avoid keeping detailed records for tax purposes. The preparation of returns by itemizers will be simplified, and the tax program will reduce recordkeeping burdens on small businesses.

BUSINESS AND ANTI-INFLATION TAX REDUCTIONS

Our Nation's employment and anti-inflation goals cannot be met without a strengthening of private business investment. In recent years, capital spending in the United States has been inadequate. Capacity growth in manufacturing has declined from a growth rate of about 4.5 percent during the period 1948-1969, to 3.5 percent from 1969-1973, and to 3 percent from 1973-1976. Real business fixed investment in the third quarter of 1977 was 5 percent below its 1974 peak.

In order to encourage needed capital outlays in the period ahead, my tax program contains annual net business tax reductions of approximately $6 billion. The corporate tax rate will be reduced on October 1, 1978 from 20 percent to 18 percent on the first $25,000 of income and from 22 percent to 20 percent on the second $25,000—this will result in a 10 percent reduction in tax liability for most small corporations. The tax rate for large corporations will be cut from 48 percent to 45 percent on October 1, 1978 and to 44 percent on January 1, 1980.

I also recommend several important changes in the existing 10 percent investment tax credit: the 10 percent credit should be made permanent; liberalized to cover up to 90 percent of tax liability; made fully applicable to qualified pollution control facilities; and extended to investments in industrial and utility structures (including rehabilitation of existing structures). These changes should be particularly beneficial to developing businesses that are seeking to expand their productive facilities and should help to increase expenditures for the construction of new factories.

The corporate rate reductions and extensions of the investment tax credit which I am proposing will encourage capital formation by providing an immediate increase in cash flow to business and by enhancing the after-tax rewards of investment.

All small businesses will receive significant cuts in their tax rates under my program: reducing the bottom as well as the top corporate rates will be of special benefit to small corporations; small business proprietorships and partnerships will benefit from the individual rate cuts. In addition to these tax reductions, my program will simplify the depreciation rules applicable to small business and liberalize the provisions governing the deductions of losses on stock held in small companies.

Vigorous business investment will help ease inflationary pressure by averting capacity shortages that might otherwise occur as our economy continues to grow. The $2 billion reduction in telephone excise taxes and employer payroll taxes should provide additional relief from inflation by reducing costs and prices. These tax measures, applied in conjunction with other anti-inflation policies announced in my Economic Report, will support the objective of reducing and containing the rate of inflation.

The combination of these tax cuts and needed business tax reforms will result in a tax system that meets the needs of the broad spectrum of U.S. businesses more efficiently and equitably.

A detailed description of my program follows.

RECOMMENDATIONS TO REDUCE TAXES AND SIMPLIFY RETURNS FOR THE AVERAGE TAXPAYER

Tax Reductions for Individuals

Individual taxes will be reduced through across-the-board rate cuts and substitution of a single $240 personal credit for the existing personal exemption and alternative general credits. This tax relief will be reflected in decreased withholding rates for employees as of October 1, 1978.

The tax reductions I am now recommending do not include adjustments for Congressional action on the National Energy Plan. In April, I proposed that Congress pass the crude oil equalization tax and rebate the proceeds to the American people on a per capita basis. This course is essential if we are to protect the real incomes of consumers. If the final energy bill includes a full rebate of the net proceeds of the crude oil tax, no further action on my part will be required. However, if the final bill contains a rebate provision only for 1978—as provided in the House version—I intend to send a supplemental message to Congress recommending that the individual tax reductions proposed in this Message be increased by the net proceeds of the crude oil tax.

(1) Rate Cuts. The proposed rate schedule will range from a lowest bracket of 12 percent to a top bracket of 68 percent, compared with the current 14 to 70 percent range. As under current law, the top rate bracket will apply with respect to income in excess of $200,000 for joint returns and $100,000 for single returns. The entire schedules are set forth in Tables 11 and 12. This new rate structure will, in and of itself, increase the overall progressivity of the individual income tax because the cuts are proportionately larger in the low and middle-income brackets.

(2) Per Capita Tax Credit. The tax benefits for dependents currently favor the wealthy over persons with modest incomes. A taxpayer is now entitled to a $750 exemption for each family member in addition to a general tax credit, which is equal to the greater of $35 per family member or 2 percent of the first $9,000 of taxable income. The net effect of the complicated series of exemptions and credits is this: a family of four in the 50 percent tax bracket enjoys a tax savings of $1,680 for dependents while families earning $10,000 save about one-third of that amount.

I propose that the existing exemption and general credits be replaced with a single credit of $240 per family member. Unlike the current structure, the new credit will provide the same benefit at all income levels; for a family with four members, the per capita credit will be worth $960 whether that family is middle class or wealthy. The $240 credit will ensure that most families at or near the poverty level will pay no taxes. Also, a single tax credit will simplify tax return preparation by eliminating the confusion caused by the existing combination of exemptions and alternative credits.

Changes in Itemized Deductions

The primary source of complexity in the tax laws for many middle-income individuals is itemized deductions. Average taxpayers have to maintain burdensome records in order to substantiate the deductions and are required to decipher complex tax rules to complete their tax returns. Restructuring of itemized deductions is essential if the tax laws are to be simplified for typical, middle-class individuals and families.

I am recommending changes in itemized deductions that will enable approximately 6 million taxpayers to switch to the simple standard deduction. The number of taxpayers who use the standard deduction will be increased from 77 percent to 84 percent. And the calculation of the deductions for itemizers will be simplified greatly.

The deductions that will be curtailed are ones that add complexity and inequity to the tax system without advancing significant objectives of public policy. We will have a simpler, more efficient tax system if we eliminate these deductions and return the revenue directly to taxpayers through the rate cuts I propose.

(1) State and Local Taxes. The special deduction will be eliminated for general sales taxes, taxes on personal property (but not on residences or buildings), gasoline taxes, and miscellaneous taxes. These itemized deductions are claimed at nearly uniform rates by all itemizers and result in a relatively small tax benefit. For those taxpayers who do not use the published deduction tables, the recordkeeping burden can be substantial.

Moreover, a deduction for these types of taxes cannot be defended on public policy grounds. A deduction for gasoline taxes runs counter to our national effort to conserve energy. And the present level of State sales taxes cannot be said to depend upon the fact that those State taxes are deductible for Federal income tax purposes.

(2) Political Contributions Deduction. Political contributions are now deductible as an itemized deduction in an amount not exceeding $200 for a joint return. Alternatively, a taxpayer may claim a credit against his tax for one-half of his political contributions, with a maximum credit of $50 on a joint return.

The reform program will repeal the political contribution deduction but retain the credit. The deduction is undesirable because it provides a larger subsidy to high-bracket contributors. Due to the present deduction, the wealthiest individuals can contribute $200 at an after-tax cost to them of only $60; middle-income Americans incur a cost of $150 for the same contribution. Elimination of the deduction will enhance tax equity and diminish the confusing complexity of the current scheme of deductions and credits.

(3) Medical and Casualty Deductions. The medical expense deduction is one of the most complicated items on the tax forms. Currently, one-half of the first $300 of health insurance premiums is deductible outright for those who itemize. Other medical expenses (including additional health insurance premiums) are deductible to the extent they are in excess of 3 percent of adjusted gross income. The latter category of deductibility also includes medicines and drugs to the extent they exceed 1 percent of adjusted gross income. And there is a separate deduction for damage to property from a casualty (such as theft or fire) if the loss exceeds $100 and is not reimbursed by insurance.

I recommend substantial simplification of these provisions. The deductions for medical and casualty expenses will be combined, and a new "extraordinary expense" deduction will be available for medical and casualty expenses in excess of 10 percent of adjusted gross income. In the case of casualty losses, the excess over $100 will be included in this computation. Medical insurance premiums and medicines will be treated the same as other medical expenses.

Medical and casualty expenditures should properly be deductible only when they are unusually large and have a significant impact on the taxpayer's ability to pay. The medical expense deduction originally met that standard. But, as a result of the changing relationship between medical costs and income, that standard is no longer satisfied. Substantial recordkeeping burdens and administrative problems can be eliminated through the proposed simplification of the deduction and the redefinition of "extraordinary" in the light of current experience among taxpayers.

PROPOSALS TO CURTAIL INAPPROPRIATE SUBSIDIES, SPECIAL PRIVILEGES, INEQUITIES AND ABUSES OF THE TAX SYSTEM

Entertainment and Other Expenditures for Personal Consumption

One feature of the current tax system that is most disheartening to average taxpayers is the favorable tax treatment accorded extravagant entertainment expenses that are claimed to be business-related. Some individuals are able to deduct expenditures that provide personal enjoyment with little or no business benefit. And, even where entertainment expenditures may have some relationship to the production of income, they provide untaxed personal benefits to the participants. More than $2 billion of tax revenue is lost every year through these tax preferences.

For example, one person claimed a deduction of $17,000 for the cost of entertaining other members of his profession at his home, at a country club, at sporting events, at restaurants, and at a rental cottage. Another individual wrote off the cost of business lunches 338 days of the year at an average cost far exceeding $20 for each lunch. But there is no deduction in the tax laws for the factory worker's ticket to a football game or the secretary's lunch with fellow workers.

These special tax advantages for the privileged few undermine confidence in our Nation's tax system. The disparity must be eliminated by denying a deduction for expenditures to the extent they provide the participants with such untaxed personal enjoyment and benefits.

(1) Theater and Sporting Events. No deduction will be permitted for purchases of tickets to theater and sporting events. Present law, by allowing a deduction for the purchase of such tickets, provides a "two for the price of one" bargain to some taxpayers. As long as an individual is in the 50 percent tax bracket or above, he may be able to invite a business friend at no cost to himself by having the Federal government pay for at least one-half of the total ticket costs. The overwhelming majority of our citizens pay for their theater and sports tickets out of their own after-tax dollars. No taxpayer should be asked to help subsidize someone else's personal entertainment.

(2) Other Entertainment Expenses. The tax reform program will also deny deductibility of any expenses of maintaining facilities such as yachts, hunting lodges and swimming pools and for fees paid to social, athletic, or sporting clubs. During a recent tax year, one small corporation deducted $67,000 for yacht expenses incurred in entertaining customers and potential customers on cruises and fishing trips. Another small company deducts over $100,000 a year to maintain hunting and fishing lodges to entertain employees of customers. Asking taxpayers to subsidize these kinds of activities for a tiny minority of our citizens strikes at the fairness and integrity of the tax system.

(3) Business Meals. Fifty percent of currently deductible business entertainment expenses for food and beverages will remain deductible, and 50 percent will be disallowed. A substantial portion of business meal expenses represents the cost of personal consumption that must be incurred regardless of the business connection. The millions of Americans who work on farms, in factories and in offices should not be required to provide their tax dollars to support the high-priced lunches and dinners of a relatively small number of taxpayers. The 50 percent disallowance represents a reasonable and fair approach to compensate for the untaxed personal benefit involved.

(4) Foreign Conventions. Many professional, business, and trade organizations can furnish their members with tax-deductible foreign vacations. The method of conferring such tax-subsidized luxury is to sponsor a foreign convention or seminar. A brochure for one professional organization provides the appropriate atmosphere in promoting its foreign seminars:

"Decide where you would like to go this year: Rome. The Alps. The Holy Land. Paris and London. The Orient. Cruise the Rhine River or the Mediterranean. Visit the islands in the Caribbean. Delight in the art treasures of Florence."

The Tax Reform Act of 1976 placed some limits on the deductibility of foreign convention expenses. But the rules still permit taxpayers to take two foreign vacations a year partially at public expense—an exception that did not escape the attention of the organization whose 1977 brochure I have quoted.

I am proposing that the deductibility rules for foreign conventions be modified in a manner that will curb abuses while relaxing the current restrictions on conventions held in foreign countries for legitimate business purposes. The two convention rule will be stricken. In its place will be a rule that denies deductibility for foreign convention expenses unless factors such as the purpose and membership of the sponsor make it as reasonable to hold the convention outside the United States and possessions as within.

(5) First Class Air Fare. Another example of public support for private extravagance is the deductibility of first class air fare. Business travel constitutes a legitimate cost of producing income. However, the business purpose is served by purchasing a ticket at coach fare. The undue generosity of a deduction for first class air fare was recognized by Congress in 1976 when a deduction was denied for first class flights to foreign conventions. I propose that the rule be extended to tickets for domestic business travel.

Tax Shelters

Through tax shelters, persons can use "paper" losses to reduce taxes on high incomes from other sources. These shelter devices can slash the effective tax rate for many affluent individuals far below that of average income Americans. Moreover, such shelters attract investment dollars away from profit-seeking businesses and into ventures designed only for tax write-offs; legitimate businesses suffer competitive disadvantages as a result.

In the Tax Reform Act of 1976, Congress enacted reforms intended to restrict tax shelter abuses. The principal methods used in that legislation were revisions of the minimum tax and the adoption of an

"at risk" rule to limit the deductibility of certain tax shelter losses.

However, some promoters have now adapted their operations to provide shelters in forms that were not specifically covered by the 1976 Act. In fact, shelter activity in 1977 may have surpassed the level reached in 1976. Form letters, addressed to "All of Us Who Wish to Reduce Our Taxes," boldly promise tax write-offs several times larger than the amount invested, and persons are urged to pass the message along "to anyone you think may have interest in tax reduction." Tax shelter experts promote their services in large and expensive advertisements in the financial sections of our Sunday papers.

Such flagrant manipulation of the tax laws should not be tolerated. I recommend action that will build upon the 1976 reforms and further reduce tax shelter abuses.

(1) Strengthening of the Minimum Tax. The minimum tax has proved to be one of the most useful devices to limit the attractiveness of tax shelter schemes, and it should be made still more effective. In its current form, the minimum tax is imposed at a rate of 15 percent on the amount of certain tax preference items enjoyed by a taxpayer. But the total amount of tax preferences can be reduced by the greater of $10,000 or one-half of regular tax liability (in the case of individuals) before the minimum tax is applied.

I recommend that the minimum tax for individuals be strengthened by eliminating the offset of one-half of regular tax liability against preference income. This change will make the minimum tax more progressive and a more sharply focused deterrent to the use of tax shelters. Persons making excessive use of preferences will be taxed on their preference income without regard to regular tax liability. On the other hand, those individuals with modest preference income will still be totally exempted from the minimum tax by the $10,000 preference offset, and the minimum tax will not be applied to capital gain realized on the sale of a personal residence. Ninety-eight percent of the $284 million in revenue raised by this proposal will come from taxpayers with incomes exceeding $100,000 and more than 77 percent will come from the income class over $200,000.

(2) Extension of "at risk" Rule. One of the 1976 reforms that should be toughened is the "at risk" rule. That rule denies deductibility for a shelter investor's paper losses that exceed his cash investment and indebtedness for which he has personal liability. My tax reform plan will generally extend the "at risk" provisions to cover all activities (except real estate) carried on individually, through partnerships, or by corporations controlled by five or fewer persons.

It is time to move depreciation for tax purposes more closely into line with a measurement of actual economic decline. The reform program will generally require taxpayers to base their depreciation for buildings on the straight-line method, using the present average tax lives claimed by taxpayers for different classes of property. Exceptions from the general rule will be granted until 1983 for new multifamily housing, which will be permitted to use a 150 percent declining balance method; new low-income housing will remain eligible for a 200 percent declining balance method until 1983, and for 150 percent thereafter. Needed investment in industrial plants will be encouraged by an extension of the investment credit, as explained below. The investment credit is a more efficient and straight-forward means to provide a tax subsidy for such construction.

(4) Taxation of Deferred Annuities. Another flourishing tax shelter gimmick is the deferred annuity contract. Currently, a person can generally invest in an annuity contract and postpone taxation on the interest build-up until the annuity is actually received. Although originally designed primarily to provide a safe flow of retirement income, the deferred annuity contract is now used commonly as a convenient tax dodge for a wide range of investment opportunities. The shelter benefits are aptly described by the promotional literature:

"How To Postpone Taxes Legally And Earn Interest On Uncle Sam's Money . . . . . With An Investment That Never Goes Down, Always Goes Up, And Is Guaranteed Against Loss."

I recommend that this tax abuse be eliminated. Under my proposal, the earnings of most deferred annuities will be taxed currently to the purchaser. However, in order that an individual may still use a deferred annuity with guaranteed interest as a means to provide retirement income, the proposal will allow each person to designate a single contract, contributions to which may not exceed $1,000 annually, as a contract that will remain eligible for tax deferral. Also unaffected will be the tax treatment of qualified employee annuities.

(5) Classification of Nominal Partnerships as Corporations for Tax Purposes.

In many cases, tax shelter schemes can offer the desired tax benefits to investors only if the shelter vehicle is organized as a partnership rather than a corporation. At the same time, limited partnerships can now provide traditional non-tax attributes of a corporation, such as limited personal liability, centralized management, and transferability of interests without sacrificing partnership tax benefits.

Promoters should not obtain the non-tax attributes of a corporation for their shelters while using technicalities to avoid corporate tax treatment. I recommend that new limited partnerships with more than 15 limited partners be treated as corporations for tax purposes; however, partnerships engaged primarily in housing activities will be excepted from this classification rule.

(6) Tax Audit of Partnerships. Tax shelter partnerships are not themselves subject to the tax assessment mechanism of the Internal Revenue Service; therefore, each individual partner must be audited separately even though the same substantive determinations may be involved. I recommend that legislation be enacted to permit a partnership to be treated as an entity for the purpose of determining tax issues. Tax shelters based on illegitimate deductions should not be permitted to succeed merely because of the difficulties involved in conducting an IRS examination of their activities.

Termination of Alternative Tax for Capital Gains

The wages of most workers are fully subject to tax at the rates contained in the published tax tables. But persons whose income arises from the sale of assets such as stock or land generally receive preferred treatment; a deduction for long-term capital gains has the effect of taxing these gains at a rate that is one-half of the rate for ordinary income. This preference results in an annual revenue loss to the Treasury of $8 billion.

Taxpayers in the highest income brackets are granted an additional tax preference over and above the special capital gains deduction. Individuals above the 50 percent tax bracket can take advantage of a 25 percent tax ceiling on the first $50,000 of capital gains, a provision known as the "alternative tax." The benefits of this provision go exclusively to persons with taxable incomes exceeding $52,000 (if filing a joint return) or $38,000 (if filing a single return)—less than one percent of all taxpayers.

Through the alternative tax, a wealthy investor can shield nearly 65 percent of his capital gains from taxation—a benefit that is grossly inequitable when middle-class investors are taxed on one-half of such gains, and most workers are taxed on every cent of their wages and salaries. The alternative tax costs the Treasury over $100 million every year, almost 90 percent of which goes to taxpayers in income classes above $100,000. I propose the repeal of this unfair and complicated tax benefit.

Fringe Benefits Unavailable to Rank-and-File Workers

Our tax system generally operates under the principle that employees should be taxed on their compensation no matter what form that compensation assumes. A worker who receives cash wages that he uses to provide benefits for his family should not ordinarily be taxed more heavily than the employee who receives those benefits directly from his employer. There are now exceptions to this general rule for certain types of employee benefits. I urge Congress to act so that these tax preferences benefit rank-and-file workers as well as the executive officers.

(1) Non-discrimination Requirement for Health and Group Life Plans. An example of a tax-preferred employee benefit is a health or group life insurance plan. If an individual purchases medical insurance, the premiums are deductible only within the limits applicable to the medical expense deduction. However, if an employer establishes a medical insurance program for its employees, the premium payments by the employer are deductible while neither the premiums nor the benefits are taxable to the employee.

Although this tax preference was designed in theory to secure basic protections for a wide range of employees, it often serves instead to subsidize expenses of only the high-level corporate managers. It is now possible for a businessman, through his controlled corporation, to establish a health plan that covers only one employee—himself—and permits all of his medical and dental expenses to be deducted. Meanwhile, that corporation's other employees have to provide health care for their families with nondeductible expenditures.

To curb this abuse, I recommend denial of the tax exemption for employer-established medical, disability, and group life insurance plans if those plans discriminate in favor of officers, shareholders, and higher-paid employees. Preferential tax treatment is now available to pension plans only if non-discrimination standards are met. The tax law should require similar non-discriminatory treatment for workers in the case of medical, disability, and group life insurance plans.

(2) Employee Death Benefits. Current law provides an exclusion for the first $5,000 of payments made by an employer on account of the death of an employee. I recommend the repeal of this exclusion. Typically, these death benefits are in the nature of deferred wages that would have been paid to employees in high tax brackets. Adequate tax relief for an employee's heirs is provided through a complete tax exemption for insurance proceeds.

(3) Integration of Qualified Retirement Plans and Social Security. Certain employer-sponsored retirement plans have a preferred tax status. Employer contributions to a qualified plan are currently deductible while the employee can defer taxation until retirement benefits are received. Although qualification for this special treatment is generally dependent upon non-discriminatory coverage of employees, the tax laws now permit a qualified plan to cover only employees who earn amounts exceeding the social security wage base—a base that will rise to $25,900 by 1980 under the recently enacted social security financing legislation.

It is unfair to grant tax preferences for private pension plans that bar all low and middle-income employees from participation. I propose that a new integration formula be enacted so that a qualified pension plan cannot provide benefits to supplement social security for highly compensated employees unless all employees receive some coverage under the plan.

Unemployment Compensation

Unemployment compensation is a substitute for wages that generally provides needed relief to persons in financial distress. But, in some cases, the unemployment compensation system discourages work for taxable income. Since unemployment benefits are tax-free, they are more valuable than an equivalent amount of wages. This means that if two individuals have the same total income, the one who remains idle several months and receives unemployment compensation will be better off financially than his colleague who works the whole year. There can be no justification for conferring this tax-free benefit upon middle and upper-income workers.

I propose that the current tax exemption for unemployment compensation benefits be phased out as an individual's income rises above $20,000 for single persons or $25,000 for married couples.

Taxable Bond Option and Industrial Development Bonds

Present law exempts from Federal taxation the interest on certain bonds issued by state and local governments. There are now two general categories of tax-exempt bonds: obligations issued for the benefit of the state and local government itself, and industrial development bonds issued by the government to provide facilities such as pollution control equipment, sports facilities, waste disposal facilities, industrial parks, and facilities (including hospitals) of private, non-profit organizations. Also, there is a "small issue" exemption for certain industrial development bonds with face amounts that do not exceed $1 million, or $5 million where the total cost of capital expenditures on the financed facility does not exceed the $5 million amount.

My tax program preserves the freedom of state and local governments to issue tax-exempt bonds. I am recommending reforms that will restrict the tax avoidance opportunities available to the wealthy in the tax-exempt market while, at the same time, increasing the ability of state and local governments to obtain low-cost financing. In particular, I propose the following:

(1) Option for Bonds Benefitting Governmental Units. State and local governments will be given the option of continuing to issue tax-exempt bonds or issuing fully taxable bonds, accompanied by a direct Federal interest subsidy to the governmental units. For bonds issued in 1979 and 1980, the subsidy will be equal to 35 percent of the interest cost; the subsidy will rise to 40 percent for bonds issued after 1980. The Federal government will exercise no control over the purposes for which state and local governments use subsidized financing. State and local governments will benefit under the taxable bond option regardless of whether they decide to issue taxable or tax-exempt bonds: those issuing taxable bonds will benefit directly from the interest subsidy, and those continuing to issue tax-exempt bonds will benefit because the reduced supply of such bonds will allow governments to sell them at lower interest rates.

(2) Pollution Control Bonds, Bonds for the Development of Industrial Parks, and Private Hospital Bonds. The tax exemption will be removed for interest on pollution control bonds and bonds for the development of industrial parks. Also, the exemption will be removed for bonds issued to finance construction of hospital facilities for private, non-profit institutions unless there is a certification by the state that a new hospital is needed. These activities are essentially for the benefit of private users, and the tax exemption for the bonds has the effect of undermining the financing of governmental functions. Moreover, the general exemption for hospital bonds encourages excessive expansion of unneeded hospital facilities and runs counter to the Administration's Hospital Cost Containment proposal.

(3) Small Issue Exemption. The existing "small issue" exemptions will be retained only for economically distressed areas; and, with respect to those areas, the $5 million exemption will be raised to $10 million.

(4) Option for Certain Industrial Development Bonds. Industrial development bonds which continue to enjoy tax-exempt status (such as those to finance sports facilities, housing, airports and convention facilities and small issues for economically distressed areas) will be eligible for the taxable bond option on the same terms as obligations issued for the benefit of state and local governments.

Accrual Accounting for Large Corporate Farms

Most taxpayers that are in the business of selling products must use an accrual method of accounting so that income is reflected accurately for tax purposes. However, farmers have historically been permitted to use the simpler cash method on the grounds that they lack the accounting and bookkeeping expertise required by the accrual system.

Congress acted in 1976 to deny the cash accounting privilege to most large corporate farms (with annual gross receipts exceeding $1 million), but retained an exception for large corporations that are "family owned." This distinction between family and nonfamily corporations bears no relationship to the rationale of preserving simple bookkeeping methods for small farmers. It has resulted in severe competitive imbalances between large corporations now required to use accrual accounting and those that are equally large but happen to fall within the definition of a "family farm."

This inequitable exception should now be eliminated. Corporate farms with gross receipts exceeding $1 million cannot fairly claim that they lack the sophistication necessary to comply with accrual accounting standards. Nor can lack of financial sophistication be claimed by farm syndicates used as investment vehicles by non-farmers. Therefore, I recommend that the accrual accounting requirement cover corporations with gross receipts greater than $1 million, regardless of their ownership, and all farm syndicates.

Tax Treatment of Financial Institutions

Financial institutions now have a favored tax status that is based largely on outmoded concepts regarding the nature of these businesses. Commercial banks, mutual savings banks and savings and loan associations were permitted to deduct artificially inflated reserves for bad debts in order to protect the banking system from catastrophic losses that were prevalent prior to the extensive banking legislation of the 1930's. Credit unions were exempted from taxation in the days when these institutions were small entities with close bonds among the members and few powers to provide extensive financial services. I am recommending changes that will recognize the contemporary practices of financial institutions and will bring the tax treatment of commercial banks, savings and loan associations and credit unions more in line with the taxation of other businesses. These reforms will raise $300 million per year in revenue.

(1) Commercial Banks. Commercial banks may now claim bad debt deductions that greatly exceed their actual losses. Under legislation enacted in 1969, this special bad debt deduction is scheduled for elimination after 1987. I propose that the effective date for repeal be accelerated so that beginning in 1979 banks, like other businesses, will base their bad debt reserves on their own experience in the current and 5 preceding years.

(2) Mutual Savings Banks and Savings and Loan Associations. Mutual savings banks and savings and loan associations are also permitted a special bad debt deduction that bears no relationship to actual experience. These thrift institutions are generally entitled to deduct 40 percent of their net income (this percentage is scheduled to apply in 1979) as a bad debt reserve as long as a significant portion of their deposits is invested in real estate loans. My tax program will reduce the percentage to 30 percent over a 5-year period.

(3) Credit Unions. Credit unions are tax-exempt. Yet, their powers and functions are defined so broadly that the term "credit union" can include financial institutions that are functionally identical to a savings and loan association. The tax exemption provides them with an unfair financial advantage over their competitors. I propose that the percentage of exempt income be phased out over a 4-year period, and that credit unions be taxed in the same manner as mutual savings banks and savings and loan associations after 1982.

Domestic International Sales Corporation (DISC)

Business incentives form an integral part of my tax program. I am recommending measures that will encourage American businesses to invest in productive facilities and to create jobs. However, adoption of those incentives must be accompanied by the elimination of tax preferences that have proved to be wasteful. The so-called "DISC" provision is a prime example.

In 1971, Congress enacted a special tax program for exports. This program permitted tax benefits for exports channeled through a company's specially created subsidiary, usually a paper organization, known as a domestic international sales corporation (DISC). Artificial pricing rules on transactions between the parent company and its DISC permit a favorable allocation of export profits to the DISC, and the taxation of one-half of eligible DISC income is deferred as long as these profits are invested in export related assets.

DISC has proved to be a very inefficient and wasteful export subsidy in the current international monetary system. A recent Treasury study indicates that DISC may have contributed only $1 to $3 billion to U.S. exports in 1974—an increase of less than 3 percent in total exports—at a tax revenue cost of $1.2 billion. In the long run, even these increased exports are probably offset by rising imports that result from the operation of the flexible exchange rate system. DISC does nothing for, and may even disadvantage, our import sensitive industries and our exporters not using the DISC provision. Independent experts believe that DISC may have had no positive effect on our balance of payments.

Congress has recognized the wasteful nature of DISC and, in 1976, limited its applicability. However, DISC continues to cost U.S. taxpayers over $1 billion per year, with 65 percent of DISC benefits going to corporations with more than $250 million in assets.

I propose the elimination of one-third of DISC benefits in 1979, two-thirds in 1980, and all DISC benefits in 1981 and thereafter.

Foreign Tax Deferral

Domestic corporations can now avoid paying a U.S. tax on the earnings of their foreign subsidiaries as long as those earnings remain overseas. A U.S. tax is generally deferred until dividends are paid by the subsidiary to its domestic parent, and then U.S. tax liability is offset by a tax credit for foreign income taxes paid on those remitted earnings. Fifty percent of all the benefits of tax deferral is obtained by 30 large multinational corporations.

I recommend that this deferral privilege be phased out over a 3-year period. At least one-third of a foreign subsidiary's earnings will be taxed to the U.S. parent in 1979, at least two-thirds in 1980, and all the subsidiary's earnings after 1980. The tax reform program is designed to create incentives for investment in the United States and the creation of jobs for American workers. Tax deferral runs counter to these objectives. By providing a preference for foreign source income, the current deferral provision provides an incentive for investing abroad rather than in the United States, thereby having the effect of reducing job opportunities for Americans. Moreover, deferral can encourage multinational corporations to manipulate internal transfer prices in order to allocate income to low-tax countries.

There is no reason to defer the imposition of a U.S. tax just because business operations are conducted abroad rather than in the United States, regardless of the motivation for creating a foreign subsidiary. Congress eliminated in 1969 certain special tax preferences for businesses conducted in the United States through multi-layered corporations. I propose that Congress act in a similar manner to end the present preference for business operations conducted internationally through such multinational corporate structures.

The foreign tax credit will be retained in its present form. Therefore, elimination of deferral will not result in a double taxation of overseas earnings. And, in the event it appears to be in the national interest to permit tax deferral with respect to specific countries, such treatment can be provided selectively under negotiated tax treaties involving mutual concessions.

SPECIAL TAX REDUCTIONS PROPOSED TO REDUCE COSTS FOR CONSUMERS AND BUSINESSES

I propose two tax reduction measures—outside the income tax system—that will assist our efforts to attain price stability.

Repeal of Excise Tax on Telephone Services

The present 4 percent excise tax on amounts paid for telephone services is now being phased out at the rate of 1 percentage point a year, with full repeal scheduled as of January 1, 1982.

I recommend complete repeal of this tax as of October 1, 1978. This action will reduce the cost of living directly. It will also lower consumer prices indirectly through a reduction of the business cost associated with telephone services.

Federal Unemployment Insurance Tax

I recommend a reduction in the Federal unemployment insurance tax to reduce the payroll costs of employers. On January 1, 1978, the unemployment insurance tax rate rose from 0.5 percent to 0.7 percent of an employer's taxable wage base. This tax increase was instituted in order to replenish general revenue funds that have been loaned to the unemployment insurance trust fund during recent periods of high unemployment. But the issue of unemployment compensation financing requires a thorough reexamination to determine the best means of providing future benefits. To this end, I will soon appoint the National Commission on Unemployment Insurance which the Congress established to make this study and to offer recommendations. In the meantime, I am guided by my concerns about inflation. I propose that the tax rate be reduced to the 0.5 percent level as of January 1, 1979.

RECOMMENDED BUSINESS INCENTIVES TO FOSTER GROWTH OF THE ECONOMY

Corporate Rate Cut

I recommend a corporate rate cut that will reduce business taxes by $6 billion. Tax relief in this form is sizable, easily understood by taxpayers, and applicable across the board.

The corporate tax rate is now 20 percent on the first $25,000 of income, 22 percent on the next $25,000, and 48 percent on corporate income exceeding $50,000. Effective October 1, 1978, this program will reduce the first two rate brackets to 18 and 20 percent, respectively, and the rate to 45 percent on taxable income in excess of $50,000. The top rate will be reduced an additional point, to 44 percent, on January 1, 1980. Small as well as large corporations will benefit from these rate cuts.

A corporate rate reduction of this magnitude will increase capital formation and help to assure a sustained economic recovery. In recent years, the level of business fixed investment has been unsatisfactory. One of the primary causes of this inadequate investment performance has been the low rate of return businesses receive on their investments—after tax liability is taken into consideration. The lower tax rates I recommend will enhance the anticipated after-tax profits on corporate investment projects and increase cash flow immediately. Businesses will thereby be encouraged to increase capital spending and to create jobs for American workers. Corporate rate cuts this large are made possible by, and depend upon, passage of the revenue-raising business tax reforms I have described earlier.

Liberalization of Investment Tax Credit

The investment tax credit has proven to be one of the most potent tax incentives for capital formation. It provides a direct reduction in tax liability generally equal to 10 percent of a business' qualifying investments. But there are now several limitations that restrict its effectiveness.

I recommend changes that will make the investment credit a stronger, more efficient, and more equitable incentive. These changes will reduce business taxes by approximately $2.5 billion per year.

(1) Permanent 10 Percent Credit. The present 10 percent investment credit is not a permanent feature of the Internal Revenue Code. On January 1, 1981, the credit level is scheduled to revert to 7 percent. I propose that the credit be extended permanently at a 10 percent rate so that businesses can plan ahead with greater certainty of the tax benefits that will be associated with projected capital expenditures.

(2) Increased Tax Liability Ceiling. The investment credit claimed during any taxable year cannot generally exceed $25,000 plus 50 percent of tax liability in excess of that amount (with excess credits being eligible for a 3-year carryback and a 7-year carry-forward). My tax program will provide a ceiling of 90 percent of tax liability (including the first $25,000) and will thereby increase the incentive for those businesses with relatively high investment needs and low taxable incomes. Developing businesses and firms suffering from temporary business reversals will be helped to compete more effectively with their larger or more stable competitors.

(3) Eligibility of Structures. The investment credit now applies only to machinery and equipment. My tax program will extend eligibility for the credit to utility and industrial structures, where investments have been especially sluggish. Investment in these structures reached its peak over 4 years ago and is now 16 percent below that level. It is important that we act to remedy the existing tax bias against structures and encourage balanced industrial expansion. In order to ensure that this provision has no anti-urban bias, I propose that the investment credit be available for both new structures and the rehabilitation of existing structures.

I recommend that this provision apply to construction costs incurred after December 31, 1977. In the case of new structures, there will be an additional requirement that the facility be placed in service after that date.

(4) Liberalized Credit for Pollution Control Facilities. I propose that pollution abatement facilities placed in service after December 31, 1977, be allowed to qualify for a full 10 percent credit even if special 5-year amortization is claimed under the provisions of existing law. Currently, only a 5 percent credit may be combined with rapid amortization. This proposal will provide significant tax relief for industries that are forced to make pollution control expenditures in order to comply with environmental regulations.

Revision and Simplification of Regulations Under the Asset Depreciation Range System

The asset depreciation range (ADR) system provides substantial tax benefits to businesses. Under ADR, generous class lives are prescribed for categories of assets, and a taxpayer can select useful lives for depreciation purposes within a range that extends from 20 percent below to 20 percent above the designated class life. However, certain complexities in the ADR regulations discourage most businesses, especially small ones, from electing this depreciation system and impose administrative burdens on those businesses that do use ADR.

I recommend legislation expressly permitting the Treasury Department to issue regulations that will simplify the ADR system. Included among the changes will be a termination of the annual reporting requirement.

Proposals Focused on Small Business

The tax reductions I recommend will provide significant benefits for small businesses. For example, a small corporation with annual income of $50,000 will save $1,000 in taxes due to corporate rate reductions. For that corporation, tax liability will be reduced by nearly 10 percent. Moreover, those small businesses conducted in partnership or sole proprietorship form will benefit substantially from the rate cuts I have proposed for individuals.

But in addition to providing these general tax incentives, I recommend three proposals designed specifically to assist small businesses. First, my tax program will simplify and liberalize the rules (Subchapter S) that treat certain small corporations as partnerships; the number of permissible shareholders will generally be increased from 10 to 15, and the rules governing subchapter S elections will be made less stringent. Second, a simplified method of depreciation will be authorized for small businesses that will provide tax benefits similar to the current ADR system without complex recordkeeping requirements. And third, risk-taking will be encouraged by doubling the amount of a small corporation's stock (from $500,000 to $1 million) that can qualify for special ordinary loss treatment and by eliminating several technical requirements that needlessly restrict the ability of small businesses to use this provision.

CONCLUSION

Enactment of these recommendations will effect major reform of our tax laws, provide significant tax relief, and sustain our economic recovery.

This program will eliminate a number of the inequities that undermine the integrity of the tax system. It will make preparation of returns simpler and more understandable for millions of taxpayers. Prompt passage will strengthen the confidence of consumers and businesses in our growing economy and lead to the creation of up to one million new jobs for workers who need them.

I look forward to working in partnership with Congress to enact this program of tax reform and tax reduction.

Budget Message

Message to the Congress Transmitting the Fiscal Year 1979 Budget. January 20, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

The first complete budget of any new administration is its most important. It is the administration's first full statement of its priorities, policies, and proposals for meeting our national needs. Last February, after just one month in office, I submitted a revised budget to the Congress. That revision changed the direction of the prior administration's budget, but was—of necessity—based upon a review of limited scope. I promised then that future budgets would reflect detailed, zero-based reviews of Federal spending programs, reform of the tax system, and reorganization of the Government. This budget is my first major step in meeting that promise. It reflects, I believe, a determination to face and make difficult decisions in a manner that places the common good above that of any particular interest.

This budget represents a careful balancing of several considerations:

- The importance of a fiscal policy that provides for a continuing recovery of the Nation's economy from the 1974–75 recession;
- The obligation of the Government to meet the critical needs of the Nation and its people;
- The fact that resources are limited and that Government must discipline its choices and its scope; and
- The need for careful and prudent management of the taxpayers' resources.

THE BUDGET TOTALS

[In billions of dollars]

	1977 actual	1978 estimate	1979 estimate
Budget receipts . . . . .	357	400	440
Budget outlays . . . . .	402	462	500
Deficit (–) . . . . .	–45	–62	–61
Budget authority . . . . .	465.2	502.9	568.2

My budget provides for total outlays of $500 billion, an increase of $38 billion, or 8%, over the 1978 budget, and receipts of $440 billion. This budget total is a restrained one that:

- Meets essential national needs;
- Imposes strict priorities upon Federal expenditures; and
- Decreases the share of the Nation's gross national product taken by the Federal Government from 22.6% to 22.0%.

This budget places us on a path that will permit a balanced budget in the future if the private economy continues its recovery over the coming years.

At the same time, my budget embodies a fiscal policy that will strengthen the economic recovery. I propose a progressive tax reduction of $25 billion to help assure continued economic recovery and reduction in unemployment. An integral part of this tax reduction proposal is a set of recommendations for tax reform that will make the tax system simpler and more equitable. Without the reduction, I would have been able to announce a decline in the deficit of $15 to $20 billion between 1978 and 1979. With the reduction, the budget deficit will still decline slightly, because of careful restraints on expenditures. But I judged that the most important priority this year was to reduce the burdens on taxpayers. Only in this way can we ensure a vigorous economy, a declining unemployment rate, a strong expansion of private investment, and a stable budget balance in future years.

While the expenditures I recommend in this budget are restrained, they are, nevertheless, directed toward overcoming our Nation's crucial problems. I have looked carefully at existing approaches to these problems and improved those approaches where possible. The spending priorities of the past are now being shifted toward long-neglected areas. These new priorities are based on the following judgments:

—An effective national energy plan is essential to reduce our increasingly critical dependence upon diminishing supplies of oil and gas, to encourage conservation of scarce energy resources, to stimulate conversion to more abundant fuels, and to reduce our large trade deficit.

The national energy plan I proposed last spring defined these goals. This budget includes the programs and initiatives designed to meet those objectives. Included are increased emphases on conservation and nonnuclear research and development, energy grants and technical assistance to States and localities, accelerated acquisition of the strategic petroleum reserve, and greater emphases on nuclear waste management. I continue in the unswerving belief that the Nation's leaders have the obligation to plan for the future, and that the national energy plan is essential to the future health and vigor of the American economy. The United States also must take the lead in minimizing the risks of nuclear weapons proliferation as we advance nuclear power technology. Thus, this budget increases research and development funding for systems that present fewer risks than the plutonium-fueled liquid metal fast breeder reactor.

—The essential human needs of our citizens must be given high priority.

In the spring of 1977 I proposed a long-overdue reform of the Nation's welfare system. This reform recognizes that this is a Nation of men and women who do not wish to be wards of the Government but who want to work and to be self-sufficient. It includes a combination of employment opportunities and incentives for those who should work, and a basic income for those who cannot. This budget anticipates that Congress will pass the program for better jobs and income, and begins the process of careful planning for the implementation of an efficient and equitable system.

The budget also recognizes that ensuring the opportunity to compete and excel remains very important to our people. To give all children the healthiest possible start in life, I propose major expansion of medical care and nutritional supplements for low-income expectant mothers and infants. In addition, I propose major increases in educational assistance at all levels. Because of the continued high level of unemployment, particularly among minorities, I believe public employment programs should be continued at high levels for another year. Major increases in programs stressing employment for unemployed youth are recommended. A new effort will be mounted to place more disadvantaged persons in private sector jobs by increasing the involvement of the business community in local employment and training programs.

I view a workable urban strategy as an important link in a well-articulated domestic program and essential to the continuing recovery of the national economy. This budget includes increases for many programs benefiting urban areas and supports several efforts to improve these programs. I anticipate sending to the Congress early in the spring a set of further proposals dealing with the Nation's urban problems.

—The Nation's armed forces must always stand sufficiently strong to deter aggression and to assure our security.

My request for defense provides for the steady modernization of our strategic forces, and for substantial improvements in the combat readiness of our tactical forces. To parallel commitments made by our European allies, I am proposing significant increases in our overall defense effort, with special emphasis on those forces and capabilities most directly related to our NATO commitments. The defense budget I recommend also emphasizes modernization and research and development to meet future challenges to our security. But at the same time, I am restraining defense expenditures by introducing important efficiencies and by placing careful priorities upon our defense needs. The 1979 defense budget is prudent and tight, but consists of a real growth in outlays of 3% above the current year's budget. Consistent with campaign pledges to the American people, it is $8 billion below the defense budget projected for 1979 by the previous administration.

—The Federal Government has an obligation to nurture and protect our environment—the common resource, birthright and sustenance of the American people.

This budget provides for substantially increased emphasis on protection of all our environmental resources, for new attention to our common heritage, and for substantial additions to our system of public lands. Planned use of our natural resources has been designed so that the most important of our unspoiled areas can remain forever in the hands of the people.

—The Federal Government must lead the way in investing in the Nation's technological future.

Shortly after taking office, I determined that investment in basic research on the part of the Federal Government had fallen far too low over the past decade. Accordingly, I directed that a careful review be undertaken of appropriate basic research opportunities. As a result of that review, this budget proposes a real rate of growth of almost 5% for basic research in 1979. I believe this emphasis is important to the continued vitality of our economy.

This budget also reflects this administration's commitment to two important approaches to making government work more efficiently and responsively: reorganization and zero-base budgeting.

The reorganization effort I have launched seeks more than just a streamlining of organization structure and the elimination of overlaps and duplication. It seeks to make our Government more responsive, more efficient, and more clearly focused on the most pressing needs of our society. In 1977 I proposed—and the Congress accepted—a Cabinet-level Department of Energy, a streamlined Executive Office of the President, and a consolidation of our international information activities. In 1978 I will propose further reorganizations in such areas as the Federal Government's civil rights activities and the Federal civil service system to make it more responsive and effective.

As I promised during my campaign, zero-base budgeting system have been applied throughout the Federal Government. This budget is the product of a comprehensive zero-base review of all Federal programs, both existing and new. In reviewing each agency's proposals, I have used zero-base budget alternatives and agency rankings to compare and evaluate the many requests competing for resources. As a result of the first year's effort, we have gained a better understanding of Federal programs and have made better, more evenhanded judgments. Because of this system the budget includes dollar savings, and improvements in the way programs are operated. With experience, zero-based budgeting should be even more effective in future years.

Other significant changes in the budget process are reflected in this document. First: I have directed the Office of Management and Budget to establish a multi-year budget planning system using longer range budget projections. This will ensure that budget decisions are made with full awareness of their longer range implications. Second: we are using better techniques for estimating outlays so as to avoid the chronic "shortfalls" of recent years. Third: we have explicitly related the classification of the budget in terms of functions performed by Government programs to the national needs and agency missions served, as called for in the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

In formulating this budget I have been made acutely aware once more of the overwhelming number of demands upon the budget and of the finite nature of our resources. Public needs are critically important; but private needs are equally valid, and the only resources the Government has are those it collects from the taxpayer. The competition for these resources and my belief and commitment that we must firmly limit what the Government taxes and expends have led me to the premises on which my first budget is based.

- Critical national needs exist—particularly human and social ones—to which resources must be directed.
- Government resources are scarce; their use must be planned with the full awareness that they come from the earnings of workers and profits of business firms.
- The span of government is not infinite. Priorities must be set and some old priorities changed. If we are to meet adequately the most critical needs, some demands must also be deferred. Government action must be limited to those areas where its intervention is more likely to solve problems than to compound them.
- We have an obligation to manage with excellence, and to maintain proper priorities within the $500 billion proposed in this budget. We all know that in a budget of this scale—larger than the gross national product of all but three nations in the world—there are dollars wasted and dollars misspent. These must be minimal.

These premises are unexceptionable in general, but difficult and controversial to apply. They have guided my actions in formulating this budget and they will continue to do so in the future. But to be successful I will need, and will work for, the help and cooperation of the Congress. Both the Congress and the Executive have a clear, joint interest in an approach that helps us to meet the demands of the future. In recent years the Congress has taken important steps—through the establishment of the congressional budget process—to improve its own means of establishing priorities. This administration has worked closely with the congressional appropriations and budget committees and has found them invaluable sources of advice. We will continue in this spirit of cooperation, and I look forward to working with the Congress and its leadership to obtain adoption of my budget for fiscal year 1979.

Secretary of State Vance's Trip to the Middle East

*White House Statement on the President's Meeting With Secretary Vance.
January 23, 1978*

Secretary Vance reported this evening to the President on his trip last week to the Middle East to attend the opening sessions of the Political Committee of the Cairo Conference in Jerusalem and on his visits to Greece and Turkey this past weekend.

On the Middle East, Secretary Vance described for the President the work on a declaration of principles which would govern the negotiation of a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East that had begun in the Political Committee before the Egyptian delegation was withdrawn.

The Secretary expressed his judgment that, while the work of the Political Committee is temporarily suspended, the negotiating process can continue. Both the President and the Secretary have urged that discussions between Egypt and Israel in the Security Committee of the Cairo Conference continue. They hope that these talks may resume soon. The President stressed that we are prepared to continue the exchanges with Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat that the Secretary began last week on a declaration of principles. Assistant Secretary Atherton is staying in the Middle East to be helpful in this effort.

The President and the Secretary expressed the hope that the public exchanges of recent days are now behind us and that every effort will be made to recapture the spirit that followed recent meetings between Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat and to turn full attention through quiet diplomacy to the substance of the negotiations.

Secretary Vance also reported on his brief visits to Ankara and Athens. In each place, he had extended discussions with the respective leaders on matters of bilateral cooperation and on regional and global issues of concern to us as allies. No decisions were taken in these conversations. Our ties with both countries remain strong and vital.

United States Foreign Intelligence Activities

*Remarks on Signing Executive Order 12036.
January 24, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. This morning, we've gathered to sign an Executive order which makes a major stride forward in better coordination within the Intelligence Community.

One of the pleasant experiences that I've had as President is to see the professionalism and the competence of the collection and analysis and distribution of intelligence information to me and to other consumers in the Federal Government. Under Admiral Turner, this coordination has been superb. And I'm very pleased this morning, after months of work with the NSC—the National Security Council—with the Department of Defense, with Admiral Turner, the CIA, the Congress committees, particularly the Senate Intelligence Committee, to have evolved an Executive order which establishes in clear terms the responsibilities and limitations of the collection of intelligence, of counterintelligence, and also the distribution of material that hasn't been analyzed.

The Director of Central Intelligence, Admiral Turner, will be responsible for tasking or assigning tasks to all those who collect intelligence. He will also have full control of the intelligence budget and will also be responsible for the analysis of information that does come in from all sources in the foreign intelligence field.

This order also gives a great deal of additional responsibility to the Attorney General to make sure that the civil liberties and the privacy of American citizens is adequately protected and that the constitutional provisions and the laws of our Nation are carried out precisely. There's a clear description of the duties and responsibilities of all those that are involved in the collection and distribution of intelligence information.

I'm very proud of this Executive order. It will be a basis for congressional action on a charter to be written for the Intelligence Community, and I think later on, we'll have one for the FBI, as well.

Under this order, though, under counterintelligence, the duties of the FBI are also spelled out. So, this is a fairly concise, clear delineation of how the Intelligence Community will be operating in the months ahead.

I want to express my thanks to all those that have been involved in the process. And after I sign the Executive order this morning, there will be a complete briefing for the press by the members of the NSC, the Department of Defense, the Attorney General's office, and Admiral Turner, representing the Intelligence Community.

So, I want to thank all of you standing behind me, and I will now sign the Executive order which, I think, is a major stride forward. Thank you very much.

[At this point the President signed the Executive order.]

Fritz, if you would come over and say a word?

VICE PRESIDENT MONDALE. I have some notes.

THE PRESIDENT. Very good. [Laughter]

VICE PRESIDENT MONDALE. Mr. President, members of the Senate and House intelligence committee:

When I served in the Senate, it was our task for some time to explore and investigate abuses by our intelligence agencies. It was not a happy job, and it disclosed not only many abuses of the civil liberties of our people but, in many ways, decisions and actions that were counterproductive to the interests of our country.

In my opinion, the most important principle that this Executive order stands for is that it demonstrates that we can fully protect our Nation and do so within the law, and not only do it within the law but do it better than under a circumstance which permits us to resort to illegality.

Underlying the abuses that we uncovered was an unexpressed but clearly evident conclusion on the part of some that we could not defend our country against her real enemies except through illegality. Once you examine that, it's true that the only way you can effectively protect against our enemies is through legal process.

And that's what this Executive order stands for. It's a historic document. It's the first time, I think, any major nation has tried to rationalize in writing, through legislative charters, the protection of their nation from enemies, and to do so within the law.

We need the best intelligence community in the world, and we have it. And under this Executive order, it will be even better. I think what it really stands for is that the framers of our Constitution were pretty wise men after all.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you. The chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee this past year has been Senator Danny Inouye, who had worked very closely with us. He has done a superb job. One of the facets of this Executive order is it directs those who are involved in the Intelligence Community to share information, sometimes of a highly confidential or secret nature, with the Members of the Congress, so that there can be a joint sharing of responsibility for the collection and dissemination of intelligence information in a legal way.

Danny, I'd like to call on you to say a word.

SENATOR INOUE. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee, I wish to thank you and commend you for giving us an opportunity to participate in the drafting of this extraordinary Executive order. We concur with you that statutory charters are important. And accordingly, I'm pleased to advise you that next week, a draft charter brought about by the work of Senators Huddleston and Mathias will be introduced in the Senate, and we look forward to working with you, sir. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Very fine. The new chairman of the Intelligence Committee and one who's served long and well on the committee is Senator Birch Bayh. Birch, would you like to say just a word?

SENATOR BAYH. Mr. President, I'm looking forward to having a chance to continue the strong leadership that Senator Inouye has provided for the committee. I would like to add my commendation. This is the first time in history that the Congress has had this kind of cooperation with the executive branch. And this is the second step—I would like to remind those who are here—in which you, as President, have undertaken a landmark initiative. We met in the Rose Garden in the spring, where for the first time in history you were willing to waive your inherent authority to get involved in electronic surveillance.

So, as we move forward with the charters, I think it is important to understand that this is critical. Presidents and Congresses are mortal. We have been reminded of that rather tragically in the last few days. And it's important to put these basic protections in the bedrock law of our land.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you. A new committee that's just been formed in the Congress this past year, certainly with my strong approval and support, has been the House Intelligence Committee. Eddie Boland is the chairman. Eddie, perhaps you'd like to say a word.

REPRESENTATIVE BOLAND. Mr. President, first of all I want to express, on behalf of all my colleagues on the House side, our appreciation at the invitation that brings us to this very significant and very meaningful occasion. I only have a couple of observations. I'm delighted to come, first of all, to find out whether or not the signatures on the letters that I get from you are genuine. [Laughter] I've seen you sign here; I know they are. [Laughter]

Then I'm delighted to see that behind us—and I think the press will recognize this—there is no dispute within the Intelligence Community over what we're doing, either what Admiral Turner is doing or what the President is doing. Everybody is here, and everybody is happy with it.

I'm also conscious of the fact that the Senators are way ahead of us in this area and have been for some time. It's the only area in which the Senate is ahead of us, incidentally. [Laughter] We hope to catch up. It's going to be a difficult job. But frankly, they have led the way, and I think, perhaps, they have taken the Congress through the thickest of what this particular activity within the Congress means and its significance.

And as the Vice President has so well said and you have so well said, this Executive order is historical. It does indicate that we can operate an intelligence community within the framework of our Constitution, to protect the rights and ensure the rights of the people of our Nation. And that's exactly why we are in business.

So, Mr. President, with this Executive order, with the charter legislation that is coming out of the Senate, with the foreign surveillance intelligence legislation that has been considered by the House, is being considered by Chairman Murphy of our committee, why, we can assure you that you will find the House in cooperation with you, with the administration, and with the Senate committee.

Thank you very much for inviting us.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much, Eddie. Dee Huddleston has been the chairman of the subcommittee responsible for the drafting of legislation precedent to the actual evolution of the charter which will be part of our Nation's laws.

Senator Huddleston has worked very closely with me and others in the basic premises included in the Executive order. This is a good basis. We all recognized that the Intelligence Community has to have some degree of flexibility. And there are a few directives that will not be included in this Executive order because of their highly confidential nature, but all those are being shared and will be shared with the Senate and the House committees. We are very proud of the relationship that we have.

SENATOR HUDDLESTON. Well, thank you, Mr. President. I certainly want to express my appreciation and that of our subcommittee to you and your entire staff for the cooperation and help you've given. I doubt if there has been an Executive order in recent years, maybe never, that has had as much congressional input as this particular one.

And I have to say that Bill Miller and Elliott Maxwell on our committee staff have done a tremendous job in providing us with the input that we've been able to make. I think this certainly is an appropriate interim step between where we have been in our intelligence operations and the control and accountability and authority that's been exercised there and where we all know that we want to go; and that is, with legislative, statutory charters setting out the missions, the accountability, the authorities of all of our intelligence agencies.

Uppermost in our mind, Mr. President—and I, too, along with Vice President Mondale, went through the so-called Church committee's investigative period—in spite of the abuses that we saw revealed, I think our major objective still, as we protect the rights and privileges of our citizens, is to provide the machinery under which the United States of America can have the best, most efficient, most effective intelligence apparatus in the world. That's what we are going to work toward. As our chairman has indicated, we're prepared now, and certainly will be by the end of next week, to introduce legislation, our first piece of legislation relating to the charters. We see that as a starting point.

The long period of time it took to bring this into being, I think, demonstrates the very complex and difficult problems that we are faced with. So, I'm sure we're going to have the same kind of cooperation between the Intelligence Community and the executive that we've had previously. And I believe that we can develop the kind of charters that will bring about the assurances that all of us want.

Thank you, sir, very much.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you. Senator Huddleston said that never before in history has an Executive order by the President had so much congressional input. I doubt if ever before in history an Executive order has had so much input from the President. [Laughter] I have sent it back three or four times to be redrafted so I could understand it. [Laughter] I think now it's in very good shape.

I'd like to call on Congressman Murphy. He has the same responsibility in the House as Dee Huddleston does in the Senate, the drafting of a new charter.

REPRESENTATIVE MURPHY. Thank you, Mr. President. On behalf of the committee, I'd like to congratulate you, Mr. President, on keeping your promise that you made during your campaign that you would bring the intelligence agencies into some meaningful order under this Executive order. I'd also like to thank Attorney General Bell and his staff.

We have already begun our work on the national surveillance act. And as my chairman, Mr. Boland, has reminded us, we are behind. I think that's an admonishment to me. We will catch up.

Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you. I wanted to call on, also, Senator Mathias, who's been a great help to us. Senator Goldwater has been the vice chairman of the committee for a long time. He's not here today.

SENATOR MATHIAS. Mr. President, as I stood here this morning, I thought a little bit about the advice of Speaker Reed, who defined the duties of the minority as to draw your pay and help make a quorum. [Laughter] I want to assure you that the minority in this case is going to do more than that, that we're going to work very hard on this statutory charter and to try to develop in the spirit in which you have started us out this morning.

I think it needs to be said that we want it to be not only an effective instrument which provides us with the best intelligence and that we want it to provide the kind of restraints which ensure the rule of law in our country, but we also want it to be a shield for the men and women who devote their lives to the intelligence services and to give them the kind of guidance within which they can develop their own careers.

Thank you very much, Mr. President.

REPRESENTATIVE WILSON. I'm again the minority on our side, but we are very much interested in this Executive order. I commend you for having taken all of the different intelligence responsibilities from various agencies and putting them under one executive head, which has been one of the problems we have seen in the past. And I predict that we'll come along and support you continuously in the future.

Thank you very much.

THE PRESIDENT. I want to say I won't call anyone else from the executive branch, because you will be getting a briefing in detail from the National Security Council, Department of Defense, the DCI, which is the Director of Central Intelligence, and also the Attorney General.

But in closing, let me remind the group once again of what I said at the beginning: One of the most professional and competent organizations with which I have ever dealt has been the Intelligence Community. It consists of several thousand highly professional, dedicated American people whose knowledge and experience stands as a bulwark in protecting the security of our Nation.

And although there have been problems in the past, probably because of an absence of a clear directive about delineations of responsibility, I think that this has quite often obscured the sacrificial work that these good men and women have done.

Again, I want to express my complete appreciation and confidence in Admiral Stan Turner, whose responsibilities under this Executive order will be greatly magnified. He's worked very closely with the Attorney General and with the Secretary of Defense. During normal peacetime, which I hope will prevail throughout all of our lifetime, he will have the responsibilities that I outlined.

In case of a conflict or extreme national emergency, under the Executive order, the President has the authority to shift part of that responsibility to the Secretary of Defense to defend our Nation in time of war. But that will be done in a very careful, preplanned way. And the present interrelationship that exists today, to be enhanced by the Executive order, between Defense, Justice, and intelligence, is very clearly defined and is a harmonious working relationship.

This could not have been possible without a great deal of consultation and a close cooperation and, I think, a mutual purpose that was recognized by everyone.

I think this is a major step forward. I'm very deeply grateful to all of you.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11:45 a.m. at the signing ceremony in the Cabinet Room at the White House.

United States Foreign Intelligence Activities

UNITED STATES INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and statutes of the United States of America including the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for the organization and control of United States foreign intelligence activities, it is hereby ordered as follows:

ing out responsibilities assigned in this Order, shall be chaired by the Director of Central Intelligence and composed of the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, or their designees, and other senior officials, as appropriate.

1-202. Duties. The PRC shall:

(a) Establish requirements and priorities for national foreign intelligence;

(b) Review the National Foreign Intelligence Program and budget proposals and report to the President as to whether the resource allocations for intelligence capabilities are responsive to the intelligence requirements of the members of the NSC.

(c) Conduct periodic reviews of national foreign intelligence products, evaluate the quality of the intelligence product, develop policy guidance to ensure quality intelligence and to meet changing intelligence requirements; and

(d) Submit an annual report on its activities to the NSC.

1-203. Appeals. Recommendations of the PRC on intelligence matters may be appealed to the President or the NSC by any member of the PRC.

1-3. NSC Special Coordination Committee.

1-301. Membership. The NSC Special Coordination Committee (SCC) is chaired by the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs and its membership includes the statutory members of the NSC and other senior officials, as appropriate.

1-302. Special Activities. The SCC shall consider and submit to the President a policy recommendation, including all dissents, on each special activity. When meeting for this purpose, the members of the SCC shall include the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Director of Central Intelligence.

1-303. Sensitive Foreign Intelligence Collection Operations. Under standards established by the President, proposals for sensitive foreign intelligence collection operations shall be reported to the Chairman by the Director of Central Intelligence for appropriate review and approval. When meeting for the purpose of reviewing proposals for sensitive foreign intelligence collection operations, the members of the SCC shall include the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the Director of Central Intelligence, and such other members designated by the Chairman to ensure proper consideration of these operations.

1-304. Counterintelligence. The SCC shall develop policy with respect to the conduct of counterintelligence activities. When meeting for this purpose the members of the SCC shall include the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Director of Central Intelligence, and the Director of the FBI. The SCC's counterintelligence functions shall include:

(a) Developing standards and doctrine for the counterintelligence activities of the United States;

(b) Resolving interagency differences concerning implementation of counterintelligence policy;

(c) Developing and monitoring guidelines consistent with this Order for the maintenance of central records of counterintelligence information;

(d) Submitting to the President an overall annual assessment of the relative threat to United States interests from intelligence and security services of foreign powers and from international terrorist activities, including an assessment of the effectiveness of the United States counterintelligence activities; and

(e) Approving counterintelligence activities which, under such standards as may be established by the President, require SCC approval.

1-305. Required Membership. The SCC shall discharge the responsibilities assigned by sections 1-302 through 1-304 only after consideration in a meeting at which all designated members are present or, in unusual circumstances when any such member is unavailable, when a designated representative of the member attends.

1-306. Additional Duties. The SCC shall also:

(a) Conduct an annual review of ongoing special activities and sensitive national foreign intelligence collection operations and report thereon to the NSC; and

(b) Carry out such other coordination and review activities as the President may direct.

1-307. Appeals. Any member of the SCC may appeal any decision to the President or the NSC.

1-4. National Foreign Intelligence Board.

1-401. Establishment and Duties. There is established a National Foreign Intelligence Board (NFIB) to advise the Director of Central Intelligence concerning:

(a) Production, review, and coordination of national foreign intelligence;

(b) The National Foreign Intelligence Program budget;

(c) Interagency exchanges of foreign intelligence information;

(d) Arrangements with foreign governments on intelligence matters;

(e) The protection of intelligence sources and methods;

(f) Activities of common concern; and

(g) Other matters referred to it by the Director of Central Intelligence.

1-402. Membership. The NFIB shall be chaired by the Director of Central Intelligence and shall include other appropriate officers of the CIA, the Office of the Director of Central Intelligence, the Department of State, the Department of Defense, the Department of Justice, the Department of the Treasury, the Department of Energy, the Defense Intelligence Agency, the offices within the Department of Defense for reconnaissance programs, the National Security Agency and the FBI. A representative of the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs may attend meetings of the NFIB as an observer.

1-403. Restricted Membership and Observers. When the NFIB meets for the purpose of section 1-401(a), it shall be composed solely of the senior intelligence officers of the designated agencies. The senior intelligence officers of the Army, Navy and Air Force may attend all meetings of the NFIB as observers.

1-5. National Intelligence Tasking Center.

1-501. Establishment. There is established a National Intelligence Tasking Center (NITC) under the direction, control and management of the Director of Central Intelligence for coordinating and tasking national foreign intelligence collection activities. The NITC shall be staffed jointly by civilian and military personnel including designated representatives of the chiefs of each of the Department of Defense intelligence organizations engaged in national foreign intelligence activities. Other agencies within the Intelligence Community may also designate representatives.

1-502. Responsibilities. The NITC shall be the central mechanism by which the Director of Central Intelligence:

(a) Translates national foreign intelligence requirements and priorities developed by the PRC into specific collection objectives and targets for the Intelligence Community;

(b) Assigns targets and objectives to national foreign intelligence collection organizations and systems;

(c) Ensures the timely dissemination and exploitation of data for national foreign intelligence purposes gathered by national foreign intelligence collection means, and ensures the resulting intelligence flow is routed immediately to relevant components and commands;

(d) Provides advisory tasking concerning collection of national foreign intelligence to departments and agencies having information collection capabilities or intelligence assets that are not a part of the National Foreign Intelligence Program. Particular emphasis shall be placed on increasing the contribution of departments or agencies to the collection of information through overt means.

1-503. Resolution of Conflicts. The NITC shall have the authority to resolve conflicts of priority. Any PRC member may appeal such a resolution to the PRC; pending the PRC's decision, the tasking remains in effect.

1-504. Transfer of Authority. All responsibilities and authorities of the Director of Central Intelligence concerning the NITC shall be transferred to the Secretary of Defense upon the express direction of the President. To maintain readiness for such transfer, the Secretary of Defense shall, with advance agreement of the Director of Central Intelligence, assume temporarily during regular practice exercises all responsibilities and authorities of the Director of Central Intelligence concerning the NITC.

1-6. The Director of Central Intelligence.

1-601. Duties. The Director of Central Intelligence shall be responsible directly to the NSC and, in addition to the duties specified elsewhere in this Order, shall:

(a) Act as the primary adviser to the President and the NSC on national foreign intelligence and provide the President and other officials in the Executive Branch with national foreign intelligence;

(b) Be the head of the CIA and of such staff elements as may be required for discharge of the Director's Intelligence Community responsibilities;

(c) Act, in appropriate consultation with the departments and agencies, as the Intelligence Community's principal spokesperson to the Congress, the news media and the public, and facilitate the use of national foreign intelligence products by the Congress in a secure manner;

(d) Develop, consistent with the requirements and priorities established by the PRC, such objectives and guidance for the Intelligence Community as will enhance capabilities for responding to expected future needs for national foreign intelligence;

(e) Promote the development and maintenance of services of common concern by designated foreign intelligence organizations on behalf of the Intelligence Community;

(f) Ensure implementation of special activities;

(g) Formulate policies concerning intelligence arrangements with foreign governments, and coordinate intelligence relationships between agencies of the Intelligence Community and the intelligence or internal security services of foreign governments;

(h) Conduct a program to protect against overclassification of foreign intelligence information;

(i) Ensure the establishment by the Intelligence Community of common security and access standards for managing and handling foreign intelligence systems, information and products;

(j) Participate in the development of procedures required to be approved by the Attorney General governing the conduct of intelligence activities;

(k) Establish uniform criteria for the determination of relative priorities for the transmission of critical national foreign intelligence, and advise the Secretary of Defense concerning the communications requirements of the Intelligence Community for the transmission of such intelligence;

(l) Provide appropriate intelligence to departments and agencies not within the Intelligence Community; and

(m) Establish appropriate committees or other advisory groups to assist in the execution of the foregoing responsibilities.

1-602. National Foreign Intelligence Program Budget. The Director of Central Intelligence shall, to the extent consistent with applicable law, have full and exclusive authority for approval of the National Foreign Intelligence Program budget submitted to the President. Pursuant to this authority:

(a) The Director of Central Intelligence shall provide guidance for program and budget development to program managers and heads of component activities and to department and agency heads;

(b) The heads of departments and agencies involved in the National Foreign Intelligence Program shall ensure timely development and submission to the Director of Central Intelligence of proposed national programs and budgets in the format designated by the Director of Central Intelligence, by the program managers and heads of component activities, and shall also ensure that the Director of Central Intelligence is provided, in a timely and responsive manner, all information necessary to perform the Director's program and budget responsibilities;

(c) The Director of Central Intelligence shall review and evaluate the national program and budget submissions and, with the advice of the NFIB and the departments and agencies concerned, develop the consolidated National Foreign Intelligence Program budget and present it to the President through the Office of Management and Budget;

(d) The Director of Central Intelligence shall present and justify the National Foreign Intelligence Program budget to the Congress;

(e) The heads of the departments and agencies shall, in consultation with the Director of Central Intelligence, establish rates of obligation for appropriated funds;

(f) The Director of Central Intelligence shall have full and exclusive authority for reprogramming National Foreign Intelligence Program funds, in accord with guidelines established by the Office of Management and Budget, but shall do so only after consultation with the head of the department affected and appropriate consultation with the Congress;

(g) The departments and agencies may appeal to the President decisions by the Director of Central Intelligence on budget or reprogramming matters of the National Foreign Intelligence Program.

(h) The Director of Central Intelligence shall monitor National Foreign Intelligence Program implementation and may conduct program and performance audits and evaluations.

1-603. Responsibility For National Foreign Intelligence. The Director of Central Intelligence shall have full responsibility for production and dissemination of national foreign intelligence and have authority to levy analytic tasks on departmental intelligence production organizations, in consultation with those organizations. In doing so, the Director of Central Intelligence shall ensure that diverse points of view are considered fully and that differences of judgment within the Intelligence Community are brought to the attention of national policymakers.

1-604. Protection of Sources, Methods and Procedures. The Director of Central Intelligence shall ensure that programs are developed which protect intelligence sources, methods and analytical procedures, provided that this responsibility shall be limited within the United States to:

(a) Using lawful means to protect against disclosure by present or former employees of the CIA or the Office of the Director of Central Intelligence, or by persons or organizations presently or formerly under contract with such entities; and

(b) Providing policy, guidance and technical assistance to departments and agencies regarding protection of intelligence information, including information that may reveal intelligence sources and methods.

1-605. Responsibility of Executive Branch Agencies. The heads of all Executive Branch departments and agencies shall, in accordance with law and relevant Attorney General procedures, give the Director of Central Intelligence access to all information relevant to the national intelligence needs of the United States and shall give due consideration to requests from the Director of Central Intelligence for appropriate support for CIA activities.

1-606. Access to CIA Intelligence. The Director of Central Intelligence, shall, in accordance with law and relevant Attorney General procedures, give the heads of the departments and agencies access to all intelligence, developed by the CIA or the staff elements of the office of the Director of Central Intelligence, relevant to the national intelligence needs of the departments and agencies.

1-7. Senior Officials of the Intelligence Community. The senior officials of each of the agencies within the Intelligence Community shall:

1-701. Ensure that all activities of their agencies are carried out in accordance with applicable law;

1-702. Make use of the capabilities of other agencies within the Intelligence Community in order to achieve efficiency and mutual assistance;

1-703. Contribute in their areas of responsibility to the national foreign intelligence products;

1-704. Establish internal policies and guidelines governing employee conduct and ensure that such are made known to each employee;

1-705. Provide for strong, independent, internal means to identify, inspect, and report on unlawful or improper activity;

1-706. Report to the Attorney General evidence of possible violations of federal criminal law by an employee of their department or agency, and report to the Attorney General evidence of possible violations by any other person of those federal criminal laws specified in guidelines adopted by the Attorney General;

1-707. In any case involving serious or continuing breaches of security, recommend to the Attorney General that the case be referred to the FBI for further investigation;

1-708. Furnish the Director of Central Intelligence, the PRC and the SCC, in accordance with applicable law and Attorney General procedures, the information required for the performance of their respective duties;

1-709. Report to the Intelligence Oversight Board, and keep the Director of Central Intelligence appropriately informed, concerning any intelligence activities of their organizations which raise questions of legality or propriety;

1-710. Protect intelligence and intelligence sources and methods consistent with guidance from the Director of Central Intelligence and the NSC;

1-711. Disseminate intelligence to cooperating foreign governments under arrangements established or agreed to by the Director of Central Intelligence;

1-712. Execute programs to protect against overclassification of foreign intelligence;

1-713. Instruct their employees to cooperate fully with the Intelligence Oversight Board; and

1-714. Ensure that the Inspectors General and General Counsel of their agencies have access to any information necessary to perform their duties assigned by this Order.

1-8. The Central Intelligence Agency. All duties and responsibilities of the CIA shall be related to the intelligence functions set out below. As authorized by the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, the CIA Act of 1949, as amended, and other laws, regulations and directives, the CIA, under the direction of the NSC, shall:

1-801. Collect foreign intelligence, including information not otherwise obtainable, and develop, conduct, or provide support for technical and other programs which collect national foreign intelligence. The collection of information within the United States shall be coordinated with the FBI as required by procedures agreed upon by the Director of Central Intelligence and the Attorney General;

1-802. Produce and disseminate foreign intelligence relating to the national security, including foreign political, economic, scientific, technical, military, geographic and sociological intelligence to meet the needs of the President, the NSC, and other elements of the United States Government;

1-803. Collect, produce and disseminate intelligence on foreign aspects of narcotics production and trafficking;

1-804. Conduct counterintelligence activities outside the United States and coordinate counterintelligence activities conducted outside the United States by other agencies within the Intelligence Community;

1-805. Without assuming or performing any internal security functions, conduct counterintelligence activities within the United States, but only in coordination with the FBI and subject to the approval of the Attorney General;

1-806. Produce and disseminate counterintelligence studies and reports;

1-807. Coordinate the collection outside the United States of intelligence information not otherwise obtainable;

1-808. Conduct special activities approved by the President and carry out such activities consistent with applicable law;

1-809. Conduct services of common concern for the Intelligence Community as directed by the NSC;

1-810. Carry out or contract for research, development and procurement of technical systems and devices relating to authorized functions;

1-811. Protect the security of its installations, activities, information and personnel by appropriate means, including such investigations of applicants, employees, contractors, and other persons with similar associations with the CIA as are necessary;

1-812. Conduct such administrative and technical support activities within and outside the United States as are necessary to perform the functions described in sections 1-801 through 1-811 above, including procurement and essential cover and proprietary arrangements;

1-813. Provide legal and legislative services and other administrative support to the Office of the Director of Central Intelligence.

1-9. The Department of State. The Secretary of State shall:

1-901. Overtly collect foreign political, sociological, economic, scientific, technical, political-military and associated biographic information;

1-902. Produce and disseminate foreign intelligence relating to United States foreign policy as required for the execution of the Secretary's responsibilities;

1-903. Disseminate, as appropriate, reports received from United States diplomatic and consular posts abroad;

1-904. Coordinate with the Director of Central Intelligence to ensure that national foreign intelligence activities are useful to and consistent with United States foreign policy;

1-905. Transmit reporting requirements of the Intelligence Community to the Chiefs of United States Missions abroad; and

1-906. Support Chiefs of Mission in discharging their statutory responsibilities for direction and coordination of mission activities.

1-10. The Department of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall:

1-1001. Overtly collect foreign financial and monetary information;

1-1002. Participate with the Department of State in the overt collection of general foreign economic information;

1-1003. Produce and disseminate foreign intelligence relating to United States economic policy as required for the execution of the Secretary's responsibilities; and

1-1004. Conduct, through the United States Secret Service, activities to determine the existence and capability of surveillance equipment being used against the President of the United States, the Executive Office of the President, and, as authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury or the President, other Secret Service protectees and United States officials. No information shall be acquired intentionally through such activities except to protect against such surveillance, and those activities shall be conducted pursuant to procedures agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General.

1-11. The Department of Defense. The Secretary of Defense shall:

1-1101. Collect national foreign intelligence and be responsive to collection tasking by the NITC;

1-1102. Collect, produce and disseminate foreign military and military-related intelligence information, including scientific, technical, political, geographic and economic information as required for execution of the Secretary's responsibilities;

1-1103. Conduct programs and missions necessary to fulfill national and tactical foreign intelligence requirements;

1-1104. Conduct counterintelligence activities in support of Department of Defense components outside the United States in coordination with the CIA, and within the United States in coordination with the FBI pursuant to procedures agreed upon by the Secretary of Defense and the Attorney General, and produce and disseminate counterintelligence studies and reports;

1-1105. Direct, operate, control and provide fiscal management for the National Security Agency and for defense and military intelligence and national reconnaissance entities;

1-1106. Conduct, as the executive agent of the United States Government, signals intelligence and communications security activities, except as otherwise directed by the NSC;

1-1107. Provide for the timely transmission of critical intelligence, as defined by the Director of Central Intelligence, within the United States Government;

1-1108. Review budget data and information on Department of Defense programs within the National Foreign Intelligence Program and review budgets submitted by program managers to the Director of Central Intelligence to ensure the appropriate relationship of the National Foreign Intelligence Program elements to the other elements of the Defense program;

1-1109. Monitor, evaluate and conduct performance audits of Department of Defense intelligence programs;

1-1110. Carry out or contract for research, development and procurement of technical systems and devices relating to authorized intelligence functions;

1-1111. Together with the Director of Central Intelligence, ensure that there is no unnecessary overlap between national foreign intelligence programs and Department of Defense intelligence programs and provide the Director of Central Intelligence all information necessary for this purpose;

1-1112. Protect the security of Department of Defense installations, activities, information and personnel by appropriate means including such investigations of applicants, employees, contractors and other persons with similar associations with the Department of Defense as are necessary; and

1-1113. Conduct such administrative and technical support activities within and outside the United States as are necessary to perform the functions described in sections 1-1101 through 1-1112 above.

1-12. Intelligence Components Utilized by the Secretary of Defense. In carrying out the responsibilities assigned in sections 1-1101 through 1-1113, the Secretary of Defense is authorized to utilize the following:

1-1201. Defense Intelligence Agency, whose responsibilities shall include:

(a) Production or, through tasking and coordination, provision of military and military-related intelligence for the Secretary of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, other Defense components, and, as appropriate, non-Defense agencies;

(b) Provision of military intelligence for national foreign intelligence products;

(c) Coordination of all Department of Defense intelligence collection requirements for departmental needs;

(d) Management of the Defense Attache system; and

(e) Provision of foreign intelligence and counterintelligence staff support as directed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

1-1202. National Security Agency (NSA), whose responsibilities shall include:

(a) Establishment and operation of an effective unified organization for signals intelligence activities, except for the delegation of operational control over certain operations that are conducted through other elements of the Intelligence Community. No other department or agency may engage in signals intelligence activities except pursuant to a delegation by the Secretary of Defense;

(b) Control of signals intelligence collection and processing activities, including assignment of resources to an appropriate agent for such periods and tasks as required for the direct support of military commanders;

(c) Collection of signals intelligence information for national foreign intelligence purposes in accordance with tasking by the NITC;

(d) Processing of signals intelligence data for national foreign intelligence purposes consistent with standards for timeliness established by the Director of Central Intelligence;

(e) Dissemination of signals intelligence information for national foreign intelligence purposes to authorized elements of the Government, including the military services, in accordance with guidance from the NITC;

(f) Collection, processing, and dissemination of signals intelligence information for counterintelligence purposes;

(g) Provision of signals intelligence support for the conduct of military operations in accordance with tasking, priorities and standards of timeliness assigned by the Secretary of Defense. If provision of such support requires use of national collection systems, these systems will be tasked within existing guidance from the Director of Central Intelligence;

(h) Executing the responsibilities of the Secretary of Defense as executive agent for the communications security of the United States Government;

(i) Conduct of research and development to meet needs of the United States for signals intelligence and communications security;

(j) Protection of the security of its installations, activities, information and personnel by appropriate means including such investigations of applicants, employees, contractors and other persons with similar associations with the NSA as are necessary; and

(k) Prescribing, within its field of authorized operations, security regulations covering operating practices, including the transmission, handling and distribution of signals intelligence and communications security material within and among the elements under control of the Director of the NSA, and exercising the necessary supervisory control to ensure compliance with the regulations.

1-1203. Offices for the collection of specialized intelligence through reconnaissance programs, whose responsibilities shall include:

(a) Carrying out consolidated reconnaissance programs for specialized intelligence;

(b) Responding to tasking through the NITC; and

(c) Delegating authority to the various departments and agencies for research, development, procurement, and operation of designated means of collection.

1-1204. The foreign intelligence and counterintelligence elements of the military services, whose responsibilities shall include:

(a) Collection, production and dissemination of military-related foreign intelligence, including information on indications and warnings, foreign capabilities, plans and weapons systems, scientific and technical developments and narcotics production and trafficking. When collection is conducted in response to national foreign intelligence requirements, it will be tasked by the NITC. Collection of national foreign intelligence, not otherwise obtainable, outside the United States shall be coordinated with the CIA, and such collection within the United States shall be coordinated with the FBI;

(b) Conduct of counterintelligence activities outside the United States in coordination with the CIA, and within the United States in coordination with the FBI, and production and dissemination of counterintelligence studies or reports; and

(c) Monitoring of the development, procurement and management of tactical intelligence systems and equipment and conducting related research, development, and test and evaluation activities.

1-1205. Other offices within the Department of Defense appropriate for conduct of the intelligence missions and responsibilities assigned to the Secretary of Defense. If such other offices are used for intelligence purposes, the provisions of Sections 2-101 through 2-309 of this Order shall apply to those offices when used for those purposes.

1-13. The Department of Energy. The Secretary of Energy shall:

1-1301. Participate with the Department of State in overtly collecting political, economic and technical information with respect to foreign energy matters;

1-1302. Produce and disseminate foreign intelligence necessary for the Secretary's responsibilities;

1-1303. Participate in formulating intelligence collection and analysis requirements where the special expert capability of the Department can contribute; and

1-1304. Provide expert technical, analytical and research capability to other agencies within the Intelligence Community.

1-14. The Federal Bureau of Investigation. Under the supervision of the Attorney General and pursuant to such regulations as the Attorney General may establish, the Director of the FBI shall:

1-1401. Within the United States conduct counterintelligence and coordinate counterintelligence activities of other agencies within the Intelligence Community. When a counterintelligence activity of the FBI involves military or civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, the FBI shall coordinate with the Department of Defense;

1-1402. Conduct counterintelligence activities outside the United States in coordination with the CIA, subject to the approval of the Director of Central Intelligence;

1-1403. Conduct within the United States, when requested by officials of the Intelligence Community designated by the President, lawful activities undertaken to collect foreign intelligence or support foreign intelligence collection requirements of other agencies within the Intelligence Community;

1-1404. Produce and disseminate foreign intelligence, counterintelligence and counterintelligence studies and reports; and

1-1405. Carry out or contract for research, development and procurement of technical systems and devices relating to the functions authorized above.

1-15. The Drug Enforcement Administration. Under the supervision of the Attorney General and pursuant to such regulations as the Attorney General may establish, the Administrator of DEA shall:

1-1501. Collect, produce and disseminate intelligence on the foreign and domestic aspects of narcotics production and trafficking in coordination with other agencies with responsibilities in these areas;

1-1502. Participate with the Department of State in the overt collection of general foreign political, economic and agricultural information relating to narcotics production and trafficking; and

1-1503. Coordinate with the Director of Central Intelligence to ensure that the foreign narcotics intelligence activities of DEA are consistent with other foreign intelligence programs.

SECTION 2

RESTRICTIONS ON INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES

2-1. Adherence to Law.

2-101. Purpose. Information about the capabilities, intentions and activities of foreign powers, organizations, or persons and their agents is essential to informed decision-making in the areas of national defense and foreign relations. The measures employed to acquire such information should be responsive to legitimate governmental needs and must be conducted in a manner that preserves and respects established concepts of privacy and civil liberties.

2-102. Principles of Interpretation. Sections 2-201 through 2-309 set forth limitations which, in addition to other applicable laws, are intended to achieve the proper balance between protection of individual rights and acquisition of essential information. Those sections do not authorize any activity not authorized by sections 1-101 through 1-1503 and do not provide any exemption from any other law.

2-2. Restrictions on Certain Collection Techniques.

2-201. General Provisions.

(a) The activities described in Sections 2-202 through 2-208 shall be undertaken only as permitted by this Order and by procedures established by the head of the agency concerned and approved by the Attorney General. Those procedures shall protect constitutional rights and privacy, ensure that information is gathered by the least intrusive means possible, and limit use of such information to lawful governmental purposes.

(b) Activities described in sections 2-202 through 2-205 for which a warrant would be required if undertaken for law enforcement rather than intelligence purposes shall not be undertaken against a United States person without a judicial warrant, unless the President has authorized the type of activity involved and the Attorney General has both approved the particular activity and determined that there is probable cause to believe that the United States person is an agent of a foreign power.

2-202. Electronic Surveillance. The CIA may not engage in any electronic surveillance within the United States. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall engage in any electronic surveillance directed against a United States person abroad or designed to intercept a communication sent from, or intended for receipt within, the United States except as permitted by the procedures established pursuant to section 2-201. Training of personnel by agencies in the Intelligence Community in the use of electronic communications equipment, testing by such agencies of such equipment, and the use of measures to determine the existence and capability of electronic surveillance equipment being used unlawfully shall not be prohibited and shall also be governed by such procedures. Such activities shall be limited in scope and duration to those necessary to carry out the training, testing or countermeasures purpose. No information derived from communications intercepted in the course of such training, testing or use of countermeasures may be retained or used for any other purpose.

2-203. Television Cameras and Other Monitoring. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall use any electronic or mechanical device surreptitiously and continuously to monitor any person within the United States, or any United States person abroad, except as permitted by the procedures established pursuant to Section 2-201.

2-204. Physical Searches. No agency within the Intelligence Community except the FBI may conduct any unconsented physical searches within the United States. All such searches conducted by the FBI, as well as all such searches conducted by any agency within the Intelligence Community outside the United States and directed against United States persons, shall be undertaken only as permitted by procedures established pursuant to Section 2-201.

2-205 Mail Surveillance. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall open mail or examine envelopes in United States postal channels, except in accordance with applicable statutes and regulations. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall open mail of a United States person abroad except as permitted by procedures established pursuant to Section 2-201.

2-206. Physical Surveillance. The FBI may conduct physical surveillance directed against United States persons or others only in the course of a lawful investigation. Other agencies within the Intelligence Community may not undertake any physical surveillance directed against a United States person unless:

(a) The surveillance is conducted outside the United States and the person being surveilled is reasonably believed to be acting on behalf of a foreign power, engaging in international terrorist activities, or engaging in narcotics production or trafficking;

(b) The surveillance is conducted solely for the purpose of identifying a person who is in contact with someone who is the subject of a foreign intelligence or counterintelligence investigation; or

(c) That person is being surveilled for the purpose of protecting foreign intelligence and counterintelligence sources and methods from unauthorized disclosure or is the subject of a lawful counterintelligence, personnel, physical or communications security investigation.

(d) No surveillance under paragraph (c) of this section may be conducted within the United States unless the person being surveilled is a present employee, intelligence agency contractor or employee of such a contractor, or is a military person employed by a non-intelligence element of a military service. Outside the United States such surveillance may also be conducted against a former employee, intelligence agency contractor or employee of a contractor or a civilian person employed by a non-intelligence element of an agency within the Intelligence Community. A person who is in contact with such a present or former employee or contractor may also be surveilled, but only to the extent necessary to identify that person.

2-207. Undisclosed Participation in Domestic Organizations. No employees may join, or otherwise participate in, any organization within the United States on behalf of any agency within the Intelligence Community without disclosing their intelligence affiliation to appropriate officials of the organization, except as permitted by procedures established pursuant to Section 2-201. Such procedures shall provide for disclosure of such affiliation in all cases unless the agency head or a designee approved by the Attorney General finds that non-disclosure is essential to achieving lawful purposes, and that finding is subject to review by the Attorney General. Those procedures shall further limit undisclosed participation to cases where:

(a) The participation is undertaken on behalf of the FBI in the course of a lawful investigation;

(b) The organization concerned is composed primarily of individuals who are not United States persons and is reasonably believed to be acting on behalf of a foreign power; or

(c) The participation is strictly limited in its nature, scope and duration to that necessary for other lawful purposes relating to foreign intelligence and is a type of participation approved by the Attorney General and set forth in a public document. No such participation may be undertaken for the purpose of influencing the activity of the organization or its members.

2-208. Collection of Nonpublicly Available Information. No agency within the Intelligence Community may collect, disseminate or store information concerning the activities of United States persons that is not available publicly, unless it does so with their consent or as permitted by procedures established pursuant to Section 2-201. Those procedures shall limit collection, storage or dissemination to the following types of information:

(a) Information concerning corporations or other commercial organizations or activities that constitutes foreign intelligence or counterintelligence;

(b) Information arising out of a lawful counterintelligence or personnel, physical or communications security investigation;

(c) Information concerning present or former employees, present or former intelligence agency contractors or their present or former employees, or applicants for any such employment or contracting, which is needed to protect foreign intelligence or counterintelligence sources or methods from unauthorized disclosure;

(d) Information needed solely to identify individuals in contact with those persons described in paragraph (c) of this section or with someone who is the subject of a lawful foreign intelligence or counterintelligence investigation;

(e) Information concerning persons who are reasonably believed to be potential sources or contacts, but only for the purpose of determining the suitability or credibility of such persons;

(f) Information constituting foreign intelligence or counterintelligence gathered abroad or from electronic surveillance conducted in compliance with Section 2-202 or from cooperating sources in the United States;

(g) Information about a person who is reasonably believed to be acting on behalf of a foreign power, engaging in international terrorist activities or narcotics production or trafficking, or endangering the safety of a person protected by the United States Secret Service or the Department of State;

(h) Information acquired by overhead reconnaissance not directed at specific United States persons;

(i) Information concerning United States persons abroad that is obtained in response to requests from the Department of State for support of its consular responsibilities relating to the welfare of those persons;

(j) Information collected, received, disseminated or stored by the FBI and necessary to fulfill its lawful investigative responsibilities; or

(k) Information concerning persons or activities that pose a clear threat to any facility or personnel of an agency within the Intelligence Community. Such information may be retained only by the agency threatened and, if appropriate, by the United States Secret Service and the FBI.

2-3. Additional Restrictions and Limitations.

2-301. Tax Information. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall examine tax returns or tax information except as permitted by applicable law.

2-302. Restrictions on Experimentation. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall sponsor, contract for, or conduct research on human subjects except in accordance with guidelines issued by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. The subject's informed consent shall be documented as required by those guidelines.

2-303. Restrictions on Contracting. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall enter into a contract or arrangement for the provision of goods or services with private companies or institutions in the United States unless the agency sponsorship is known to the appropriate officials of the company or institution. In the case of any company or institution other than an academic institution, intelligence agency sponsorship may be concealed where it is determined, pursuant to procedures approved by the Attorney General, that such concealment is necessary to maintain essential cover or proprietary arrangements for authorized intelligence purposes.

2-304. Restrictions on Personnel Assigned to Other Agencies. An employee detailed to another agency within the federal government shall be responsible to the host agency and shall not report to the parent agency on the affairs of the host agency unless so directed by the host agency. The head of the host agency, and any successor, shall be informed of the employee's relationship with the parent agency.

2-305. Prohibition on Assassination. No person employed by or acting on behalf of the United States Government shall engage in, or conspire to engage in, assassination.

2-306. Restrictions on Special Activities. No component of the United States Government except an agency within the Intelligence Community may conduct any special activity. No such agency except the CIA (or the military services in wartime) may conduct any special activity unless the President determines, with the SCC's advice, that another agency is more likely to achieve a particular objective.

2-307. Restrictions on Indirect Participation in Prohibited Activities. No agency of the Intelligence Community shall request or otherwise encourage, directly or indirectly, any person, organization, or government agency to undertake activities forbidden by this Order or by applicable law.

2-308. Restrictions on Assistance to Law Enforcement Authorities. Agencies within the Intelligence Community other than the FBI shall not, except as expressly authorized by law:

(a) Provide services, equipment, personnel or facilities to the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (or its successor agencies) or to state or local police organizations of the United States; or

(b) Participate in or fund any law enforcement activity within the United States.

2-309. Permissible Assistance to Law Enforcement Authorities. The restrictions in Section 2-308 shall not preclude:

(a) Cooperation with appropriate law enforcement agencies for the purpose of protecting the personnel and facilities of any agency within the Intelligence Community;

(b) Participation in law enforcement activities, in accordance with law and this Order, to investigate or prevent clandestine intelligence activities by foreign powers, international narcotics production and trafficking, or international terrorist activities; or

(c) Provision of specialized equipment, technical knowledge, or assistance of expert personnel for use by any department or agency or, when lives are endangered, to support local law enforcement agencies. Provision of assistance by expert personnel shall be governed by procedures approved by the Attorney General.

2-310. Permissible Dissemination and Storage of Information. Nothing in Sections 2-201 through 2-309 of this Order shall prohibit:

(a) Dissemination to appropriate law enforcement agencies of information which indicates involvement in activities that may violate federal, state, local or foreign laws;

(b) Storage of information required by law to be retained;

(c) Dissemination of information covered by Section 2-208 (a)-(j) to agencies within the Intelligence Community or entities of cooperating foreign governments; or

(d) Lawful storage or dissemination of information solely for administrative purposes not related to intelligence or security.

SECTION 3

OVERSIGHT OF INTELLIGENCE ORGANIZATIONS

3-1. Intelligence Oversight Board.

3-101. Membership. The President's Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB) shall function within the White House. The IOB shall have three members who shall be appointed by the President and who shall be from outside the government and be qualified on the basis of ability, knowledge, diversity of background and experience. No member shall have any personal interest in any contractual relationship with any agency within the Intelligence Community. One member shall be designated by the President as chairman.

3-102. Duties. The IOB shall:

(a) Review periodically the practices and procedures of the Inspectors General and General Counsel with responsibilities for agencies within the Intelligence Community for discovering and reporting to the IOB intelligence activities that raise questions of legality or propriety, and consider written and oral reports referred under Section 3-201;

(b) Review periodically for adequacy the internal guidelines of each agency within the Intelligence Community concerning the legality or propriety of intelligence activities;

(c) Report periodically, at least quarterly, to the President on its findings; and report in a timely manner to the President any intelligence activities that raise serious questions of legality or propriety;

(d) Forward to the Attorney General, in a timely manner, reports received concerning intelligence activities in which a question of legality has been raised or which the IOB believes to involve questions of legality; and

(e) Conduct such investigations of the intelligence activities of agencies within the Intelligence Community as the Board deems necessary to carry out its functions under this Order.

3-103. Restriction on Staff. No person who serves on the staff of the IOB shall have any contractual or employment relationship with any agency within the Intelligence Community.

3-2. Inspectors General and General Counsel. Inspectors General and General Counsel with responsibility for agencies within the Intelligence Community shall:

3-201. Transmit timely reports to the IOB concerning any intelligence activities that come to their attention and that raise questions of legality or propriety;

3-202. Promptly report to the IOB actions taken concerning the Board's findings on intelligence activities that raise questions of legality or propriety;

3-203. Provide to the IOB information requested concerning the legality or propriety of intelligence activities within their respective agencies;

3-204. Formulate practices and procedures for discovering and reporting to the IOB intelligence activities that raise questions of legality or propriety; and

3-205. Report to the IOB any occasion on which the Inspectors General or General Counsel were directed not to report any intelligence activity to the IOB which they believed raised questions of legality or propriety.

3-3. Attorney General. The Attorney General shall:

3-301. Receive and consider reports from agencies within the Intelligence Community forwarded by the IOB;

3-302. Report to the President in a timely fashion any intelligence activities which raise questions of legality;

3-303. Report to the IOB and to the President in a timely fashion decisions made or actions taken in response to reports from agencies within the Intelligence Community forwarded to the Attorney General by the IOB;

3-304. Inform the IOB of legal opinions affecting the operations of the Intelligence Community; and

3-305. Establish or approve procedures, as required by this Order, for the conduct of intelligence activities. Such procedures shall ensure compliance with law, protect constitutional rights and privacy, and ensure that any intelligence activity within the United States or directed against any United States person is conducted by the least intrusive means possible. The procedures shall also ensure that any use, dissemination and storage of information about United States persons acquired through intelligence activities is limited to that necessary to achieve lawful governmental purposes.

3-4. Congressional Intelligence Committees. Under such procedures as the President may establish and consistent with applicable authorities and duties, including those conferred by the Constitution upon the Executive and Legislative Branches and by law to protect sources and methods, the Director of Central Intelligence and heads of departments and agencies of the United States involved in intelligence activities shall:

3-401. Keep the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives and the Select Committee on Intelligence of the Senate fully and currently informed concerning intelligence activities, including any significant anticipated activities which are the responsibility of, or engaged in, by such department or agency. This requirement does not constitute a condition precedent to the implementation of such intelligence activities;

3-402. Provide any information or document in the possession, custody, or control of the department or agency or person paid by such department or agency, within the jurisdiction of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives or the Select Committee on Intelligence of the Senate, upon the request of such committee; and

3-403. Report in a timely fashion to the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives and the Select Committee on Intelligence of the Senate information relating to intelligence activities that are illegal or improper and corrective actions that are taken or planned.

SECTION 4

GENERAL PROVISIONS

4-1. Implementation

4-101. Except as provided in section 4-105 of this section, this Order shall supersede Executive Order 11905, "United States Foreign Intelligence Activities," dated February 18, 1976; Executive Order 11985, same subject, dated May 13, 1977; and Executive Order 11994, same subject, dated June 1, 1977.

4-102. The NSC, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General and the Director of Central Intelligence shall issue such appropriate directives and procedures as are necessary to implement this Order.

4-103. Heads of agencies within the Intelligence Community shall issue appropriate supplementary directives and procedures consistent with this Order.

4-104. The Attorney General shall have sole authority to issue and revise procedures required by section 2-201 for the activities of the FBI relating to foreign intelligence and counterintelligence.

4-105. Where intelligence activities under this Order are to be conducted pursuant to procedures approved or agreed to by the Attorney General, those activities may be conducted under terms and conditions of Executive Order 11905 and any procedures promulgated thereunder until such Attorney General procedures are established. Such Attorney General procedures shall be established as expeditiously as possible after the issuance of this Order.

4-106. In some instances, the documents that implement this Order will be classified because of the sensitivity of the information and its relation to national security. All instructions contained in classified documents will be consistent with this Order. All procedures promulgated pursuant to this Order will be made available to the Congressional intelligence committees in accordance with Section 3-402.

4-107. Unless otherwise specified, the provisions of this Order shall apply to activities both within and outside the United States, and all references to law are to applicable laws of the United States, including the Constitution and this Order. Nothing in this Order shall be construed to apply to or interfere with any authorized civil or criminal law enforcement responsibility of any department or agency.

4-2. Definitions. For the purposes of this Order, the following terms shall have these meanings:

4-201. Communications security means protective measures taken to deny unauthorized persons information derived from telecommunications of the United States Government related to national security and to ensure the authenticity of such telecommunications.

4-202. Counterintelligence means information gathered and activities conducted to protect against espionage and other clandestine intelligence activities, sabotage, international terrorist activities or assassinations conducted for or on behalf of foreign powers, organizations or persons, but not including personnel, physical, document, or communications security programs.

4-203. Electronic Surveillance means acquisition of a nonpublic communication by electronic means without the consent of a person who is a party to an electronic communication or, in the case of a nonelectronic communication, without the consent of a person who is visibly present at the place of communication, but not including the use of radio direction finding equipment solely to determine the location of a transmitter.

4-204. Employee means a person employed by, assigned to, or acting for an agency within the Intelligence Community.

4-205. Foreign Intelligence means information relating to the capabilities, intentions and activities of foreign powers, organizations or persons, but not including counterintelligence except for information on international terrorist activities.

4-206. Intelligence means foreign intelligence and counterintelligence.

4-207. Intelligence Community and agency or agencies within the Intelligence Community refer to the following organizations:

(a) The Central Intelligence Agency (CIA);

(b) The National Security Agency (NSA);

(c) The Defense Intelligence Agency;

(d) The Offices within the Department of Defense for the collection of specialized national foreign intelligence through reconnaissance programs;

(e) The Bureau of Intelligence and Research of the Department of State;

(f) The intelligence elements of the military services, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the Department of the Treasury, the Department of Energy, and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA); and

(g) The staff elements of the Office of the Director of Central Intelligence.

4-208. Intelligence product means the estimates, memoranda and other reports produced from the analysis of available information.

4-209. International terrorist activities means any activity or activities which:

(a) involves killing, causing serious bodily harm, kidnapping, or violent destruction of property, or an attempt or credible threat to commit such acts; and

(b) appears intended to endanger a protectee of the Secret Service or the Department of State or to further political, social or economic goals by intimidating or coercing a civilian population or any segment thereof, influencing the policy of a government or international organization by intimidation or coercion, or obtaining widespread publicity for a group or its cause; and

(c) transcends national boundaries in terms of the means by which it is accomplished, the civilian population, government, or international organization it appears intended to coerce or intimidate, or the locale in which its perpetrators operate or seek asylum.

4-210. The National Foreign Intelligence Program includes the programs listed below, but its composition shall be subject to review by the National Security Council and modification by the President.

(a) The programs of the CIA;

(b) The Consolidated Cryptologic Program, the General Defense Intelligence Program, and the programs of the offices within the Department of Defense for the collection of specialized national foreign intelligence through reconnaissance except such elements as the Director of Central Intelligence and the Secretary of Defense agree should be excluded;

(c) Other programs of agencies within the Intelligence Community designated jointly by the Director of Central Intelligence and the head of the department or by the President as national foreign intelligence or counterintelligence activities;

(d) Activities of the staff elements of the Office of the Director of Central Intelligence.

(e) Activities to acquire the intelligence required for the planning and conduct of tactical operations by the United States military forces are not included in the National Foreign Intelligence Program.

4-211. Physical surveillance means an unconsented, systematic and deliberate observation of a person by any means on a continuing basis, or unconsented acquisition of a nonpublic communication by a person not a party thereto or visibly present thereat through any means not involving electronic surveillance. This definition does not include overhead reconnaissance not directed at specific United States persons.

4-212. Special activities means activities conducted abroad in support of national foreign policy objectives which are designed to further official United States programs and policies abroad and which are planned and executed so that the role of the United States Government is not apparent or acknowledged publicly, and functions in support of such activities, but not including diplomatic activity or the collection and production of intelligence or related support functions.

4-213. United States, when used to describe a place, includes the territories of the United States.

4-214. United States person means a citizen of the United States, an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, an unincorporated association organized in the United States or substantially composed of United States citizens or aliens admitted for permanent residence, or a corporation incorporated in the United States.

United States Foreign Intelligence Activities

I have issued today an Executive order concerning the organization and control of United States foreign intelligence activities. It is the product of the most extensive and highest level review ever conducted through the National Security Council system of our Nation's foreign intelligence activities and of an unprecedented dialog with the congressional oversight committees.

The new order, which builds on the experience under President Ford's Executive Order 11905, is intended to provide a foundation for the drafting of statutory charters, and I intend to work closely with congressional leaders to enact such legislation. Until then, however, the new order will:

- ensure that foreign intelligence and counterintelligence activities are conducted in full compliance with the laws of the United States and are consistent with broader national security policies;
- establish effective oversight of the direction, management, and conduct of the foreign intelligence activities of the Federal Government;
- clarify the authority and responsibilities of the Director of Central Intelligence (DCI) and the departments and agencies that have foreign intelligence and counterintelligence responsibilities.

The most important features of the new Executive order are as follows:

1. The National Security Council and its two standing committees—the Special Coordination Committee (SCC) and the Policy Review Committee (PRC)—will, short of the President, provide the highest level review of and guidance for the policies and practices of the Intelligence Community.

—The PRC, when acting on intelligence matters, will be chaired by the DCI and is charged with defining and establishing priorities for consumer requirements for intelligence, making sure these are reflected in budget decisions, and evaluation of analytical products. This ensures that the needs of the most important users of intelligence will guide the entire intelligence process.

—The SCC, chaired by the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, will review and make recommendations to the President on the most sensitive intelligence operations and, as appropriate, on collection activities. This committee will also, for the first time, assume responsibility for developing policy for and coordination of all counterintelligence activities.

2. The authorities and responsibilities of all departments, agencies, and senior officials engaged in foreign intelligence and counterintelligence activities are being made public. Those implementing directives which must remain classified for security reasons will be made available to the appropriate congressional oversight committees. The new order implements my earlier decision to centralize under the DCI the most important national intelligence management functions—collection requirements, budget control, and analysis—while operational and support activities are left unchanged and decentralized.

The specific operational responsibilities of each of the elements of the Intelligence Community, as well as their most important community relationships, are spelled out. Two important organizational mechanisms are established to facilitate these functions:

—The National Intelligence Tasking Center, operating in peacetime under the control of the DCI or under the Secretary of Defense when the President so directs, will be responsible for coordinating and tasking national foreign intelligence collection programs.

—The National Foreign Intelligence Board, which includes the members of the Intelligence Community, is an advisory body to the DCI on all national intelligence activities and the budget.

3. Our intelligence agencies have a critical role to play in collecting and analyzing information important to our national security interests and, on occasion, acting in direct support of major foreign policy objectives. It is equally important, however, that the methods employed by these agencies meet constitutional standards protecting the privacy and civil liberties of U.S. persons and are in full compliance with the law.

To accomplish this objective a major section of the Executive order is devoted entirely to setting forth detailed restrictions on intelligence collection, covert activities in support of foreign policy objectives, experimentation, contracting, assistance to law enforcement authorities, personnel assigned to other agencies, indirect participation in prohibited activities, dissemination and storage of information, and a prohibition on assassinations. The FBI's intelligence activities no longer have a blanket exception to these restrictions.

At the heart of the restriction process is a greatly enhanced role for the Attorney General, as the Nation's top legal officer, to establish and approve procedures to regulate the conduct of the most sensitive intelligence activities. These detailed procedures, which will be made available to the congressional oversight committees, will ensure compliance with the law, protect constitutional rights and privacy, and ensure that any intelligence activity within the United States or directed against Americans will employ the least intrusive means possible and that the use, dissemination, and storage of such information is limited to that necessary to achieve lawful governmental purposes.

4. As an added protection against abuses and to help ensure effective performance, the intelligence oversight process is strengthened.

—The Intelligence Oversight Board is retained, and its responsibilities for review of foreign intelligence activities that may be illegal or improper is extended to the counterintelligence area, and it is given new authority to conduct investigations.

—The DCI and senior officers of the Intelligence Community are instructed to report to the congressional intelligence committees in a complete and prompt manner.

I believe that this Executive order represents an important step forward in assuring the American people that their intelligence agencies will be working effectively for them and not infringing on their legal rights. The next step will be to establish these authorities and restrictions in legislation binding on this and future administrations.

President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped

Appointment of Charles H. Pillard as Vice Chairman. January 24, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Charles H. Pillard as Vice Chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

Federal Prevailing Rate Advisory Committee

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. January 24, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with section 5347(e) of title 5 of the United States Code, I hereby transmit to you the 1976 Annual Report of the Federal Prevailing Rate Advisory Committee.

While not specifically addressed in the attached report, I want to express my concern that little progress appears to have been made in reforming the prevailing rate system for adjusting wages of Federal blue collar employees. In my February 22, 1977 message to the Congress, I strongly recommended early enactment of legislation to correct those provisions of current law that cause significant departures from the local prevailing rate principle, and result in an unfair competitive advantage for the Federal Government and unjustifiable payroll costs. A draft bill which would achieve these objectives was submitted to the Congress early last year. I am convinced that this bill will correct the most serious deficiencies in the prevailing rate system and I wish to reiterate my concern for its passage.

Prothro was a nutrition adviser at the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta in 1972 and 1973, and from 1973 to 1975 taught at Tuskegee. Since 1975 she has been a professor in the dietetics program, division of allied health professions, at Emory University.

International Sugar Agreement, 1977

Message to the Senate Transmitting the Agreement. January 25, 1978

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith the International Sugar Agreement, 1977, accompanied by the report of the Department of State. Ambassador Young signed this Agreement on behalf of the United States of America on December 9, 1977.

The Agreement seeks to stabilize sugar prices to meet both our domestic interests as a major consumer and producer of sugar, and our international interests as the world's largest importer of sugar. The United States has been a member of previous international sugar agreements, including the first one in 1937. But we were not a member of the most recent, which was negotiated in 1968 and expired in 1973. Serious negotiations for this new Agreement began last April when sugar prices were low and surpluses were large. High prices during 1974 and 1975 had stimulated world production, cut world demand, and encouraged the development of high fructose corn syrup, a direct competitor with beet and cane sugar.

The new Agreement is designed to avoid the problems created by excess supplies of sugar, while providing assurances of adequate supplies in the future. It does so by stabilizing world prices between 11 and 21 cents a pound. The 11 cent minimum will be defended by a worldwide system of export quotas. The Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 establishes a domestic support price of 13.5 cents per pound which is roughly equivalent to the 11 cent minimum world price when normal duties and transportation are added. When domestic prices rise above that level, the Secretary of Agriculture may suspend the price support program.

The Agreement protects the interests of consumers by guarding against high prices and ensuring adequate supplies for domestic needs. It calls for reserve stocks under which about 2.5 million tons of sugar will be set aside and held in exporting countries for release in case prices approach the 21 cent level. The 11 cent price will encourage sufficient investment to avoid sharp reductions in supplies and concomitant price increases.

The Agreement is consistent with our broad foreign policy objectives and with our intent to balance the interests of producing and consuming countries through international cooperation. Once in full operation, it should eliminate the need for the tariff and fee measures recently imposed to defend our domestic price support program. Such unilateral measures adversely affect the earning capacity of many developing countries and undermine our commitment to an open international trading system. Instead, the Agreement represents a cooperative effort among sugar exporting and importing countries to achieve their mutual interests in equitable and stabilized sugar prices and supplies.

For all of these reasons, I urge the Senate to give this Agreement favorable consideration and its advice and consent to ratification. The Department of State will submit legislation to implement the Agreement.

Meeting With Head of Delegation of Supreme Soviet Parliamentarians

*White House Statement Issued Following the Meeting With B. N. Ponomarev.
January 25, 1978*

The President met for 1 hour this afternoon with Mr. Boris Ponomarev. Mr. Ponomarev is the head of a delegation of parliamentarians of the Supreme Soviet visiting the United States at the invitation of the U.S. Congress. He is a candidate Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

The President stated his interest in working on a mutual basis to widen the areas of cooperation and to limit the areas of competition that mark relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. The President noted that this will require reciprocity and restraint on both sides. The discussion was friendly and productive.

Specific subjects discussed included SALT, the Horn of Africa, the Middle East, and other issues.

The President was joined by the Vice President, Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant for National Security Affairs, and Reginald Bartholomew of the NSC staff.

Mr. Ponomarev was accompanied by Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin. The interpreters were Dimitry Zarechnak for the United States and Olga A. Krokhaliev for the Soviet Union.

Highway and Transit Programs

Message to the Congress Proposing Legislation. January 26, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am today transmitting to Congress proposed legislation that will significantly improve the organization and operation of the Federal government's highway and transit programs.

One of the Administration's important goals is to develop a well balanced national transportation policy, one which takes account of our increased sensitivity to the effects of transportation on the social and economic life of our cities and rural communities. The reforms which are proposed in this legislation are designed to make certain that the nation has an effective transportation system, which uses energy more efficiently, enhances the quality of life in our urban and rural areas, and helps expand our economy.

The program I am proposing will intensify the Federal effort to complete the Interstate System and provide flexible assistance for highway construction and transit development. The legislation would authorize more than $50 billion over the next five years and proposes the following changes to meet national transportation needs:

- a comprehensive transportation planning program;
- measures to speed completion of the Interstate System and to improve maintenance;

- consolidation of more than 30 highway and public transportation grant programs into fewer and more flexible programs for both rural and urban areas;
- a uniform Federal share for all grant programs except Interstate construction and Interstate transfer projects;
- focusing the transit discretionary program on major investments;
- an expanded bridge replacement and rehabilitation program;
- a unified safety program; and
- greater flexibility for State and local governments to pursue their own priorities.

To achieve our objectives in this area, we propose a reorganization of a variety of highway and transit programs into a simpler and more manageable system of Federal assistance. Certain aspects of our new approach to these programs should be emphasized.

Transportation Planning

To promote more efficient short-range and long-range planning by state and local officials, I propose to consolidate highway and transit planning funds and to distribute these funds as a single grant, under a formula to be determined by the Secretary of Transportation.

Planning grants will be made directly to designated metropolitan planning organizations in urbanized areas over one million in population. The Secretary will review transportation plans for such areas to ensure that they take reasonable account of such issues as air quality, energy conservation, environmental quality, accessibility to employment, effect on minorities, housing, land use and future development. The planning process for other areas will be strengthened as well.

Interstate System

Our first priority will be to complete the essential gaps in the Interstate System.

Fifty percent of the apportionment formula will be based on the cost to complete the essential gaps and fifty percent on the cost to complete the total system. Highway projects substituted after an Interstate withdrawal will be funded from a state's Interstate apportionment, and substitute mass transit projects will be funded from the General Fund. Interstate substitute projects, both highway and transit, will be eligible for a ninety percent federal share.

States will be required to have completed the Environmental Impact Statement process or to have submitted an application for an Interstate withdrawal on all uncompleted segments of the Interstate by September 30, 1982. Segments which have not met either requirement will be removed from the system. All incomplete Interstate segments must be under contract for construction and initial construction must have commenced by September 30, 1986.

Federal-Aid Primary System

To simplify an unduly restrictive funding structure, seven highway categories will be consolidated into a single Primary program. Funds will be apportioned by a formula specified in the legislation and the Federal share will be eighty percent. Up to fifty percent of a state's primary system funds may be transferred to the urban highway or the small urban and rural transportation programs.

Urban Formula Grants

Two compatible programs will be established, one for highways, and one for transit, for all urbanized areas with a population of 50,000 or more. The highway program will consolidate five categorical programs, and all urban roads not on the Interstate or primary systems will be eligible for assistance. The transit program will provide assistance for the acquisition, construction and improvement of facilities and equipment for use in public transportation services and the payment of operating expenses, including commuter rail operating expenses.

Funds will be apportioned by formula and the federal share for capital projects will be eighty percent. The highway formula will be based on urbanized area population. Up to fifty percent of the urban highway funds may be transferred to the Primary program or to the small urban and rural program. Up to fifty percent of the transit funds may be transferred to the highway program. Highway funds will continue to be available for transit capital projects.

Governors and local officials will be required to designate a recipient or recipients for urban highway funds in urbanized areas with a population of one million or more. By this step we will significantly improve the opportunity for large cities to become more involved in the planning and programming of their highway systems. Urban highway funds for areas with small populations will go to the State.

Urban Discretionary Grant

This transit grant program will be focused on major expansion of bus fleets and new fixed guideway projects, including extensions of existing systems, and joint development projects.

Small Urban and Rural Formula Grant

To meet the unique needs of small cities and rural communities, we propose a consolidated grant program for highways and transit for all areas with a population below 50,000, with the state as the recipient.

Nine categorical highway programs will be consolidated into this new program, and all public roads not on the Interstate or primary systems will be eligible for assistance. The new program will provide assistance for both capital and operating expenses for public transportation in small urban and rural communities. Authorization for this program would come out of the Highway Trust Fund, but the Trust Fund would be reimbursed out of the General Fund for transit operating expenses.

Safety Program

To allow more flexible and rational use of funds, six highway safety programs will be consolidated into a single safety grant to states, with the federal share at eighty percent.

Bridge Program

For the first time states will be able to use substantially increased funds for rehabilitation as well as replacements of deteriorating bridges. The federal share will be eighty percent, and up to thirty percent of the funds will be available for bridges not on the federal-aid highway systems.

Authorizations

The proposed authorizations are designed to permit better long-term planning by those responsible for both highway and transit development. The Highway Trust Fund will be extended for an additional 4 years. The formula grant programs will be authorized for a four-year period, and the urban discretionary grant program will be authorized for a five-year period.

In proposing the reforms contained in this legislation I recognize the critical relationship between transportation, energy and development in urban and rural areas. I believe that these proposals will lead toward energy conservation and better land use. The enactment of this legislation will bring new opportunities and responsibilities to State and local officials, will respond to the problems of the present programs, and will help to place the surface transportation system on a sound financial basis.

I ask the Congress to move promptly to pass this highway and transit legislation.

Bureau of Land Management

*Nomination of Frank Gregg To Be Director.
January 26, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Frank Gregg, of Hingham, Mass., to be Director of the Bureau of Land Management in the Interior Department.

Gregg was born December 12, 1925, in Denver, Colo. He graduated from the University of Colorado in 1949.

From 1957 to 1961, Gregg was executive director of the Izaak Walton League of America. From 1961 to 1963, he was a staff assistant in the office of Secretary of the Interior Stewart L. Udall, where he worked on development of the Land and Water Conservation Fund and Water Resources Planning acts. From 1963 to 1965, he was executive director of the Citizens' Committee for the Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission Report.

Gregg was vice president of the Conservation Foundation from 1965 to 1967. Since 1967 he has been Chairman of the New England River Basins Commission, a joint Federal-State agency established at the request of the New England Governors to coordinate Federal and State water and related land resource programs in that region.

National Transportation Safety Board

Nomination of Elwood T. Driver To Be a Member. January 26, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Elwood T. Driver, of Reston, Va., to be a member of the National Transportation Safety Board for the remainder of the term expiring December 31, 1980.

Driver was born August 20, 1921, in Trenton, N.J. He has a bachelor's degree in mathematics and science from New Jersey State College and a master's degree in safety from New York University. He has taken graduate courses in system safety engineering.

From 1962 to 1967, Driver was chief of system safety engineering and administration at Autonetics, a division of North American Rockwell, where he was responsible for the system safety engineering of the guidance system for the Minuteman ICBM.

Driver has been with the Department to Transportation since 1967. From 1967 to 1971, he was Chief of the Components Division, Office of Standards for Vehicles in Use, at the National Highway Safety Bureau. He is currently Acting Director of the Office of Crashworthiness, Motor Vehicle Programs, at the National Highway Traffic Administration, where he is responsible for developing and issuing safety standards for motor vehicles and equipment.

Budget Rescissions and Deferrals

Message to the Congress. January 27, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report three proposals to rescind a total of $55.3 million in budget authority previously provided by the Congress. In addition, I am reporting six new deferrals of budget authority totalling $1,517.1 million and seven revisions to previously transmitted deferrals increasing the amount deferred by $2.2 million in budget authority.

The rescission proposals affect the military assistance program, the Department of State's appropriation for contributions for international peacekeeping activities, and the revolving fund of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

The new deferrals and revisions to existing deferrals involve programs of the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Health, Education, and Welfare, Justice, Labor, Transportation, the Treasury, and the Panama Canal Zone Government, the National Science Foundation, and the United States Information Agency.

The details of each rescission proposal and deferral are contained in the attached reports.

National Afro-American (Black) History Month, February 1978

Message of the President. January 27, 1978

This Month gives black Americans a wonderful opportunity to review their roots, their achievements and their projections; and it provides for all Americans a chance to rejoice and express pride in a heritage that adds so much to our way of life.

I commend the Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History on its sponsorship of this traditional observance.

Calling attention to the contributions of black people to our overall progress and development, the month of February thus serves to build goodwill and understanding between all people. It gives each of us a keener appreciation of an important part of the priceless legacy which Americans of every creed, color and national origin are fortunate to share.

Rosalynn and I join in urging fellow citizens everywhere to help make this year's celebration especially meaningful and rewarding.

Democratic National Committee

Remarks at a Special Meeting of the Committee. January 27, 1978

Chairman John White and Chairman Ken Curtis, Chairman Bob Strauss—[laughter]—distinguished members and officers of the Democratic National Committee and friends:

It's really great to come over here and to have such a good reception. I think it was a surprise to John White. He had asked me specifically to come after he was elected. [Laughter] When you get more applause than Bob Strauss, it makes you feel very good. [Laughter]

I want to be brief this morning, but to tell you a few things that are important to me and, I think, to you. In the first place, I want to express my admiration and my appreciation to Ken Curtis for having done such a superb job this past year.

Shortly after I was elected Governor, and before I was inaugurated, I had an opportunity to meet Ken Curtis and Polly and Angel, and there was an instant rapport between us and an instant admiration on our part for him. He was one of the senior Governors also, a young man. And he gave me sound advice, and we formed a partnership then and a friendship that has been staunch.

When I was elected President, I particularly wanted Ken Curtis to come and take on this job. I have to tell you in complete confidence that he did it as a favor to me. He did not want to leave Maine. He wanted to stay there and not move to what he considers the Deep South of Washington. [Laughter] But I told him that we needed him. And Bob Strauss had laid a good groundwork, leading up to a superb choice by the American people last November, a year ago—[laughter]—and I told him that we needed to consolidate what had been done and to bridge the gap between a Democratic National Committee with a Republican in the White House, with the quite different circumstance of a Democratic National Committee with a Democrat in the White House.

We were still saddled with an unfortunate debt left over from 1968 which had been $9½ million, approximately, and which had been cut down a little more than half. And Ken Curtis has, I think, brought the Democratic Party together. He's kept an open door; he's given everybody a chance to speak. He's given me great support, along with your help. He's cut that debt half again, and I think it's down to manageable terms now. And I'm deeply grateful to him.

Ken Curtis told me last October that he wanted to go back to Maine, and with some surprise and regret I told him that I would certainly accede to his wishes. He leaves here with his head high and with the Democratic Party proud of what he's done.

We've now been fortunate in bringing to our committee, with your help, a new chairman who has a different background, different experience, but who can continue the tremendous growth and influence of the Democratic Party through your leadership.

John White is a man who is known in Texas as Mr. Democrat. He supported John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson; before that, Adlai Stevenson. He headed up George McGovern's campaign. He supported Hubert Humphrey. He supported Lloyd Bentsen and—[laughter]—and successfully supported Jimmy Carter in 1976. [Laughter]

He has, I think, the complete integrity and the knowledge of politics that comes from a man who is idealistic, liberal to moderate in the finest sense of those words, who's not afraid to tackle the difficult political challenge when called upon to do so by his duty, and his belief in the purposes and principles of the Democratic Party, and who has proved his own attraction among the Texas people, I think, 13 times when he was reelected to serve as commissioner of agriculture. And I think next November he's going to take a lot of freshmen and sophomore Democratic Members of Congress and help them to start on an equally long career of at least 13 terms, and we're going to all work together for that purpose.

He's also well trained to fit into the environment of a Democratic National Committee. I was particularly convinced of that a week or two ago when I saw a photograph in the Washington Post—[laughter]—where his office had been filled with farmers, he was hanging on the windowsill by his fingernails—[laughter]—and still trying to convince them that the Department of Agriculture, the President, that Congress were concerned about farm problems. So, I think he'll fit in well over here at the DNC headquarters. [Laughter] And I think he can handle the disparate groups that make up the Democratic Party's strength. I'm grateful, John, that you're here.

I would like to say a word about the titular head of the Democratic Party, and that's myself. I came to Washington for the first time just about a year ago. And we had a massive program to propose, campaign commitments to honor, a Congress for me to learn about, and a quiz-zical American public about a newcomer to national politics whom they really didn't know.

I had to do hundreds of hours of personal study about the history and present circumstances concerning the Middle East, Africa, Latin America, Panama, SALT, comprehensive test bans, domestic programs. And I have to admit to you that in many instances, I put those responsibilities ahead of my responsibilities to the Democratic National Committee. I don't think you've had the support that was needed from the White House. But I don't have to restudy those issues. I've become fairly well educated, and now I can keep up with changing circumstances. This year, there will be a much closer allegiance and alliance from the White House toward the Democratic National Committee and I—[inaudible].

I was elected with your help to lead this country. I feel at ease with the job of President, primarily because I don't feel alone. I have a partnership with you because we are bound together with a common purpose and common beliefs, a common history as Democrats, to let politics and government be used to deal with human needs, not to disappoint those who trust us, not to be timid when severe challenges arise, not to apologize when we inherit longstanding problems that are not easy to solve. And I look forward to this year, working with you with a great deal of anticipation, determination, and confidence.

In the political world and, I think, particularly here in Washington, there is an excessive and predictable and understandable emphasis on the disharmonies, on the arguments and contentions and strong debates. There's an emphasis on failure in minor points, even though the general effort may have been successful.

But what we need to maintain is another characteristic of Democrats, and that is optimism about the future, pride in what our Nation is, and the determination to make it even better. We live in the greatest nation on Earth. Economically we are strong; militarily, strong; politically, strong; morally, strong; admired, not feared in the rest of the world.

I think we have the trust of the American people. It's incumbent on me every minute of every day never to betray that trust. It's important for me not to let a wall be built between me and the rest of the country and to capitalize not only on my personal encounters with American people over the 2 years of campaigning but also, through you, to be constantly aware of new developments and new concerns and new hopes and new dreams of those who look to you for leadership and who recognize that you have a direct access to me through your responsibilities as leaders of our party.

That partnership is crucial in determining whether or not my own administration in the White House is successful. There are times when you can bridge the gap perhaps between myself and the Congress, because no matter how hard I try from the perspective of opposite ends of Pennsylvania Avenue, a good Member of Congress is much more concerned about and amenable to expressions of belief and importunities from his own constituents. And that's where, again, you are there, and you can help to identify problems and to remove those problems before they become critical or damaging to a successful Democratic administration that encompasses both Congress and the White House.

I've got an excellent Cabinet. There's not a single person who serves with me at the Cabinet level about whom I have any concern or whom I would want to change. I would like to go out of office at the end of 4 years with the same Cabinet that I have now. They are very strong, very good people. And I think that they deserve your confidence and your support, and also they deserve to know from you when you have a concern about their administration.

I don't run the Federal Government through White House aides. They are all very close to me and they are close to the Cabinet members. So, if there's a problem in health or welfare, I would like for you to go directly to Joe Califano and let him get to know you and let you get to know him. If there's a problem with the cities, go to Juanita Kreps and go to Pat Harris, deal with the Cabinet members directly.

We have a major responsibility this year in the Governors' elections, in the elections for the Members of Congress and the Senate to be successful. And I believe that we can prove to the rest of the Nation that we have an administration that can serve the needs of our people.

There are some severe challenges that presently face us, with which I need your help. There will be an early bringing to the floor of the Panama Canal treaties. A year ago the support for these treaties in the Congress or among the people was minimal, if it existed at all. But the good negotiating results have given us a base of truth and substance which has permitted us to convince the American people and the Members of the Senate that the treaties are in our best interests.

We've got an energy question that must be resolved. It's kind of a cancer that prevents further progress and further confidence in domestic and international economics. And the uncertainty about the future related to energy is something that we must overcome. You can help me with that. We've got an economic program, tax reduction, tax reform, a good solid budget, a concern about our cities, agriculture, with which I need your help. I think our program is well-considered, well-presented, and is sound. And there is a partnership here in which you enjoy full participation.

The last thing I would like to say is this: I don't want you to consider your service on the Democratic National Committee to be a spasmodic responsibility. I would like for you to consider it to be a daily responsibility. Don't just wait until a meeting is called here before you exercise the leadership that's been given to you. You're equally responsible with me to make sure that the Democratic Party never betrays the trust that has been placed in us.

I'd like to see Democrats in the White House for a long time to come. And if you work closely with me, I think that's—[inaudible].

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11:33 a.m. in the Presidential Ballroom at the Capitol Hilton Hotel. In his opening remarks, he referred to John C. White, newly elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and Kenneth M. Curtis and Robert S. Strauss, former chairmen of the committee.

Panama Canal Treaties

*Letter to Senator Richard Stone.
January 27, 1978*

To Senator Richard Stone

Thank you for meeting with me yesterday about the Panama Canal Treaties. You have expressed concerns that are shared by many of our citizens in Florida and throughout the nation.

Ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties should not be viewed by any power as signaling a retreat by the United States in Latin America. Our country will continue to play a visible and dynamic role in Western Hemisphere affairs.

In particular, it has been and will continue to be the policy of the United States to oppose any efforts, direct or indirect, by the Soviet Union to establish military bases in the Western Hemisphere. Moreover, we will maintain our military bases in the Caribbean necessary to the defense of the Panama Canal and the security of the United States and its allies in the Western Hemisphere.

You have asked when the Government of Panama plans to hold Assembly elections. I am pleased to inform you that Panama will hold elections for its National Assembly on August 6 of this year. The newly-elected members will take office in October.

You have done much to clarify ambiguities that have developed during the debate on the Panama Canal Treaties. I believe the Treaties are very important to the continuing improvement in our relations with Latin America and I hope they will have your support.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

[The Honorable Richard Stone, United States Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510]

Interview With the President

*Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session
With American Press Institute Editors.
January 27, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. Just reading one of my favorite papers here. [Laughter]

Well, I'm particularly grateful to have you come. I know you've had a good session at Reston. And I want to take just a minute to outline some of the things that you might want to discuss with me, and then I'll spend most of the time answering your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

We've now finished a year as the administration in the White House and have learned a lot. I think I have a much better and easier and understanding relationship with the Congress, with my Cabinet—which I consider to be superb—and we've defined issues very carefully. We're trying to carry out our campaign commitments. There's a growing understanding among the American people of what we are trying to do. We're addressing some difficult questions that have been long unaddressed, or at least unsolved. We don't have any magic answers, but I think there's a growing comprehension around the world that we reestablished a true and accurate sense in foreign policy of what the American people stand for and what we want to have as a characteristic of our own Nation and our own Government.

We're trying to guarantee peaceful resolution of any differences or competition with the Soviet Union. We're trying to add our good will and our good offices in the Middle East when the discussions lag or when there is a problem there in communication among the leaders. I think we are trusted, in general, by all of them who are seeking peace.

We are strengthening our relationship and our involvement and interest in Africa. We've had a good response in Latin America, particularly as a result of successful negotiations with the Panama Canal treaties, which are now being considered by the Senate, as you know.

As I pointed out in the State of the Union message, we had a very successful economic year in our country in 1977. But we still have some chronic problems, particularly unemployment among minority groups and young people and a general uncertainty about the economic future because of a lack of resolution of the energy question, that need to be addressed.

We have gone through, now, one complete budget cycle. And I've put an enormous amount of time in, personally, in the evolution of the fiscal year '79 budget, more than I will for the 1980 or 1981 budgets, because I had to learn about the different, specific programs that are buried deep within the large number of Federal agencies.

I think we have a good prospect of holding the budget basically where it is. It's a tight, conservative budget, but it meets the needs of our people adequately. We'll have an urban policy evolved early in the spring, and we have enough flexibility, I think, to accommodate the specific financial needs there.

This is an election year, and I'll probably put more time in 1978 in working with the Democratic Party, on weekends and so forth, than I did during 1977. We've got a new chairman that was voted on this morning, John White, from Texas, who's a levelheaded, very well-respected man, knowledgeable about politics. And he replaces an excellent chairman, who's a particularly personal friend of mine, Ken Curtis, who came because I personally asked him to and who's done a good job this first year.

So, in foreign affairs, in domestic affairs, in the political side of my responsibilities, I feel very good. I've enjoyed being President.

Our family is closer now than it has been in years. We have got enough to keep Rosalynn and Chip and Jeffrey and Amy and Annette and Caron busy, and they represent me and the American people very well.

Chip is in Israel this week. Rosalynn is doing several things outside the Government, and one that has been particularly gratifying has been the establishment of what she calls the Friendship Force, where we send a planeload of Americans to a foreign country and the same plane brings back a load of foreign visitors to our country.

They stay in private homes; don't stay in hotels. The total cost of the round trip is $250. It's a remarkable people-to-people exchange program.

We've already had one from Atlanta to Newcastle, England. Now they'll have another one from Atlanta to Newcastle that they've done on their own. We've had one from Nashville to Caracas. The most recent one is from Hartford, Connecticut, to Tel Aviv, and we've had one from Des Moines to Ireland. And we hope to have 20, maybe 30 this year. But this is all with private funds, no public funds at all.

So, we're trying to do things both in government, in political questions, and also outside of government.

I think the best thing to do would be for me to answer questions that you might have.

QUESTIONS

ENERGY

Q. Mr. President, I'm from Indiana. And this year—I'm sure you are aware of the blizzard situation.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. It points out the energy problem that in another year—what progress do you think we can make this year as far as the administration is concerned on energy?

THE PRESIDENT. Just a few minutes ago, I signed a proclamation of emergency in Indiana so that we can provide help. And last night, I did one for Ohio. This will permit the legal use of military forces, National Guard, and others, to alleviate the traffic conditions and to reach stranded motorists and others.

Well, we're trying to approach the energy question on a comprehensive basis, and it's a very complicated and difficult and politically divisive issue.

The first natural gas deregulation bill that was vetoed, I think, was by Harry Truman, 27, 28 years ago, so that this is not something new. But I think for the first time the Congress has made tremendous progress in trying to resolve these major differences.

I just finished having lunch with Senator Talmadge, who's on the Finance Committee of the Senate, who's also chairman of the Agriculture Committee, and we discussed farms and energy primarily.

I think that we're flexible enough in the executive branch to deal with almost any reasonable solution that the House and Senate conferees can evolve. There are only three prerequisites as far as I'm concerned. One is to have an increase in conservation, an increase in production, be fair to consumers and, at the same time, not break the Federal budget.

So, within those bounds, which are quite general, I'm flexible. There are some deeply felt opinions on both sides of this issue, based on 20 or 30 years of voting record, and it's hard to get people to accommodate those differences. They've never been able to in the past.

So, I think we have a good chance to have a comprehensive energy bill this year that will at least let the American people know where we are going. I think the uncertainty is one of the crucial problems that we have.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, along those lines, how does your administration view the coal miners strike, and do you think you can or should do anything about it?

THE PRESIDENT. We are doing something about it. You know, we're not acting as direct negotiators; I don't think it's advisable for us to do that until we reach a time when the national security is actually endangered and the law requires me at that point to take a more direct role.

My hope and expectation is that the miners and the coal operators can resolve the differences between them. We are offering the services of the Federal mediator. We're also offering the services of the FBI and others to make sure the Federal laws are carried out. But I'm philosophically adverse to an early entry of the Federal Government into the negotiating process.

Q. How long do you think it will have to go on before it's a threat?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it depends on the reserve supplies of coal. I think we still have—well, I don't want to put an exact figure on it. We monitor that every week, and Ray Marshall makes a report to me, but we still have several weeks of adequate supply of coal on hand for electric power production, transportation, and industry.

And I would hope and I do expect that the coal contract question can be resolved before the national emergency arises.

WAGE AND PRICE INCREASES

Q. Mr. President, earlier today George Schultze spoke to us, and he talked about the voluntary standard of behavior that the administration is asking for businesses to comply with. And he said—of course, there's no regulation, but he said that the administration will assert the public interest. Can you explain to me what this means, how the administration can speak out?

THE PRESIDENT. That was Charlie, Charles Schultze.

Q. Charles Schultze, pardon me, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we've tried to make this a joint, voluntary effort on the part of government, business, and labor, so that there could be a self-imposed restraint on escalating wages and prices. Here again, I'm not in favor of wage and price controls, either voluntary or mandatory, and the degree to which labor and business will cooperate is really up to them.

I think the first step has already been taken, and that is to draft the proposal in writing and present it to the leaders in business and labor.

The second step has been taken, that is, my public espousal of it in the State of the Union message.

The third step is now under way, whereby, as decisions are made to increase prices and to demand wage increases, they measure the average increases of the last 2 years and try to make sure that the 1978 increases are at least less than they have had average in the last 2 years.

In most cases, a patriotic motivation and one to assuage or to please the public will have at least as much or more effect than any jawboning or pressure from us. We'll offer the good service of the Council on Wage and Price Stability to assess the inflationary impact of proposals.

We're not requiring, for instance—don't have any inclination nor authority to require—that labor unions propose in advance to us the demands that they'll make for fringe benefits, health programs, or for wages, but we just hope that it'll create a tone in the country of generally dampening the inflationary impact. We have now an underlying inflation rate of about 6 or 6½ percent.

So, that's as far as we are inclined to go. And I've met around this table with a fairly large number of the top business men and women in this country, and their response was favorable.

I've had a luncheon last week with President Meany.<sup>1</sup> He expressed some concern about the point that I just raised to you, that they can't submit ahead of time all of the labor union negotiating demands. We don't ask for that. But we hope that in Government, we can also set an example.

But it's a strictly voluntary program that I think can work with the right sort of spirit and tone.

If—the last thing I'll say about it is this—if we tried to be too intrusive in the private sector from the Government, I think there would be an adverse reaction, and the whole thing would fail. So, the degree of voluntary compliance in self-initiated compliance is the measure of whether it'll be successful.

There's no way to answer your question specifically, because it's kind of an ephemeral thing, but I think it can be the source of tangible benefits.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Q. Mr. President, on the question of human rights, last Sunday in Warren, Michigan, the Ukrainian people held their 60th anniversary for the independence of the Ukraine. And the array of speakers—some condemned the Helsinki accord—fear that détente, if it was continually pursued, that the rights of the Ukrainian people, the Baltic peoples, would vanish from the political American scene.

In line with that question, you have been very firm on human rights. I would like to know your opinion, the feeling as we pursue the course in human rights in the Soviet Union, particularly countries incorporated—and if I might ask, a personal, ethnic attachment—and the question of the Armenian people. Prior to the election when you met with an Armenian group at the airport in Newark—

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I remember.

Q. —you issued a statement on the persecution of the Armenian people and the lack of correction of the injustices against them during the time of the Ottoman Empire. Now, this was a rarity in the American Armenian scene for a candidate for that office to speak so.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. You had met with American Armenian groups, and a personal question is, do you now, as the President, still feel that strong feeling that you expressed then in Newark?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I think, first of all, that the Helsinki agreement has played a useful role. We've never acknowledged, as you know, the absorption by the Soviet Union of the groups to whom you refer. My wife's brother—his wife is an Estonian; she was born and raised there. And we've had a chance in the last few months at Belgrade to specify particular violations of human rights which were in conflict with the Helsinki agreement.

As you know, the Soviets wanted to minimize the so-called third basket and not discuss human rights, but talk about military and political interrelationships.

I think we're making some progress. In my private discussions with foreign leaders—and I set a record last year by meeting with 68 heads of state—hardly ever do we have a 10- or 15-minute or, certainly, not a 3-hour discussion that the subject of human rights doesn't arise. In most instances, they raise it.

My guess is that 2 years ago, the subject of human rights would be a rarity among heads of state. But now, even the most abusive governments, there is a concern—"what does the rest of the world think about me, what will happen if I persecute this group or bring a legal charge against this person?"

I think we are making success in a very slow, tedious way. I notice that this morning—I can't vouch for the accuracy of it—there was a story in the news, for instance, about contending military leaders in Argentina. And the challenging group, I think from the Navy, said that their basis for future success was their deeper commitment to human rights, and they thought that we might support them because they were more convinced that human rights was a case.

Last night I watched the news, which I don't ordinarily do—I don't get home that early, but I had company—and there was a story about the 10,000 Indonesians who are being released from prison this year. I think there is kind of a subtle thing, but I think that this is one of the major commitments that we've made that has aroused worldwide interest, not always worldwide cooperation. And I don't intend to back down on it ever. As long as I'm in the White House, human rights will be a major consideration of every foreign policy decision that I make, and I might say, also, domestic.

CAMPAIGN PLANS

Q. Mr. President, do you plan any campaign trips later this year for Democratic congressional candidates?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. If so, where?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I'll have several. I think the first one that I'll have will be within the next—probably within the next month or so, probably up in the New England area, and in March I'll probably do another one. I don't know how many I will make. But there will be several.

Did I answer your question?

Q. I'm from Indiana. [Laughter] I specifically—would you come to Indiana if Congressman Brademas or Congressman Fithian asked you to?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I can't make a specific promise, because they haven't invited me. But I was there last year when Congressman Brademas and I were both running, and I visited Indiana frequently during 1976, quite often to help the local candidates and State candidates more than myself, really. I just don't know how to answer your question. I certainly would look favorably on it, but I can't promise because they haven't asked me, and I hate to just put them on the spot.

But I and several of the members of the Cabinet—we probably would refrain from political involvement by the Secretary of State or Defense or Treasury, but other members of the Cabinet, on the weekends and so forth, would probably help the candidates. And there are no people in the Congress who have been more helpful to me, say, for instance, than Brademas has.

NUCLEAR-POWERED SATELLITES

Q. Mr. President, now that the reactor from the Soviet satellite has been found in Canada and found to be highly radioactive, what is your administration planning to do to prevent such mishaps, satellite mishaps, from occurring again, and also, what are your plans for stopping nuclear proliferation in space?

THE PRESIDENT. I had breakfast this morning with Secretary Vance and Dr. Brzezinski, and this is one of the subjects that we discussed.

As you know, we have a longstanding treaty with the Soviet Union preventing any atomic explosions in space. But we were guilty of that a long time ago.

I think it's time to reexamine that question. I believe that this recent incident with the Soviet satellite has shown that we don't have an adequate, guaranteed safety requirement on nuclear fuel in space.

This particular satellite and all those that we've ever launched—I think the first one we put up using nuclear power was in 1965—they have what's called a subcritical mass—there's not enough radioactivity there to cause an explosion under any circumstances. And when the satellite is first launched, it's relatively clean; you could get probably close to it without having radiation. The longer it burns, the more byproducts are made and the more radioactive they become.

This particular satellite was designed, as are most of them, to be elevated into a higher orbit when it had served its purpose. And when the Soviets attempted to elevate it into a higher orbit, which would have kept it in space for a thousand years or more, some mechanism failed—I don't know the details of it. But I think that we now are in the process of deciding what we can do to minimize this danger from space.

One possibility would be to design such a nuclear powerplant, which is very small, so that it would surely burn completely as it came down through space itself by increasing the drag of friction, and so forth.

Another one would be to have standby mechanisms, so that if the first one failed to eject it into outer orbit, another standby would be required. This is something that we have not yet gone into in any definitive way.

We have a much higher reliance, as you may know, on solar panel power supplies, and we do not rely on the atomic power supplies as much. But you have a good question. It's something that we have not yet addressed with the Soviets, but I'm sure it's something that we will address.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

Q. As a resident of the submarine capital of the world, where you at one time spent a couple of years—I'm wondering if you continue some type of a relationship with Rickover, if you will have gotten involved or had any conversations with him concerning General Dynamics Electric Boat Division, which has a more than a half a million dollar—half a billion dollar claim they're trying to settle with the Navy on submarine cost overruns, and it's a claim that they've had in for some length of time, and it's causing them a lot of financial difficulty.

THE PRESIDENT. The answer to both your questions is yes. [Laughter]

I have a continuing relationship with Admiral Rickover, and he and I have discussed the General [Dynamics] Electric Boat claim and also other similar claims that are quite extensive.

We're now trying to decide how to resolve those longstanding claims that'll be fair to the companies involved to keep them solvent, but not to overpay them for the work they've done.

I'll be meeting with the Secretary of Defense and his deputy, I think next week; I have a scheduled meeting with them so that they can give me an up-to-date report on the negotiations that are under way.

Admiral Rickover, you know, is very knowledgeable about this, very strict in protecting the public's interest. And my own commitment and that of Secretary Brown is the same. So, the answer to both of your questions—

Q. You show no bias to submarines?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know enough about the subject to comment on a particular claim. Obviously, we have an interest in keeping both the publicly owned and the privately owned shipyards functioning well, because we have a longstanding need in the past and in the future for an adequate capability to build our merchant ships and military ships, and we want to protect the financial stability of them.

I went to Electric Boat Company for the first time in 1950 and was in charge of the precommissioning work on the first ship the Navy built after the Second World War and got acquainted with the processes there.

I think part of the problem is that we've given the order for submarines, airplanes, and other equipment quite early and then continued with the advanced design during the same time that construction was already initiated, which means that excessive change orders are required.

We are trying now to do more of the research and development work before we reach the production stage on equipment of all kinds, which would prevent in the future the very large claims that have arisen because of past practices. In order to expedite delivery, quite often the research-development-design phase was going along at the same time we were actually constructing operation models, and then before the pilot models were tested, we went into production on a large scale. That is probably counterproductive in almost every instance, and we're trying to change that.

Harold Brown is a superb man. He's probably as good a technician, as good a scientist, as good an engineer as there is anywhere in the Nation, and at the same time, he's Secretary of Defense.

So, he brings a resource to government that we haven't had in the past, and I think his ability plus that of Charles Duncan,<sup>1</sup> who's a superb businessman, will help to prevent this kind of problem in the future. But how to resolve these past claims that we've inherited is something that I'll have to get involved in personally.

Maybe a couple more questions.

PROJECT SEAFARER

Q. Mr. President, staying on, rather briefly, on the subject of submarines, do you favor the submarine communications system in the upper peninsula of Michigan, Project Seafarer?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I think we need a submarine communications system of that kind. When a submarine is submerged, it's imperative, in case our Nation's security is directly threatened, to have communication with them.

The only means of fairly rapid communication is with the very low frequency, ultra-low frequency transmissions systems, and there are certain topographical or geological structures in our continent that permit this transmission of signal underneath the land and water.

We are concerned, of course, about the reaction of people in those two States as far as environmental questions are concerned and, also, to assuage their concerns about possible effect of the radio waves that are generated.

So, my answer is yes, I am familiar with it; yes, I do think we need that communication system. But I'm very deeply committed to be sure that nothing is done to disturb the quality of life of the people there.

FARM STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, the farm strike has moved from the prairies of Kansas to the streets in Washington, in a sense. I was wondering if there's anything in the administration in the form of recommendations, other than words of sympathy, that would deal with this supposed money plight of the farmer and, if not, if the administration believes that the farmers will indeed plow up the crops next year?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, of course, the '78 crops haven't been planted, except for winter wheat. You know, I'm a farmer, and Senator Talmadge is a farmer. Bob Bergland is a farmer. We have a genuine problem.

I would say that in the last 5 years that the cost of producing most crops has increased a hundred percent, certainly as far as equipment prices, energy prices, fertilizer prices is concerned. At the same time, most commodity prices have increased very little, if at all. The debt that farmers now hold has increased rapidly. The amount of reserve finances in country banks is down below the historical averages.

We do have a good bit of flexibility within the 1977 agricultural act that the Congress passed and I approved last year.

We have large reserve supplies of feed grains, food grains carried over. There's no way to predict what the weather will be this year. We've already initiated a moderate set-aside program at some substantial cost to the Government. And we have about 6 or 7 billion dollars in increased payments authorized to the farmers, because of higher target prices and support prices.

What else needs to be done at this point I haven't decided. The impact of the new farm legislation has not yet been felt on the agricultural community of our country. It only went into effect the first day of October, and of course, it hadn't gone through a crop season yet. I think there will be some benefit at least from that.

I don't see any possibility of lower prices for fuel, nor for fertilizer. I think that there's going to have to be a sober assessment by the farmers themselves of economic circumstances now and in the future.

I live and have always lived among and with farmers. My people have been in—my Carter family has been here over 300 years—we've all been farmers, every generation of us. And it's a characteristic of many farmers to spend this year what you made last year. And I think there's been an inclination with the limited acreage to have a heavier and heavier investment in equipment that's very costly. At the same time, of course, yields have gone up.

In the long run, the food and feed demands with a fixed or dwindling acreage supply will correct the problem. But at the present time, we have an excess surplus on hand, and as you've shifted from the smaller tractors and livestock cultivation to the very large tractors, you've cut out the windrows and, in effect, you've gone to a fence-to-fence operation.

This has amounted to about, I think, a 50-million acre increase in the land being cultivated. So, with our present set-aside program and the present farm program, we have a step in the right direction. And we will assess other factors, the carryover crops, prospective worldwide production for this 1978 year, the lending capability of farm banks, the amount of debt carried over—we'll analyze all those factors and decide whether to use the flexibility in the present law or to ask for additional legislation. We have not yet decided.

SOVIET COSMOS SATELLITE

Q. Mr. President, are you satisfied with the response of the Soviets when you asked for information on the satellite that was burned?

THE PRESIDENT. That's hard to say. We discovered that the satellite was having a problem back in December—I don't remember the exact day.

I made the decision myself to contact the Soviets. We told them that we were aware of the problem, asked them for any information about the satellite, and told them unofficially that we would not try to capitalize on their misfortune in a propaganda way.

We wanted to be sure that the adequate preparation was made for the reentry of the satellite into the atmosphere, and we notified some of our key allies around the world who would have the capability both to monitor the progress of the satellite and also to deal with radioactivity once it fell.

I had a difficult decision to make in how much publicity to bring to this satellite, because it's almost impossible to let people know the facts without the threat being exaggerated, and we didn't want to create exaggerated fears.

We monitored the satellite constantly. We shared with the Soviets estimates of when it would come down. The exact point of its penetration of the atmosphere was not known until just an hour or two before it crashed, because it was tumbling. And when a satellite of that kind enters the atmosphere, it can skip off and go several thousands of miles further than you have actually anticipated.

We knew that it would fall somewhere between just north of Hawaii, northeast of Hawaii, or the eastern side of Africa. And it was making a great circle route up above the point where it finally fell. That was just about the northern point.

The Soviets did tell us, in general, what kind of reactor it was. They told us that their best estimate was it would burn as it entered the atmosphere.

So, I can't—without going back and checking the exact language of their report to us—I can't say whether they gave us all the facts. But I think it was handled properly; certainly, by us.

I don't know who else the Soviets notified. When I found that it was going to hit Canada, early that morning—I come over here quite early in the morning—I called the Prime Minister of Canada and talked to him on the phone. And we were pretty lucky in telling him where it was going into the atmosphere. We had it on radar.

But in retrospect, it may be that the Soviets could have given us more information. I think they probably gave us about what we would have given them in a similar circumstance.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. I've enjoyed talking to you very much. It's always a pleasure to have you here. It helps me to have your questions. We tend to get a Washington perspective with the permanent White House press corps and a permanent—at least a temporary White House resident—[laughter]—and it adds a new perspective to—a different perspective to the news coverage, to hear what is of concern to you and your readers and listeners and viewers.

Thank you very much for coming.

NOTE: The interview began at 1 p.m. in the Cabinet Room at the White House. Walter W. Wurfel is Deputy Press Secretary.

The transcript of the interview was released on January 28.

10th Anniversary of Ford's Theatre

*Remarks at a White House Reception.
January 29, 1978*

It's a great honor for me as President of the United States to welcome all of you here.

First of all, I would like to thank you for your own interest in Ford Theatre and for your generosity in keeping it a live tribute to the past and an opportunity for the future.

Many of you are performers or composers or writers, and I want to thank you also for keeping this wonderful spirit alive.

It's a great honor to have the chairperson of this year's event with us, Millie O'Neill. And I'd like for us to recognize her now.

I think all of you know that 10 years ago this month—I think the 30th of January, 1968—Ford Theatre was opened again, after more than a hundred years of being closed, as a tribute to President Lincoln, who was killed there in April of 1965 [1865]. As a result of that tragedy for our country, there was a shock that went through the consciousness of our Nation.

That was the same month that the war ended. And people from the North and South began to rebuild what had been rent apart.

But it wasn't the character of Lincoln to have a source of entertainment, tragedy, and humor kept closed and isolated from the people of our Nation. And so a unique occurrence has been recognized tonight that happened 10 years ago, when a national historical site was opened, not as a museum, a closed or a dead thing just to be looked at and admired, but an open and a live thing which is the source of both entertainment and inspiration for us all.

I think that you know that Frankie Hewitt has been an integral part of that evolution. And I know from studying the history of the theatre that it could have gone the other way. Not only has it been innovative but its quality has not been that of the first showing of entertainment that later died, just to say that we had a temporary accomplishment. It's been the birthplace of quality entertainment, which has gone on to thrill the whole Nation. And there's been a reaching out and an offering of new opportunities for those who provide this delightful experience for all Americans.

So, as a southerner, as a President, I would like to say that I'm very proud of all of you for helping to unite the consciousness of our Nation to remember the past, but also to prepare for the future with confidence and also with pleasure. That's the way President Lincoln would have liked it. And you've honored him in performing as you have in keeping Ford Theatre alive.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:28 p.m. in the East Room at the White House. In his remarks, he referred to Mildred A. O'Neill, general chairman of the anniversary celebration, and Frankie Hewitt, executive producer of Ford's Theatre.

Following the reception, the President and Mrs. Carter and their guests attended a performance at the theatre.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF JANUARY 30, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Good afternoon. I have two brief opening statements to make.

DOMESTIC PROGRAMS

The first one involves the major domestic programs that we will pursue in 1978. I would like to review briefly for you my proposals for reforming the tax system, for reducing taxes, for continuing to reduce the unemployment rate, and for preventing and controlling inflation.

These proposals are the centerpiece of the administration's economic program for 1978. Economic policy depends for its success on a very careful balance between different interests, between sometimes conflicting national needs, between doing too much on the one hand, doing too little on the other. To modify one element of a balanced plan can often destroy this balance and can aggravate our economic problems.

I want to emphasize four elements of our proposals that carefully preserve this balance.

First, there's tax reductions. We propose a net tax reduction of $25 billion designed to create almost a million new jobs by the end of 1978. (The President meant to say 1979.)<sup>1</sup> If they are enacted, the economy should continue to grow at a rate of about 4½ to 5 percent, and unemployment should fall below 6 percent by the end of next year. For the vast majority of taxpayers, these reductions will offset the increase in rates that was necessary to prevent bankruptcy of our social security system. For 1978 there will be three times as much tax reduction as there is tax increase for the social security system. And the same ratio, 3 to 1, will prevail in 1979.

Second, our tax reform proposals allow us to have an immediate tax reduction while making substantial progress toward comprehensive reform, a simpler and a fairer tax system. Without these needed reforms, we would not be able to afford so large a tax reduction. They comprise about $9 billion in savings, at the same time providing equality and fairness.

Third is jobs. I've asked for over $700 million more in new funds for youth jobs and, in addition, have asked the Congress to continue the high level of public service jobs for 1979, which is about twice as much as a year ago. In addition, I will shortly forward to the Congress a $400 million program to encourage private businesses to hire the hardcore unemployed. We are balancing the need for public service jobs with the need for private opportunities to reduce unemployment.

And fourth, inflation: Our program is voluntary, requiring the cooperation of government, business, labor, and all our citizens. I've asked each group to hold its increases in wages and prices below the level that it averaged in increases for the last 2 years.

This fair and flexible program and voluntary program will not stop inflation overnight. But it's our best hope for bringing it under control. We simply cannot let inflation overtake us without taking action.

In sum, we proposed an economic program which is balanced. It will not please everyone. As I said in my State of the Union address, we cannot do everything for everybody. We must be willing to face difficult decisions.

In developing our economic program, we've made difficult decisions, and we propose an economic proposal or program that will sustain growth, that will increase employment, and reduce inflation.

SOVIET COSMOS SATELLITE

The other thing I would like to do very briefly is to outline the history of the Soviet satellite, the Cosmos 954. This satellite, which had a nuclear power source on it, was launched on the 18th of September, last year. It was obvious to us later on that the Soviets were having trouble controlling the satellite. On the 19th of December, we set up a small task force in the White House. On the 6th of January, we felt that control had been lost, and I decided personally to notify the Soviets on the 12th of January that we were aware of their problems, to offer our help in monitoring the path of the satellite, and to begin preparing jointly to predict where it would fall and also to prepare for handling it if it should contact the Earth.

The Soviets replied that it was designed so that it would be destroyed as it came back into Earth, and it was designed also so there was no possibility of an atomic explosion.

On the 17th and 18th of January, we notified the key congressional leaders, some of our allies around the world who were capable of joining us in a tracking effort. And the Soviets a day later, on the 19th, repeated their comment it will not explode.

On the 22d of January, we went back to the Soviets to ask them to give us an update to confirm the information we had from monitoring sources. And on the 23d of January, the Soviets notified us that it would probably enter the atmosphere the following day, which is the 24th.

Early on the morning of the 24th, I was notified that the satellite would enter the atmosphere quite early. We did not know whether it would hit between Hawaii on a very high curve up to the northern part of Canada or the western coast of Africa, because sometimes the satellites can skip from one place to another as they enter the atmosphere. It, as you know, entered the atmosphere in Canada.

I immediately called Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, informed him about the approximate location, which later turned out to be accurate. And on the 29th, as you know, just recently, the remains of the satellite have been recovered.

The last satellite we put into Earth orbit with an atomic power source was in 1965. This satellite at the conclusion of its useful life was raised into a higher orbit that has a lifespan of at least 4,000 years.

I think we need to have more rigid safety precautions assured among all nations in Earth-orbiting satellites. In fact, we would be glad to forgo the deployment of any such satellite altogether and will pursue that option along with the Soviet Union.

The only time a satellite needs a long-lasting power source that's free of the use of solar energy, which can be derived from the Sun, is when you go into deep outer space. For instance, if we send a probe to the outer planets, there would not be adequate source of energy from the Sun to trigger our solar cells, and we might need power from atomic sources then.

But I see no reason for us to continue with the option of nations to have Earth-orbiting satellites unless much more advanced safety precautions can be initiated.

QUESTIONS

U.S. ARMS SALES IN THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, since I assume the subject will come up when you meet with President Sadat, could you give us a general outline of your view toward our helping Egypt acquire arms?

THE PRESIDENT. We have been, of course, facing the continuing prospect for a number of years of providing some weapons into the Mideast, heavily to Israel, also to Saudi Arabia, to Iran, and to some degree, the nonattack weapons to Egypt.

All these nations have requests to us for weapons. They've been committed to those nations to some degree by my two predecessors and reconfirmed in some instances by me.

The National Security Council will make a report to me early this week recommending from the State Department, from the Defense Department, from the national security adviser, what weapons to recommend to the Congress. After that point, the Congress will have a 30-day plus a 21-day period to respond affirmatively or not. I will decide later on this week what to recommend to the Congress.

The Egyptians have, in the past, requested F-5E fighter planes, one that is used extensively around the world for export purposes primarily, and Israel and Saudi Arabia have requested other weapons. They have some F-5's.

U.S. ATTORNEY DAVID MARSTON

Q. Mr. President, have you seen anything improper in the handling of the Marston affair? Have you learned any lessons from it and all of its ramifications, and do you contemplate any changes in procedures for appointing and removing U.S. attorneys?

THE PRESIDENT. In the first place, I see nothing improper in the handling of the case. I made a campaign commitment that any appointee to a position as U.S. attorney or a judgeship would be appointed on the basis of merit, and this campaign commitment will be carried out.

There has also been a statement made by me during the campaign that, all other factors equal, that I would choose someone for those positions, or even for the Supreme Court, whose basic political philosophy was compatible with mine. The fact is that at this point we have about one-third of the U.S. attorneys around the country who are Republicans. I think when I took office, only three Democrats were in office. And I don't think that Nixon or Ford appointed any Democrats during the 8-year period. So far as I know, they haven't.

I think that the Attorney General has handled the case as well as possible. I explained to you at the last press conference what I knew about the facts then, and so far as I know, there is no impropriety at all. I understand from the Attorney General that he has now received recommendations for five highly qualified nominees to take over that responsibility. He will begin interviewing them tomorrow. And the likelihood is that he would make a selection this week.

Q. Mr. President, but isn't it time to depoliticize the Justice Department, and in that direction, how about an end to the political firings of Federal judges and prosecutors wholly apart from seeing to it that their Democratic replacements are highly qualified?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think we've moved strongly in that direction. Obviously, a Federal judge is not subject to be removed. The Constitution gives the President a responsibility to appoint those officials if confirmed by the Senate. And, of course, a U.S. attorney can be fired or discharged from office only by the President himself. That does not apply to Federal judges. They, as you know, serve for life.

We have, I think, moved a great step in that direction. Over a period of many generations, the Members of the Senate have become heavily involved in recommendations for judges. Now, since I've been in office, we have set up selection boards for all circuit judges. And I think in 15 States the Senators—which is a new development—have now set up selection boards to recommend highly qualified district judges. But I agree with you that this is a move that we should make.

I think you will notice that when we have made selections for, say, circuit judges or when we've made two selections now for Director of the FBI, there were Republicans involved, I think, in both cases for the FBI.

Q. But how about setting up an independent blue ribbon committee that would monitor firings, as well as appointments, deciding each case on the merits, not on politics?

THE PRESIDENT. The Attorney General in the speech in May, and preceding that in March, advocated that this general procedure be followed. I don't remember the exact text of that speech. But I believe in every instance when the results have been made known that there has been no criticism of the person chosen. In some instances, U.S. Senators have specifically come forward and advocated that a Republican U.S. attorney be kept in office.

I remember once in particular in New York that Pat Moynihan said to keep the Republicans in office, and we've done so.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, on the Middle East, do you have a clear idea now from Prime Minister Begin as to whether or not he will authorize new settlements in the West Bank and in the Sinai, and do you believe that Israel over a period of time ought to phase out those settlements in return for real peace?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've covered this many times. Our position on settlements in the occupied territory has been that they are illegal, that they are an obstacle to peace. When Prime Minister Begin was over here and when Foreign Minister Dayan was here, this question arose. And my understanding of their commitment was that no new settlements would be authorized by the government, that any increase in settlers would be an expansion of existing settlements as much as possible within the aegis of the military.

The Geneva conference agreement is that civilians should not go in to settle permanently in occupied territories. I think the Israeli Government has not authorized the Shilo settlement other than as an archeological exploration project. And I've not yet heard from Prime Minister Begin directly, but I have had information that this is a policy of the Israeli Government, that this is not an authorized settlement.

U.S. ATTORNEY MARSTON

Q. Mr. President, just to sort of complete the record on that Marston case. On the morning of January 12, according to your statement at the Justice Department, you learned that a Member of Congress was of investigative interest to either the Justice Department or the U.S. attorney. Later that day at your news conference, you said, "As far as any investigation of Members of Congress, however, I'm not familiar with that at all, and it was never mentioned to me." Do you see any conflict there?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't. I think if you read the question to which I referred, it's obviously related to whether or not I had known anything about any investigation in November. And the answer was no, no discussion ever had been made. The only inkling I had at all that Mr. Eilberg was involved with an investigation was that Frank Moore mentioned, just as I was leaving my office to come over for the press conference, that his name had been raised in conjunction with an investigation. I was not told at that time and had no idea that he was being investigated himself, Eilberg.

Q. Mr. President, could you tell us—this question goes more to philosophy, I guess, than anything—could you tell us why you felt compelled to respond to a phone call from a Congressman in Philadelphia to, as you put it, expedite the removal of a U.S. attorney, one of more than 90 in the country? And secondly, do you really believe that these actions by your administration over the last 2 or 3 weeks with regard to Mr. Marston square, really square with the commitment you made in your campaign to remove the Justice Department from the spoils system traditional to American politics?

THE PRESIDENT. To answer your last question first, yes, I do think that our actions are compatible with my campaign statements, which I've said earlier. On an average day, I get either personal letters from Congress Members or telephone calls about 10 or 12 inquiries or requests for the replacement of a public official or the appointment of someone to fill a vacancy. In most instances, as relates to the Federal judiciary, the inquiries or recommendations come from U.S. Senators.

In historical terms, when both Senators are Republican Senators, then the Members of Congress and the Governors are consulted on who are qualified people and so forth. This was a routine matter for me, and I did not consider my taking the telephone call from Congressman Eilberg, nor relaying his request to the Attorney General, to be ill-advised at all. If it occurred now, I would do the same.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, do you have an overall view of the final borders you would like to see for Israel? Do you expect Israel to return to the 1967 borders in all aspects, especially in East Jerusalem?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I don't have a map or a plan that ought to be the final border delineation between Israel and her neighbors. I have always operated and made my statements under the framework and within the constraints of United Nations Resolution 242, which calls for Israel to withdraw from occupied territories.

Israel interprets this language differently, of course, from the Arab neighbors. The Arab neighbors say that Israel ought to withdraw from all occupied territories. Israel says that there's some flexibility there and that the thrust of U.N. Resolution 242 is an exchange, in effect, for portions of the occupied territory for guaranteed peace.

The three elements that I've pursued is, one, a delineation of final borders; secondly, a feeling or conviction on the part of the Israelis that their security was preserved, which would involve both their own military strength, the delineation of the borders, and the attitude now and in the future of their neighbors.

The second question, of course, is the definition of real peace. What does peace mean? Does it simply mean a cessation of hostility or belligerency, or does it mean open borders, trade, tourism, diplomatic exchange, the location of ambassadors, and so forth?

I've taken the more definitive definition as my own preference. And the other thing, of course, is to deal in all its aspects with the Palestinian question.

But I have never tried to put forward in my own mind or to any of the Middle-eastern leaders a map in saying this is where the lines should be drawn.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, Energy Secretary Schlesinger has expressed some recent concern about the duration of the coal strike. I wonder what extent you share that concern and whether you might see the necessity to use Taft-Hartley.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we are very hopeful that the coal mine operators and the United Coal Workers will expedite a resolution of their differences. This past weekend the news was not good. I see no immediate prospect of having to exercise the Taft-Hartley provisions. It only provides for the President the authority to intercede if the national security is in danger. And we certainly have not arrived at that point yet.

There are some things that we can do, and I've discussed them with the entire Cabinet this morning and, of course, with Secretary Schlesinger in particular. The gaseous diffusion plants for the production of atomic fuels, for instance, are heavy users of energy. We are reducing the power consumed by them.

There is a need for citizens who live in the heavily hit regions, because of the snowstorms, to cut down on consumption of energy because transportation won't let even the available supplies come into those regions. But I have no present intention at all of trying to intercede nor to exercise my authority under the Taft-Hartley Act.

NUCLEAR-POWERED SATELLITES

Q. Mr. President, regarding your concern about satellites and the safety precautions, in taking this up with the Russians, will you try to dissuade them from their practice of putting nuclear reactors into space in the future?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, certainly in Earth orbit. I think that this is something that we should explore. There are two factors though. One is to try to evolve a sure-fire safety requirement that would prevent a recurrence of any atomic active material reaching the Earth or the atmosphere where human beings might breathe it. If we cannot evolve those fail-safe methods, then I think there ought to be a total prohibition against Earth-orbiting satellites.

I would favor at this moment an agreement with the Soviets to prohibit Earth-orbiting satellites with atomic radiation material in them.

SOVIET COSMOS SATELLITE

Q. Mr. President, do you have any idea what the deal is on that satellite up there? We get all these reports. One day it's not radioactive; the next day it is. Do you have any late information about just what the status of that thing is? Or whether there is any danger?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I know nothing at this point that hasn't already been put into the press. One, I do know that they've located a crater, about a 9-foot dimension, that it is radioactive, and that a search group from one of our own helicopters working with the Canadians is at the site. But the configuration of the remains of the satellite or whether or not they are now retrieving it from the riverbed where it's located, I do not know.

UNDOCUMENTED ALIENS

Q. Mr. President, last August in your immigration message, you said you were not considering reintroduction of a bracero-type program for the temporary importation of farm workers.

Last week, Secretary Bergland down in Mexico City had an airport press conference at which he apparently gave some Mexican newspapers the idea that we were considering such a program and were considering importing 3 million braceros, and they've been writing a lot of stories about it. He has tried to deny it. Could you state your position on it, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. We have no plans whatsoever to reinstate a bracero program. Our own proposal to deal with the undocumented workers or illegal alien question has already been submitted to the public, and that encompasses what we proposed. It does not comprise a bracero-type program.

SOVIET SATELLITE CAPABILITIES

Q. There are reports that the Soviets have or soon will have the capability to disrupt our sending of military orders by satellites. Can you tell us whether they are accurate or not?

THE PRESIDENT. My information is that that report is not accurate.

NAZI DEMONSTRATION IN SKOKIE, ILLINOIS

Q. Mr. President, there's a group of American Nazis in Skokie, a suburb of Chicago, which is contemplating a march that's in a predominantly Jewish neighborhood, and there might be victims there of the Nazi concentration camps from World War II. Do you have any plan to use the moral weight of your office to try to discourage this kind of a march?

THE PRESIDENT. I deplore it. I wish that this demonstration of an abhorrent political and social philosophy would not be present at all. This is a matter that is in the American Federal courts, as you know, and under the framework of the constitutional guarantee for free speech. I believe under carefully controlled conditions the courts have ruled that it is legal and that they have a right to act this way.

We have the same problem, as you know, in other parts of the Nation—in the South with the Ku Klux Klan, and others. And I don't have any inclination to intercede further. I think it's best to leave it in the hands of the court.

PLANS FOLLOWING TERM IN OFFICE

Q. Mr. President, is it true that you plan to become a missionary after leaving office, and if so, how soon after leaving, for how long and where—[laughter]—and if I can pursue it, have you discussed this with Mrs. Carter? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I discussed it with my wife, who was a member of the Sunday school class that I taught yesterday morning.

I have, as a Baptist layman, been part of a group that advocated an expanded church mission program, but I've not decided whether or not I would want to be a missionary after I complete my term as President.

DOMESTIC SURVEILLANCE

Q. Mr. President, on March 15th of 1976, you told the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations that the American people have had their fill of covert manipulation. The Executive order you signed last week, January 24, provides a procedure for the NSC to approve covert manipulation. Now, I'm wondering, if the American people have had their fill of covert manipulation, why you are continuing to provide this procedure for allowing it?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't believe that the Executive order would permit, as you call it, covert manipulations. It does permit the surveillance of certain groups in the United States. The only way that an American citizen can be put under surveillance, clandestine or secret surveillance, is as a result of an order by a Federal judge with a warrant.

If someone is strongly suspected of being an agent of a foreign power, working against the security of our country, then with the approval of the Attorney General to assure that it is a proper function and with my own approval, too, that is permitted.

But that's no departure from any past—

Q. I am talking about Section 1-302. It says the SCC, the Special Coordination Committee, "shall consider and submit to the President a policy recommendation, including all dissents, on [each] special activity." And then Section 4-212 defines special activities as "activities conducted abroad in support of national foreign policy objectives . . . which are planned and executed so that the role of the United States Government is not apparent or acknowledged publicly"—which seems to be a covert operation.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, covert, as you know, has a meaning of nonpublicized or secret. Under any circumstances where we feel that it's necessary to have a so-called covert action of any kind overseas, then it has to be decided in the White House. The President is notified and approves it personally. The Secretary of State and the Attorney General are involved, and the congressional intelligence committees are also informed. And so, this is a very careful prevention of any abuse if that should ever become necessary.

PARITY FOR FARMERS

Q. Mr. President, could I ask you about the farmers' demands for 100 percent parity? They've been outside the White House gates several times recently.

Have you ever stated that you are flatly opposed to 100 percent parity, and if so—if not, what are your views on that specific demand; secondly, what would 100 percent parity cost in terms of increasing the Federal budget; and thirdly, what would it cost the American consumer?

THE PRESIDENT. I would guess, to guarantee 100 percent parity for every farm product would cost $20 or $25 billion in the Federal budget. It would also mean that the price of American farm products would be extraordinarily high and that they would be noncompetitive in international markets.

I think the request for or demand for 100 percent of parity is not well founded. There needs to be some flexibility obviously, and that's what is provided under the 1977 agricultural act.

This act, I believe, will go a long way toward meeting the legitimate needs of the American farmer. It only became effective the first day of October 1977. It's not been effective yet for a crop season, and we, in implementing that bill, will have greatly expanded financial benefits for the American farmer, increased support prices and target prices.

Also, we've had a very fine and successful effort for foreign sales, and in establishing a reserve supply of feed grains and food grains primarily held and controlled by farmers, I think will bring some stability to the marketplace and prevent the wild fluctuations which hurt the farmer and consumer. But 100 percent of parity, in my opinion, would be too costly.

TAX REDUCTION AND REFORM

Q. Mr. President, your Treasury Secretary this morning told the Ways and Means Committee that you would rather swallow a cut in your tax cuts rather than increase the $60 billion deficit. How are you going to deal with Chairman Ullman's intention to trim the reforms and probably trim the tax cuts, too?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, you know, Chairman Ullman is obviously entitled to his opinion, and I have never claimed that we had complete compatibility of opinion between myself and the chairmen of the committees either in the House or Senate.

As I pointed out in my opening statement, our entire economic package is a well-balanced one, and without the tax reforms which comprise about $9 billion, it will not be possible to have even a $25 billion tax reduction without a very serious additional Federal deficit. I think the Federal deficit is enough. I wish it was much lower. And I intend to reduce it year by year until the end of my term.

We could have had about a $20 billion lower Federal deficit had we not advocated a tax cut. But there you have to balance off the advantages from a tax cut that's substantial and reducing the Federal deficit in a very rigid way. I think we made the right choice.

We also have to deal with the jobs programs, and we had an increase in Federal spending to put our people back to work, to cut down the unemployment rate. At the same time, we can't stimulate the economy too much or we'd run into increased rate of inflation.

So, those four factors have to go together, and I think we've put them together in a very careful way. If the Congress should change any of those factors, which I hope they will not, then we'd have to use our own influence in the Congress and with the American people to try to induce them to accept some reasonable alternative which would still keep a balanced economic package.

FRANK CORMIER [Associated Press]. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

White House Conference on Families

*Statement Announcing the Conference.
January 30, 1978*

In order to help stimulate a national discussion of the state of American families, I will convene a White House Conference on Families in Washington, D.C., December 9-13, 1979.

Families are both the foundation of American society and its most important institution. In a world becoming more complex every day, our families remain the most lasting influence on our lives.

I am confident that the American family is basically sound and that we can and will adjust to the challenges of changing times. Yet American families confront growing problems. Two out of five marriages now end in divorce. One child in eight is born outside of marriage. A million young Americans now run away from home each year. In the face of these difficulties, I am encouraged by the increasing interest in the state of the family by people from all walks of life.

The main purpose of this White House Conference will be to examine the strengths of American families, the difficulties they face, and the ways in which family life is affected by public policies. The Conference will examine the important effects that the world of work, the mass media, the court system, private institutions, and other major facets of our society have on American families.

This Conference will clearly recognize the pluralism of family life in America. The widely differing regional, religious, cultural, and ethnic heritages of our country affect family life and contribute to its diversity and strength. Families also differ in age and composition. There are families in which several generations live together, families with two parents or one, and families with or without children. The Conference will respect this diversity.

The work of this Conference, in conjunction with our current efforts to implement family-oriented government policies, can help strengthen and support this most vital and enduring social resource. I look forward to participating in the work of the Conference and receiving its report.

Council on Wage and Price Stability

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with Section 5 of the Council on Wage and Price Stability Act, as amended, I hereby transmit to the Congress the eleventh quarterly report of the Council on Wage and Price Stability. This report contains a description of the Council activities during the second quarter of 1977 in monitoring both prices and wages in the private sector and various Federal Government activities that lead to higher costs and prices without creating commensurate benefits. It discusses Council reports and analyses concerning the following matters: (1) the collective bargaining agreement reached in the steel industry; (2) the availability of home insulation materials; (3) prospects for a fertilizer shortage; (4) the prices of bakery products; (5) the price behavior of auto parts; and (6) U.S. production capacity of cement. The report also discusses the Council's filings before Federal regulatory agencies.

The Council on Wage and Price Stability will continue to play an important role in supplementing fiscal and monetary policies by calling public attention to wage and price developments or actions by the Government that could be of concern to American consumers.

JIMMY CARTER

National Council on the Arts

*Renomination of Three Members.
January 30, 1978*

The President today announced that he will renominate Theodore Bikel, Maureen Dees, and Jacob Lawrence to be members of the National Council on the Arts. All three were originally nominated on November 14, 1977. Dees and Lawrence were nominated at that time for terms expiring September 3, 1978; their renominations today are for terms expiring January 26, 1984.

Telecommunications Minority Assistance Program

*Announcement of Administration Program.
January 31, 1978*

The Carter administration today announced a program to increase minority ownership in electronic communications. The program will encourage minority ownership of broadcast and cable television facilities and increase the flow of Federal advertising dollars to minority-owned stations, publications, and advertising and production firms.

Because of telecommunications' vital role in social, economic, and political progress, full minority participation is a critical component of President Carter's economic and social policy goals. Minority ownership markedly serves the public interest, for it ensures the sustained and increased sensitivity to minority audiences. Today, fewer than 1 percent of the Nation's commercial and public radio and television stations and cable television systems are owned or controlled by minorities.

Historically, minorities seeking broadcast ownership have faced:

- difficulty obtaining initial financing;
- a shortage of available properties because most communications assignments were made years ago;
- barriers to technical training and employment opportunities;
- difficulty in attracting advertising to support operations.

The administration seeks to remove these barriers with a comprehensive package including:

- urging the Federal Communications Commission to adopt a minority ownership policy;
- changes in loan policies of the Small Business Administration and the Economic Development Administration;
- initiating an American Indian ownership and training program at the Department of Labor;
- changes in the Public Broadcasting Act to make more public broadcasting facilities money available to minorities;
- developing Federal guidelines to help ensure more agency advertising money for minority outlets and advertising firms;
- working with communications industry and professional groups which are developing minority ownership assistance programs.

A petition filed today with the FCC was signed by the Office of Telecommunications Policy and the Department of Commerce on behalf of the administration. It urged the FCC to establish a policy promoting ownership of broadcast facilities by minorities in areas with minority populations. If adopted, the policy would justify modifications of other Commission policies and rules in all areas of FCC license processing so that more broadcast properties and funding prospects would be available for minority applicants.

The petition suggests:

—In comparative hearings (more than one applicant) for licenses, a preference be given to applicants where minorities participate in ownership.

—In the noncomparative licensing process, the Commission should take various steps, including:

- expedite the processing of minority applications;
- permit minorities to operate stations part-time through extensive brokerage of broadcast time, giving minority entrepreneurs an opportunity to develop management experience;
- adopt the National Association of Broadcasters proposal permitting deferral of capital gains taxes for broadcasters who sell their stations to minority entrepreneurs;
- make minority ownership a basis for waiving limitations on the number of television stations one owner may acquire in the 50 largest television markets;
- lessen the financial requirements for minority applicants to facilitate licensing;
- adopt the Congressional Black Caucus proposal to permit sales at reduced prices of stations designated for license renewal or revocation hearings to groups with at least 50 percent minority ownership.

To ease initial financing problems, the SBA and the EDA have announced rule changes to extend their loan and loan guarantee programs to broadcast and cable facilities. The SBA program will extend direct loans of up to $350,000 and guarantee loans up to $500,000 to individuals or groups wishing to buy cable and broadcast properties. The EDA will extend its loan program to broadcasting and cable consistent with its job-ratio requirement of creating one direct job for every $10,000 expended and/or where EDA has invested considerable resources in a community's development. Both agencies intend minorities to be the major beneficiaries of their rule changes.

The Department of Labor has launched a program to assist native American communities in starting communications facilities. The program will provide training coordinated with various Government loan programs.

Public broadcasting would be further opened to minorities by President Carter's Public Broadcasting Act, proposed in October 1977. The bill would change the grant program for public broadcasting facilities to make minority control a primary consideration for choosing grantees.

In addition, the administration program addresses Federal agencies' advertising programs. The Office of Federal Procurement Policy, Office of Management and Budget, is working with the Department of Defense, AMTRAK, the Postal Service, and other agencies which advertise to establish by June 1978 policies and procedures to increase the flow of Federal advertising business to minority-owned advertising and production firms and to minority-owned media.

The administration also has been coordinating with professional and industry groups in seeking to promote minority assistance programs:

—The National Association of Broadcasters has formed a Minority Ownership Task Force with representatives from the broadcasting industry, civil rights organizations, and foundations to develop financial assistance and other remedies for potential minority broadcast owners.

—The National Radio Broadcasters Association has drafted a program to establish an information clearinghouse on available radio properties and a "buddy system," making management and financing assistance available to qualified potential and existing minority broadcasters.

—The National Cable Television Association, through a program it established a year ago, has helped establish the American Association of Cable Television Owners, an organization to assist minorities in obtaining debt financing for cable television. In addition, NCTA has formed an advisory committee of financiers and cable brokers who give free assistance to minority cable franchise holders and who are working with the financial community to bring them together with minority cable franchisees.

—The Federal Communications Bar Association has established a free and reduced fee legal assistance program for qualified minorities.

—The American Association of Advertising Agencies (AAAA) has formed a Task Force of the AAAA, the Association of National Advertisers, the American Research Foundation, and minority station owners to examine the methods employed by rating services in measuring minority audiences and the industry's advertising selling practices as they relate to minority outlets.

The administration program was developed by the Office of Telecommunications Policy and the White House staff as part of President Carter's efforts to aid minority business. Coordination of the program will be assumed by the National Telecommunications and Information Administration in the Commerce Department when it replaces OTP upon implementation of Reorganization Plan No. 1. In the future, the program will include initiatives in advertising and rating practices and minority participation in the development of emerging telecommunications services.

National Defense Transportation Day and National Transportation Week, 1978

Proclamation 4548. January 31, 1978

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

The United States is a nation dependent on mobility. Transportation helps maintain our prosperity, ensure our national defense, and bind us together as a people. An efficient transportation network is important to maintain our quality of life and help our Nation conserve precious petroleum.

Recognizing the fundamental relationship between transportation and our Nation's welfare, the Congress has requested the President to proclaim annually the third Friday in May as National Defense Transportation Day and the week in which that day falls as National Transportation Week (71 Stat. 30, 36 U.S.C. 160; 76 Stat. 69, 36 U.S.C. 166).

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Friday, May 19, 1978, as National Defense Transportation Day, and the week beginning May 14, 1978, as National Transportation Week.

I urge the Governors of our States and other appropriate officials, organizations concerned with transportation, and the people of the United States to join with the Department of Transportation in observing this day and week.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this thirty-first day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Civil Aeronautics Board

Executive Order 12037. January 31, 1978

EXEMPTION OF G. JOSEPH MINETTI FROM MANDATORY RETIREMENT

G. Joseph Minetti, Member, Civil Aeronautics Board, became subject to mandatory retirement for age on July 31, 1977, under the provisions of Section 8335 of Title 5 of the United States Code unless exempted by Executive Order. Mr. Minetti was exempted from mandatory retirement until September 30, 1977, by Executive Order No. 12006 of July 29, 1977, until October 31, 1977, by Executive Order No. 12011 of September 30, 1977, and until January 31, 1978, by Executive Order No. 12016 of October 31, 1977.

In my judgment, the public interest requires that G. Joseph Minetti continue to be exempted from such mandatory retirement.

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me by subsection (c) of Section 8335 of Title 5 of the United States Code, I hereby exempt G. Joseph Minetti from mandatory retirement until May 1, 1978.

Conventional Arms Transfer Policy

*Statement by the President.
February 1, 1978*

The United States Government, the executive branch and the Congress, are pledged to bring about a reduction in the trade in conventional arms. Last year, I promised to begin reducing U.S. arms sales as a necessary first step. I will continue that policy this year.

In the last fiscal year, the previous administration and my administration made sales commitments totaling many billions of dollars. While high, however, the total was considerably less than it would have been in the absence of new restraints we introduced, particularly in sales commitments to the developing countries of the world. Between January 20 and the close of the fiscal year, I approved and sent to Congress arms sales totaling $5.7 billion, which is less than half the total approved during the same period in 1976.

Today, I am announcing that arms transfer agreements covered by the ceiling which I have established will be reduced by $740 million in fiscal year 1978. This means that for the fiscal year which began on October 1, 1977, and which will end on September 30, 1978, new commitments under the Foreign Military Sales and Military Assistance programs for weapons and weapons-related items to all countries except NATO, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand will not exceed $8.6 billion. The comparable figure for fiscal year 1977 was $9.3 billion. This is a reduction of 8 percent, figured on constant fiscal year 1976 dollars.

A larger cut in the ceiling would violate commitments already made, including our historic interest in the security of the Middle East, and would ignore the continuing realities of world politics and risk the confidence and security of those nations with whom the United States has vital and shared foreign policy and security interests. A smaller reduction would neglect our responsibility to set an example of restraint that others might follow.

I intend to make further reductions in the next fiscal year. The extent of next year's reduction will depend upon the world political situation and upon the degree of cooperation and understanding of other nations.

I want to emphasize that the restraint policy I announced on May 19, 1977, was not aimed exclusively at the volume of arms transfers. Equally important is restraint in the sophistication of arms being transferred and on the spreading capability to produce armaments. Therefore, in addition to the ceiling, I established five specific controls applicable to all transfers except those to our NATO allies, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand. These controls included: (1) a control on the first introduction of certain advanced systems into an area; (2) a prohibition on advanced systems for export only; (3) a prohibition on various types of coproduction arrangements; (4) tighter controls on retransfer; and (5) special controls on sales promotions.

These guidelines are at the heart of my decisions to approve or disapprove an arms transfer.

As I stated in my October 4 speech to the United Nations, genuine progress in this area will require multilateral efforts. But we are committed to taking the first steps alone to stop the spiral of increasing arms transfers. I call upon suppliers and recipients alike to join us in a determined effort to make the world a safer place in which to live.

Chinese New Year, 1978

Message of the President. February 1, 1978

The Chinese New Year again joins Rosalynn and me in an expression of good wishes to our fellow citizens of Chinese ancestry.

It is a fine opportunity for all Americans to review with pride the accomplishments and vast cultural heritage of a very important segment of our population. Time-honored Chinese wisdom has given us inspiration, Chinese art has enriched our lives and individuals of Chinese origin have immeasurably contributed to the vitality and strength of our society.

For all these reasons this New Year observance makes it highly appropriate for us to salute all Chinese-Americans on whom so much of our national progress and development continues to depend.

National Commission on Unemployment Compensation

*Appointment of Six Members.
February 1, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of six persons as members of the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation:

WILBUR J. COHEN, dean of the School of Education and professor of education, and professor of public welfare administration in the School of Social Work, at the University of Michigan;

BEATRICE COLEMAN, president, chairman of the board, and chief executive and operating officer of Maidenform, Inc.;

WILBUR DANIELS, executive vice president of the ILGWU;

J. ELDRED HILL, JR., executive director of UBA, Inc., a Washington research and consulting firm dealing with unemployment and workmen's compensation legislation;

KEN MORRIS, international executive board member and director of Region 1-B of the United Auto Workers;

JAMES R. O'BRIEN, assistant director of the AFL-CIO department of social security.

Save Your Vision Week, 1978

Proclamation 4549. February 1, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

Good vision is too important to be left to chance. Most of what we learn and do depends upon how well we can see. As one of our most valuable possessions, sight deserves our care and protection.

By learning the early warning signs of eye disease, practicing eye safety, and having regular eye examinations, we can prevent some of the most common forms of visual impairment and blindness. Many eye disorders can be corrected or alleviated with prompt professional care. By wearing protective eyeglasses or safety goggles in potentially hazardous situations on the job or at home, we can prevent many eye injuries. Regular eye examinations may also detect early signs of other serious health problems, such as diabetes or high blood pressure, long before symptoms appear.

To increase awareness of the importance of good vision and of ways to protect it, the Congress, by joint resolution approved December 30, 1963 (77 Stat. 629, 36 U.S.C. 169a), has requested the President to proclaim the first week of March of each year as Save Your Vision Week.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the week beginning

March 5, 1978, as Save Your Vision Week. I urge all Americans to observe this period by learning what they can do to take care of their eyes and by practicing a few simple precautions to protect their sight. I invite the vision care professionals, the communications media, educators, and all public and private organizations which support sight conservation to participate in activities which will inform all Americans about the importance of eye care and encourage them to take steps to protect their vision.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this first day of February, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

JIMMY CARTER

Panama Canal Treaties

Address to the Nation. February 1, 1978

Good evening.

Seventy-five years ago, our Nation signed a treaty which gave us rights to build a canal across Panama, to take the historic step of joining the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The results of the agreement have been of great benefit to ourselves and to other nations throughout the world who navigate the high seas.

The building of the canal was one of the greatest engineering feats of history. Although massive in concept and construction, it's relatively simple in design and has been reliable and efficient in operation. We Americans are justly and deeply proud of this great achievement.

The canal has also been a source of pride and benefit to the people of Panama—but a cause of some continuing discontent. Because we have controlled a 10-mile-wide strip of land across the heart of their country and because they considered the original terms of the agreement to be unfair, the people of Panama have been dissatisfied with the treaty. It was drafted here in our country and was not signed by any Panamanian. Our own Secretary of State who did sign the original treaty said it was "vastly advantageous to the United States and . . . not so advantageous to Panama."

In 1964, after consulting with former Presidents Truman and Eisenhower, President Johnson committed our Nation to work towards a new treaty with the Republic of Panama. And last summer, after 14 years of negotiation under two Democratic Presidents and two Republican Presidents, we reached an agreement that is fair and beneficial to both countries. The United States Senate will soon be debating whether these treaties should be ratified.

Throughout the negotiations, we were determined that our national security interests would be protected; that the canal would always be open and neutral and available to ships of all nations; that in time of need or emergency our warships would have the right to go to the head of the line for priority passage through the canal; and that our military forces would have the permanent right to defend the canal if it should ever be in danger. The new treaties meet all of these requirements.

Let me outline the terms of the agreement. There are two treaties—one covering the rest of this century, and the other guaranteeing the safety, openness, and neutrality of the canal after the year 1999, when Panama will be in charge of its operation.

For the rest of this century, we will operate the canal through a nine-person board of directors. Five members will be from the United States and four will be from Panama. Within the area of the present Canal Zone, we have the right to select whatever lands and waters our military and civilian forces need to maintain, to operate, and to defend the canal.

About 75 percent of those who now maintain and operate the canal are Panamanians; over the next 22 years, as we manage the canal together, this percentage will increase. The Americans who work on the canal will continue to have their rights of employment, promotion, and retirement carefully protected.

We will share with Panama some of the fees paid by shippers who use the canal. As in the past, the canal should continue to be self-supporting.

This is not a partisan issue. The treaties are strongly backed by President Gerald Ford and by Former Secretaries of State Dean Rusk and Henry Kissinger. They are endorsed by our business and professional leaders, especially those who recognize the benefits of good will and trade with other nations in this hemisphere. And they were endorsed overwhelmingly by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which, this week, moved closer to ratification by approving the treaties, although with some recommended changes which we do not feel are needed.

And the treaties are supported enthusiastically by every member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff—General George Brown, the Chairman, General Bernard Rogers, Chief of Staff of the Army, Admiral James Holloway, Chief of Naval Operations, General David Jones, Chief of Staff of the Air Force, and General Louis Wilson, Commandant of the Marine Corps—responsible men whose profession is the defense of this Nation and the preservation of our security.

The treaties also have been overwhelmingly supported throughout Latin America, but predictably, they are opposed abroad by some who are unfriendly to the United States and who would like to see disorder in Panama and a disruption of our political, economic, and military ties with our friends in Central and South America and in the Caribbean.

I know that the treaties also have been opposed by many Americans. Much of that opposition is based on misunderstanding and misinformation. I've found that when the full terms of the agreement are known, most people are convinced that the national interests of our country will be served best by ratifying the treaties.

Tonight, I want you to hear the facts. I want to answer the most serious questions and tell you why I feel the Panama Canal treaties should be approved.

The most important reason—the only reason—to ratify the treaties is that they are in the highest national interest of the United States and will strengthen our position in the world. Our security interests will be stronger. Our trade opportunities will be improved. We will demonstrate that as a large and powerful country, we are able to deal fairly and honorably with a proud but smaller sovereign nation. We will honor our commitment to those engaged in world commerce that the Panama Canal will be open and available for use by their ships—at a reasonable and competitive cost—both now and in the future.

Let me answer specifically the most common questions about the treaties.

Will our Nation have the right to protect and defend the canal against any armed attack or threat to the security of the canal or of ships going through it?

The answer is yes, and is contained in both treaties and also in the statement of understanding between the leaders of our two nations.

The first treaty says, and I quote: "The United States of America and the Republic of Panama commit themselves to protect and defend the Panama Canal. Each Party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet the danger resulting from an armed attack or other actions which threaten the security of the Panama Canal or [of] ships transiting it."

The neutrality treaty says, and I quote again: "The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral. . . ."

And to explain exactly what that means, the statement of understanding says, and I quote again: "Under (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently [shall] have the right to act against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal."

It is obvious that we can take whatever military action is necessary to make sure that the canal always remains open and safe.

Of course, this does not give the United States any right to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama, nor would our military action ever be directed against the territorial integrity or the political independence of Panama.

Military experts agree that even with the Panamanian Armed Forces joined with us as brothers against a common enemy, it would take a large number of American troops to ward off a heavy attack. I, as President, would not hesitate to deploy whatever armed forces are necessary to defend the canal, and I have no doubt that even in a sustained combat, that we would be successful. But there is a much better way than sending our sons and grandsons to fight in the jungles of Panama.

We would serve our interests better by implementing the new treaties, an action that will help to avoid any attack on the Panama Canal.

What we want is the permanent right to use the canal—and we can defend this right through the treaties—through real cooperation with Panama. The citizens of Panama and their government have already shown their support of the new partnership, and a protocol to the neutrality treaty will be signed by many other nations, thereby showing their strong approval.

The new treaties will naturally change Panama from a passive and sometimes deeply resentful bystander into an active and interested partner, whose vital interests will be served by a well-operated canal. This agreement leads to cooperation and not confrontation between our country and Panama.

Another question is: Why should we give away the Panama Canal Zone? As many people say, "We bought it, we paid for it, it's ours."

I must repeat a very important point: We do not own the Panama Canal Zone. We have never had sovereignty over it. We have only had the right to use it.

The Canal Zone cannot be compared with United States territory. We bought Alaska from the Russians, and no one has ever doubted that we own it. We bought the Louisiana Purchases—Territories from France, and that's an integral part of the United States.

From the beginning, we have made an annual payment to Panama to use their land. You do not pay rent on your own land. The Panama Canal Zone has always been Panamanian territory. The U.S. Supreme Court and previous American Presidents have repeatedly acknowledged the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone.

We've never needed to own the Panama Canal Zone, any more than we need to own a 10-mile-wide strip of land all the way through Canada from Alaska when we build an international gas pipeline.

The new treaties give us what we do need—not ownership of the canal, but the right to use it and to protect it. As the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has said, "The strategic value of the canal lies in its use."

There's another question: Can our naval ships, our warships, in time of need or emergency, get through the canal immediately instead of waiting in line?

The treaties answer that clearly by guaranteeing that our ships will always have expeditious transit through the canal. To make sure that there could be no possible disagreement about what these words mean, the joint statement says that expeditious transit, and I quote, "is intended . . . to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly."

Will the treaties affect our standing in Latin America? Will they create a so-called power vacuum, which our enemies might move in to fill? They will do just the opposite. The treaties will increase our Nation's influence in this hemisphere, will help to reduce any mistrust and disagreement, and they will remove a major source of anti-American feeling.

The new agreement has already provided vivid proof to the people of this hemisphere that a new era of friendship and cooperation is beginning and that what they regard as the last remnant of alleged American colonialism is being removed.

Last fall, I met individually with the leaders of 18 countries in this hemisphere. Between the United States and Latin America there is already a new sense of equality, a new sense of trust and mutual respect that exists because of the Panama Canal treaties. This opens up a fine opportunity for us in good will, trade, jobs, exports, and political cooperation.

If the treaties should be rejected, this would all be lost, and disappointment and despair among our good neighbors and traditional friends would be severe.

In the peaceful struggle against alien ideologies like communism, these treaties are a step in the right direction. Nothing could strengthen our competitors and adversaries in this hemisphere more than for us to reject this agreement.

What if a new sea-level canal should be needed in the future? This question has been studied over and over throughout this century, from before the time the canal was built up through the last few years. Every study has reached the same conclusion—that the best place to build a sea-level canal is in Panama.

The treaties say that if we want to build such a canal, we will build it in Panama, and if any canal is to be built in Panama, that we, the United States, will have the right to participate in the project.

This is a clear benefit to us, for it ensures that, say, 10 or 20 years from now, no unfriendly but wealthy power will be able to purchase the right to build a sea-level canal, to bypass the existing canal, perhaps leaving that other nation in control of the only usable waterway across the isthmus.

Are we paying Panama to take the canal? We are not. Under the new treaty, any payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the canal.

What about the present and the future stability and the capability of the Panamanian Government? Do the people of Panama themselves support the agreement?

Well, as you know, Panama and her people have been our historical allies and friends. The present leader of Panama has been in office for more than 9 years, and he heads a stable government which has encouraged the development of free enterprise in Panama. Democratic elections will be held this August to choose the members of the Panamanian Assembly, who will in turn elect a President and a Vice President by majority vote. In the past, regimes have changed in Panama, but for 75 years, no Panamanian government has ever wanted to close the canal.

Panama wants the canal open and neutral—perhaps even more than we do. The canal's continued operation is very important to us, but it is much more than that to Panama. To Panama, it's crucial. Much of her economy flows directly or indirectly from the canal. Panama would be no more likely to neglect or to close the canal than we would be to close the Interstate Highway System here in the United States.

In an open and free referendum last October, which was monitored very carefully by the United Nations, the people of Panama gave the new treaties their support.

The major threat to the canal comes not from any government of Panama, but from misguided persons who may try to fan the flames of dissatisfaction with the terms of the old treaty.

There's a final question—about the deeper meaning of the treaties themselves, to us and to Panama.

Recently, I discussed the treaties with David McCullough, author of "The Path Between the Seas," the great history of the Panama Canal. He believes that the canal is something that we built and have looked after these many years; it is "ours" in that sense, which is very different from just ownership.

So, when we talk of the canal, whether we are old, young, for or against the treaties, we are talking about very deep and elemental feelings about our own strength.

Still, we Americans want a more humane and stable world. We believe in good will and fairness, as well as strength. This agreement with Panama is something we want because we know it is right. This is not merely the surest way to protect and save the canal, it's a strong, positive act of a people who are still confident, still creative, still great.

This new partnership can become a source of national pride and self-respect in much the same way that building the canal was 75 years ago. It's the spirit in which we act that is so very important.

Theodore Roosevelt, who was President when America built the canal, saw history itself as a force, and the history of our own time and the changes it has brought would not be lost on him. He knew that change was inevitable and necessary. Change is growth. The true conservative, he once remarked, keeps his face to the future.

But if Theodore Roosevelt were to endorse the treaties, as I'm quite sure he would, it would be mainly because he could see the decision as one by which we are demonstrating the kind of great power we wish to be.

"We cannot avoid meeting great issues," Roosevelt said. "All that we can determine for ourselves is whether we shall meet them well or ill.”

The Panama Canal is a vast, heroic expression of that age-old desire to bridge the divide and to bring people closer together. This is what the treaties are all about.

We can sense what Roosevelt called “the lift toward nobler things which marks a great and generous people.”

In this historic decision, he would join us in our pride for being a great and generous people, with the national strength and wisdom to do what is right for us and what is fair to others.

Thank you very much.

National Prayer Breakfast

*Remarks at the 26th Annual Breakfast.
February 2, 1978*

You may have noticed that the chairman of this breakfast and the master of ceremonies is Senator Jim Allen of Alabama. You may have noticed that our main speaker is Max Cleland from Georgia. You may have noticed that the President is Jimmy Carter from the same State. And there may be some concern among those among you about the secret to the South’s growing influence.

I might point out one coincidental piece of evidence in that the very fine Blackwood Quartet had six members in it. I think up North a quartet still has four members. [Laughter]

It’s been a wonderful program. And it’s almost anticlimactic for anyone to try to follow Max Cleland, who in his own life and in his own words gives us a testimony of what true faith can be and the closeness of God means to us.

To me, God is real. To me, the relationship with God is a very personal thing. God is ever-present in my life—sustains me when I am weak, gives me guidance when I turn to him, and provides for me as a Christian through the life of Christ, a perfect example to emulate in my experiences with other human beings.

My wife and I worship together every night, and often during the day I turn to God in a quiet and personal way.

A few months back, the words “born again” were vividly impressed on the consciousness of many Americans who were not familiar with their meaning. They’ve been used in many headlines and on the front covers of many magazines.

But for those of us who share the Christian faith, the words “born again” have a very simple meaning—that through a personal experience, we recommit our lives as humble children of God, which makes us in the realest possible sense brothers and sisters of one another. Families are bound by the closest possible ties.

I noticed in a small news item this morning that I was chosen “Lover of the Year.” [Laughter] It concerned me very much until I read on and found that it was because my wife and I have been in love for more than 31 years, and that the exemplification of a close family life is the best expression of love.

But for a Member of Congress, for a Governor, for an executive officer who cares for hundreds of thousands of veterans of war, for the Commanding General of the United States Marines, for foreign dignitaries, and for a President, the word “family” has a broader meaning—the family of all human beings and how we might alleviate world tensions and hatred and misunderstandings and death and suffering and loneliness and alienation through a common understanding and a common purpose and, sometimes, even a common belief.

A few weeks ago, I was in India. As part of my preparation for meeting with Indian leaders, I read the Bhagavad-Gita and later visited the site where Mahatma Gandhi's body was cremated and thought about his simple, deeply committed life, his knowledge of Christianity and Judaism, his worship of God, the simplicity and humility and sensitivity of his life. And I felt a kinship with him and a kinship of the Indian leaders who have not always been our friends in recent years. And as I talked to Prime Minister Desai, this was a common thread that ran through the conversations between us—how we shared something.

Last year, at a relatively small supper at the White House, Crown Prince Fahd from Saudi Arabia, when asked a question by a member of the group, a Member of Congress—how will Saudi Arabia with its tremendous growing wealth deal with the needs of its own people and hold together as a community?—gave one of the most eloquent impromptu speeches I have ever heard about how a common religious faith and their responsibility to hold together the interest in the holy places of Islam gave him confidence in the future and guidance on how his own life should be expended in the service of others.

I met with Prime Minister Begin twice during this past year and hope to see him again soon when he comes to our country. I like him, admire him, and respect him, because throughout his conversations with me in the quiet, lonely, private times together, and even when he talks with others in a larger group, there's a fervor of a deeply committed, religious man who again worships the same God I do and you do.

I felt an instant friendship with President Sadat. And in his messages to me and in my talks with him, he never fails to point out that the Egyptians and the Jews are sons of Abraham, worship the same

God, share a common heritage and a common faith, and that this is a transcendent thing, quite often forgotten, but still there; that it doesn't change.

And in our own search for peace and good will, in spite of setbacks and criticisms and sometimes the undertaking of tasks that are not easily performed, I have a sense of confidence that if we emphasize and reinforce those ties of mutual faith and our subservience and humility before God and an acquiescence in his deeply sought guidance, that we can prevail.

The leaders of our Nation look with a great deal of concern over the past experiences when kings and princesses had tied themselves to God, to the church, sometimes even in an exalted position relative to God, and had cloaked maladministration and injustice in the protection of the church. So, in our Constitution, we carefully prescribed that there should be no establishment of religion in this country.

So, we worship freely. But that does not mean that leaders of our Nation and the people of our Nation are not called upon to worship, because those who wrote the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights and our Constitution did it under the aegis of, the guidance of, with a full belief in God.

In our rapidly changing world, we need to cling to things that don't change—to truth and justice, to fairness, to brotherhood, to love, and to faith. And through prayer, I believe that we can find those things. I don't think that's overly optimistic. And when Judge Sirica, one of the great men of all times in our country, referred to Solomon, I thought about the time described in the First Book of Kings, I believe, when God said to Solomon, "What do you want from me?" And Solomon said, "Give Thy servant an understanding mind to govern your people, that I might discern between good and evil." And God said, "That's such a fine prayer that I will not only grant you wisdom, but I will grant you the other blessings of life as well."

Almost everyone in this room is a leader, trusted by others, looked up to by others, respected by others, influential among others. And I pray that that doesn't give us a sense of pride or exaltation or a sense of self-satisfaction, but that it gives us a sense of humility and that we turn to God through prayer, so that we might better serve those who have placed their faith in us as we place our faith in God.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:23 a.m. in the International Ballroom at the Washington Hilton Hotel. The annual event is sponsored by the United States Senate and House prayer breakfast groups.

White House Conference on Balanced National Growth and Economic Development

Conference. February 2, 1978*

The first thing I would like to do is to thank and to congratulate Chairman Jay Rockefeller and Juanita Kreps, Senator Jennings Randolph, representing the Congress, the leaders of the discussion groups, and all of the 500 participants who have earned unanimous congratulations and accolades from everyone who has expressed an opinion to me about this Conference.

It's an easy thing to have a conference concerning planning, growth, economic development, and have it be either so controversial that its purposes are lost, or so sterile that its function comes to no avail. You've avoided that.

I stand here as President of the greatest country on Earth, with a background in meetings of this kind. It's been an integral part of my life, beginning at the local level of government, going up to the White House.

My first responsibility was to be the chairman and the organizer of an eight-county planning and development group in deep southwest Georgia, at that time the West Central Georgia Planning Commission. I dealt with those rural counties and with 30 small towns, the largest of which was about 12,000, the smallest of which was less than a hundred.

They were almost as diverse in nature and in need, in motivation or spirit, as the wide range represented here. And to give them a chance to communicate and to deal with common problems and to finally discern the mutuality of purpose was an inspiration to me.

We later organized the Georgian Planning Association. I was the first president of it, when I didn't hold public office, and I learned then throughout my own State how deeply committed people were to the need for dealing with change. Change has come to the South and the many parts of our Nation with a confrontation, reluctance, fear, but then an acknowledgement of the inevitability of it and a realization of the benefits to be derived from it.

I decided to run for Governor, and my first act was to organize what I called Goals for Georgia. We had meetings throughout the State, open meetings whereby citizens could come and register their complaints against the State government, their frustrations and their animosities, their disappointments and their hopes and dreams and suggestions, some of which were quite beneficial. And we put together in a clear and concise book what Georgia hoped to accomplish in the future—5, 10, 15, sometimes even 25 years. And almost every decision I made in my 4 years as Governor was predicated on and derived from those specific and coordinated plans, without regimentation, but with a degree of consistency.

I was a chairman of the Coastal Plains Regional Commission, a Federal commission under the Commerce Department. I was chairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission. I was chairman of the Southern Regional Education Board, an organizer and the chairman of a long meeting during which we derived a report called "The Future of the South."

So, I've been involved in this kind of discussion from the grassroots up to the White House, and I've seen the potentialities of it, the benefits of it to me, and particularly the benefits of those who meet here as leaders in your own right.

I know the dangers of leadership. My wife went to a meeting the other day of a group responsible for the future of the District of Columbia, nongovernmental in nature. Brock Adams was the speaker, and he described the potential achievement of someone who dealt with things like metropolitan transit systems and housing programs. He said they're like the achievement was a one-car funeral. [Laughter]

Well, this can be the rewards of failure, but there is also a tremendous reward of searching for a better way of life.

This has been a conference brought together through a good process that began when Congress passed a law and has evolved over months and months of careful preparation, 150 meetings or so in all 50 States, where people brought their ideas to you and then eventually you brought them here to us. Local governments, State governments, the Federal Government—as President I represent all those constituencies. And I've had a chance to see the inevitable conflicts among them.

The thing that concerns me most is the isolation of governmental processes and dealing with laws, the administration of them, from the human realities of failure. My wife, Rosalynn, my son Chip, and other members of my family will be dealing directly with the extragovernmental efforts to keep me constantly aware of human problems in the most personal sense.

This process here has been interesting, because I've noticed, as you've made your report, an attempt to define the relationship between the local and State and Federal governments. As you know, the original constitutional processes derived from the States themselves the power that the present Federal Government has, as changed by law and custom, as interpreted by the courts. But the fact is that the original founders of our Nation saw very clearly that the first evidence of problems derived from changing times would be discerned not here in Washington, but at the local and State levels of government. And that's the way it has been.

Environmental conflicts with economic growth were first evident in the local communities when citizens complained about filthy water and air not good to breathe and a fouled landscape. And local officials tried to deal with this in town halls and county courthouses, and eventually the pattern spread until it reached the State governments. And in a fumbling, sometimes mistaken way, but in a well-meaning way, environmental laws were fashioned State by State, and then it became obvious that when one State had strict environmental laws and an additional State had weak environmental laws, that industry began to go to the State with the weak laws. And problems there were exacerbated even further. And eventually the Federal Government had to provide some kind of uniformity and guideline so that on a nationwide basis, environmental laws could be fair and fruitful and equitable.

This is a pattern that has always prevailed. It prevailed with civil rights. It prevailed with no-fault automobile insurance and many other things where the local people detect a problem, deal with it as best they can. And eventually, if the problem is so severe or so widespread, the Federal Government gets involved. And then the administration of the laws passed in Washington goes back down, quite often administered with insensitivity because there's not a close, working, constant relationship at the different levels of government and with our private citizens.

It's easy to cast blame. It's cowardly to cast blame. It's fruitless to cast blame from the private sector to government, or vice versa, from local to national government, or vice versa, because a conference like this demonstrates vividly that we share not only the problems but the responsibility for their resolution. And it's good to point out that it can be a part of our democratic process to work in harmony.

The facts are almost overwhelming in their complexity, and quite often facts dispute one another, and to discern the truth is not easy. And to correlate the close, sometimes microscopic, observation of a problem which is quite accurate in a person's life or a community's life with a need for fairness and uniformity on a nationwide or international basis is a difficult process indeed. And that's what you can offer to me here, because coming from all 50 States and the territories, commonwealths of our country, you can bring in your long, I'm sure tedious, but interesting and exciting discussions an awareness of the common ground on which we can resolve our problems.

My own background and education is in science, in engineering, where there's a constant search for change, for improvement, for what is absolutely required to look years into the future to see the meaning of the discovery of atomic power, its use for destruction, its use for the benefit of human beings. These kinds of consequences of present action are not easy to predict, but it's important that we try. And the same thing happens in government.

Quite often government acts late, only as a response to crisis, only after human suffering has become widespread, when an early detection of a problem and a close working relationship might very well let government at all levels act to prevent crises. It is not nearly so dramatic, there are not nearly so many headlines, but the accomplishments therein are gratifying indeed.

I appreciated very much the reports that were made to me verbally and very briefly, and we will study throughout our own administration, and I'm sure the Congress will do the same, the detailed reports, the debates on both sides of issues, the conclusions that you've reached, the recommendations that you make. I want to be sure that this is a continuing process.

I listened very carefully to Dean Ylvisaker, who talked about local economics, local economy, interdependence, and the involvement of both business and the non-profit institutions. This is where I've seen a real need for my wife to serve—she's eager to do it—with constant access to me, without the constraints of government responsibilities, a real knowledge of this country, having lived in Hawaii, having lived in New York, Connecticut, Virginia, having lived in California and Georgia, and now here, having traveled in all the States. Our family has a personal knowledge of our country, and I want to tap that ability and make sure that I as President, and she as a member of the family, exemplify how the private sector of our country, both profit and nonprofit, can be welded together with government.

Most of the initiative for solving a deteriorating neighborhood must come from the people who live there, or who are directly concerned about the quality of life there. The local government, the State government can move in to help with better police protection, garbage collection, water supplies, education. The Federal Government with its major programs, giving their authority as much as possible to local people, can provide the finances and the guidance that's needed. This is very important.

Miss Dixon pointed out the human aspect of inadequate planning and unbalanced economic growth and perhaps an insensitive government.

We had a major achievement last year with an increase of more than 4 million Americans who found jobs, a net increase over a million—the highest proportion of Americans employed in the history of our country. We've never seen that kind of improvement since the Second World War. But we still have 30, 35, 40 percent unemployment among our young black males.

And now, the need for us to focus attention on basic civil rights, basic human rights, in providing an escape from a wasted life should press very heavily on all of us. It's a devastating concept to me that a young person, 16, 17, 18 years old, could spend the first few years of an adult life excluded from a fruitful part in society, with a growing sense of personal failure and alienation, a deepening sense of frustration and anger. And the responsibility rests on people like us who have been blessed with social prominence, political, economic responsibilities, and of blessings of a highly materialistic life.

We've not yet been successful in correlating a highly expensive, sometimes very effective education training program with a need for the graduates to serve.

We've seen a shift from rural areas into urban areas, from urban areas into suburban areas; now a growing concern about the deteriorating central cities, a trend to move back toward the rural and Sunbelt areas. But in all that process, certain people in our society, partially of course because of deliberate or callous discrimination—constantly suffering.

Charlotte Williams discovered and discussed the very serious question of budgets, wherein priorities are set and goals are defined. I noticed that there was a great deal of applause when there was a mention of any of the reporters that we shift the financial burden to Washington and shift responsibility away from Washington. [Laughter] And I didn't hear any applause on the other side. But we're all in it together. You're part of the Federal Government, too.

But I know that the decisions made on the delineation of those responsibilities are made here in Washington. And I listened with great care to that recommendation.

Ed Bishop, whom I've known for a long time, talked about geography, of growth, the need for freedom, which is one of the most precious possessions of our society—the right of people themselves to make a decision where they want to live and the inevitability of trends that we don't discern and can't control, and the inadvisability of the Federal Government trying to discipline a society based on individual free choice.

Competition between States, competition between communities, competition within the business and professional community is not bad. It's part of a free enterprise system. It's part of a democracy.

But in that competition, again the human factor can never be forgotten.

Phyllis Lanphere, who did a good job, I thought, with her new southern accent—[laughter]—pointed out the need for us to understand future growth and economic development, because with the evolution of new technologies, a shift away from manufacturing toward an increased employment in providing human services, a change from one part of the country to another, in different forms and rates of growth, a comprehension of those future trends is very important to us all.

We live in a time of impending crisis, when almost unlimited national and natural resources are being observed and understood as limited. And how to accommodate that change is going to be a challenge to us all.

And finally, Chancellor Norton pointed out the need for streamlining government to make it more efficient, more effective, better organized, more easily understood regulations, uniformity of standards. This is a goal that we've espoused with great fervor in our administration. And I've had the chancellors of universities and the presidents in, and I've said, "You give me a list of all the reports and forms that have to be filled out for HEW and the ones you think can be made not at all, the monthly reports that might be made annually, the five-page reports that might be limited to five lines. Be specific about it, and we'll change it."

I told the same thing to the representatives of the American Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Association of Businessmen, the State School Superintendents, to be specific in their recommendation for specific improvements, and we'll do it.

We set a goal last year for cutting down paperwork. In HEW alone, not even counting the other agencies of Government, they exceeded the goal by 50 percent. We've set new goals this year. So, we are trying.

The Congress has given me authority to reorganize the Federal Government, and we are trying. And we need your help, and we need your support. And I notice with care the word "decentralization." And I agree completely with that concept.

Let me say in closing that your work will not be in vain. There have been too many reports compiled by well-meaning and competent conferees and planners which have never been read nor used. We are determined that the work that you've done this week will bear rich fruits.

Juanita Kreps, all my Cabinet, the White House staff, I'm sure the Congress appreciates what you have done. And I believe that as a result of your work, we'll have an even greater nation, bound closer together, with a much more effective potential in life for the people about whom we all care so deeply—those that are not here this morning but whom we try with increasing dedication to represent well.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:40 a.m. in the Sheraton Hall at the Sheraton-Park Hotel. In his opening remarks, he referred to Gov. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, Chairman of the Conference's Advisory Committee, Secretary of Commerce Juanita M. Kreps, and Senator Jennings Randolph of West Virginia.

Prior to the President's remarks, reports were presented on major theme areas considered by the Conference participants by workshop chairpersons Paul N. Ylvisaker, dean of graduate education of Harvard University, Ortense Dixon, vice president of Texas Southern University, Charlotte Williams, Genesee County (Mich.) Commissioner, Charles E. Bishop, president of the University of Arkansas, Phyllis Lanphere, member of the Seattle, Wash., city council, and James A. Norton, chancellor of higher education for the State of Ohio.

New York City

Statement Following a Meeting With Mayor Edward I. Koch. February 2, 1978

I was pleased to meet with Mayor Koch today to discuss New York City's current fiscal condition and its recently developed budget and financing plans to cover the next 4 years.

Mayor Koch is an able and courageous man whose administration shows great promise in its early days. He has a series of difficult decisions to make. We both share a commitment, which I believe reflects the expectation of the Congress, that he will make those decisions in a way that will restore New York to a sound financial footing.

I assured him of my commitment to preserve New York City's solvency. This administration recognizes that New York is the nerve center of some of the most important activities in this country, and I reiterate that bankruptcy is not an acceptable solution to its problems.

I reminded Mayor Koch that my commitment to find a financial solution for the city has always presumed a maximum effort by all the local parties with an interest in the city's future—the State, the financial community, the city and State pension funds, the labor unions. I am certain that the Congress would not approve a Federal financing role, or other assistance, on any other basis.

For these reasons, I have asked Secretary Blumenthal to discuss with all of these parties what they can do. Once I am satisfied that they all will do their part, I will work hard to persuade the Congress to enact a bill that will end the financial uncertainty in New York.

United States Ambassador to Greece

Nomination of Robert J. McCloskey. February 3, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Robert J. McCloskey of Chevy Chase, Md., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Greece. He would replace Jack B. Kubisch, resigned.

McCloskey was born November 25, 1922, in Philadelphia, Pa. He received a B.S. from Temple University in 1953. He served in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1942 to 1945.

McCloskey was a public information specialist at the State Department from 1958 to 1964, and director of the Office of News from 1964 to 1966. From 1966 to 1969, he was Deputy Assistant Secretary for the Bureau of Public Affairs.

From 1969 to 1973, McCloskey was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Press Relations and Special Assistant to the Secretary of State. He was Ambassador to Cyprus in 1973 and 1974. In 1975 and 1976, he was Ambassador at Large and Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations. Since 1976 he has been Ambassador to the Netherlands.

Department of Energy

Executive Order 12038. February 3, 1978

RELATING TO CERTAIN FUNCTIONS TRANSFERRED TO THE SECRETARY OF ENERGY BY THE DEPARTMENT OF EN-ERGY ORGANIZATION ACT

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States of America, in order to reflect the responsibilities of the Secretary of Energy for the performance of certain functions previously vested in other officers of the United States by direction of the President and subsequently transferred to the Secretary of Energy pursuant to the Department of Energy Organization Act (91 Stat. 565; 42 U.S.C. 7101 et seq.), it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Functions of the Federal Energy Administration. In accordance with the transfer of all functions vested by law in the Federal Energy Administration, or the Administrator thereof, to the Secretary of Energy pursuant to Section 301(a) of the Department of Energy Organization Act, hereinafter referred to as the Act, the Executive Orders and Proclamations referred to in this Section, which conferred authority or responsibility upon the Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration, are amended as follows:

(a) Executive Order No. 11647, as amended, relating to Federal Regional Councils, is further amended by deleting "The Federal Energy Administration" in Section 1(a)(10) and substituting "The Department of Energy", and by deleting "The Deputy Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration" in Section 3(a)(10) and substituting "The Deputy Secretary of Energy".

(b) Executive Order No. 11790 of June 25, 1974, relating to the Federal Energy Administration Act of 1974, is amended by deleting "Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration" and "Administrator" wherever they appear in Sections 1 through 6 and substituting "Secretary of Energy" and "Secretary", respectively, and by deleting Sections 7 through 10.

(c) Executive Order No. 11912, as amended, relating to energy policy and conservation, and Proclamation No. 3279, as amended, relating to imports of petroleum and petroleum products, are further amended by deleting "Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration", "Federal Energy Administration", and "Administrator" (when used in reference to the Federal Energy Administration) wherever those terms appear and by substituting "Secretary of Energy", "Department of Energy", and "Secretary", respectively, and by deleting "and the Administrator of Energy Research and Development" in Section 1(b) of Executive Order No. 11912, as amended.

SEC. 2. Functions of the Federal Power Commission. In accordance with the transfer of functions vested in the Federal Power Commission to the Secretary of Energy pursuant to Section 301(b) of the Act, the Executive Orders referred to in this Section, which conferred authority or responsibility upon the Federal Power Commission, or Chairman thereof, are amended or modified as follows:

(a) Executive Order No. 10485 of September 3, 1953, relating to certain facilities at the borders of the United States is amended by deleting Section 2 thereof, and by deleting "Federal Power Commission" and "Commission" wherever those terms appear in Sections 1, 3 and 4 of such Order and substituting for each "Secretary of Energy".

(b) Executive Order No. 11969 of February 2, 1977, relating to the administration of the Emergency Natural Gas Act of 1977, is hereby amended by deleting the second sentence in Section 1, by deleting "the Secretary of the Interior, the Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration, other members of the Federal Power Commission and" in Section 2, and by deleting "Chairman of the Federal Power Commission" and "Chairman" wherever those terms appear and substituting therefor "Secretary of Energy" and "Secretary", respectively.

(c) Paragraph (2) of Section 3 of Executive Order No. 11331, as amended, relating to the Pacific Northwest River Basins Commission, is hereby amended by deleting "from each of the following Federal departments and agencies" and substituting therefor "to be appointed by the head of each of the following Executive agencies", by deleting "Federal Power Commission" and substituting therefor "Department of Energy", and by deleting "such member to be appointed by the head of each department or independent agency he represents,".

SEC. 3. Functions of the Secretary of the Interior. In accordance with the transfer of certain functions vested in the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of Energy pursuant to Section 302 of the Act, the Executive Orders referred to in this Section, which conferred authority or responsibility on the Secretary of the Interior, are amended or modified as follows:

(a) Sections 1 and 4 of Executive Order No. 8526 of August 27, 1940, relating to functions of the Bonneville Power Administration, are hereby amended by substituting "Secretary of Energy" for "Secretary of the Interior", by adding "of the Interior" after "Secretary" in Sections 2 and 3, and by adding "and the Secretary of Energy," after "the Secretary of the Interior" wherever the latter term appears in Section 5.

(b) Executive Order No. 11177 of September 16, 1964, relating to the Columbia River Treaty, is amended by deleting "Secretary of the Interior" and "Department of the Interior" wherever those terms appear and substituting therefor "Secretary of Energy" and "Department of Energy", respectively.

SEC. 4. Functions of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Energy Research and Development Administration.

(a) In accordance with the transfer of all functions vested by law in the Administrator of Energy Research and Development to the Secretary of Energy pursuant to Section 301(a) of the Act, the Executive Orders referred to in this Section are amended or modified as follows:

(1) All current Executive Orders which refer to functions of the Atomic Energy Commission, including Executive Order No. 10127, as amended; Executive Order No. 10865, as amended; Executive Order No. 10899 of December 9, 1960; Executive Order No. 11057 of December 18, 1962; Executive Order No. 11477 of August 7, 1969; Executive Order No. 11752 of December 17, 1973; and Executive Order No. 11761 of January 17, 1974 are modified to provide that all such functions shall be exercised by (1) the Secretary of Energy to the extent consistent with the functions of the Atomic Energy Commission that were transferred to the Administrator of Energy Research and Development pursuant to the Energy Organization Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-438; 88 Stat. 1233), and (2) the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to the extent consistent with the functions of the Atomic Energy Commission that were transferred to the Commission by the Energy Reorganization Act of 1974.

(2) Executive Order No. 11652, as amended, relating to the classification of national security matters, is further amended by substituting "Department of Energy" for "Energy Research and Development Administration" in Sections 2(A), 7(A) and 8 and by deleting "Federal Power Commission" in Section 2(B) (3).

(3) Executive Order No. 11902 of February 2, 1976, relating to export licensing policy for nuclear materials and equipment, is amended by substituting "the Secretary of Energy" for "the Administrator of the United States Energy Research and Development Administration, hereinafter referred to as the Administrator" in Section 1(b) and for the "Administrator" in Sections 2 and 3.

(4) Executive Order No. 11905, as amended, relating to foreign intelligence activities, is further amended by deleting "Energy Research and Development Administration", "Administrator of the Energy Research and Development Administration", and "ERDA" wherever those terms appear and substituting "Department of Energy", "Secretary of Energy", and "DOE" respectively.

(5) Section 3(2) of each of the following Executive Orders is amended by substituting "Department of Energy" for "Energy Research and Development Administration":

(i) Executive Order No. 11345, as amended, establishing the Great Lakes River Basin Commission.

(ii) Executive Order No. 11371, as amended, establishing the New England River Basin Commission.

(iii) Executive Order No. 11578, as amended, establishing the Ohio River Basin Commission.

(iv) Executive Order No. 11658, as amended, establishing the Missouri River Basin Commission.

(v) Executive Order No. 11659, as amended, establishing the Mississippi River Basin Commission.

SEC. 5. Special Provisions Relating to Emergency Preparedness and Mobilization Functions.

(a) Executive Order No. 10480, as amended, is further amended by adding thereto the following new Sections:

"Sec. 609. Effective October 1, 1977, the Secretary of Energy shall exercise all authority and discharge all responsibility herein delegated to or conferred upon (a) the Atomic Energy Commission, and (b) with respect to petroleum, gas, solid fuels and electric power, upon the Secretary of the Interior.

"Sec. 610. Whenever the Administrator of General Services believes that the functions of an Executive agency have been modified pursuant to law in such manner as to require the amendment of any Executive order which relates to the assignment of emergency preparedness functions or the administration of mobilization programs, he shall promptly submit any proposals for the amendment of such Executive orders to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget in accordance with the provisions of Executive Order No. 11030, as amended."

(b) Executive Order No. 11490, as amended, is further amended by adding thereto the following new section:

"Sec. 3016. Effective October 1, 1977, the Secretary of Energy shall exercise all authority and discharge all responsibility herein delegated to or conferred upon (a) the Federal Power Commission, (b) the Energy Research and Development Administration, and (c) with respect to electric power, petroleum, gas and solid fuels, upon the Department of the Interior."

SEC. 6. This Order shall be effective as of October 1, 1977, the effective date of the Department of Energy Organization Act pursuant to the provisions of Section 901 thereof and Executive Order No. 12009 of September 13, 1977, and all actions taken by the Secretary of Energy on or after October 1, 1977, which are consistent with the foregoing provisions are entitled to full force and effect.

Visit of President Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt

Remarks on the Arrival of the Egyptian President. February 3, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. It's a great pleasure for me, on behalf of the American people, and also personally, to welcome to our country Mrs. Sadat, President Sadat, and his colleagues from Egypt.

Just a month ago I spent a brief time with President Sadat in Aswan in Egypt. And in the brief time we were together, we recommitted ourselves to a continuing personal friendship and also to a common commitment for a just and a lasting peace in the Middle East.

President Sadat has won the admiration of the entire world for his courageous and innovative and historic visit to Jerusalem in the cause of peace. That trip, perhaps more than any other single event that has happened in recent Middle East history, has helped to remove the distrust and lack of communication and the psychological barriers that have divided Israel from her Arab neighbors.

During their talks in Jerusalem, President Sadat and Prime Minister Begin made a historic pledge to one another: no more war. This promise reflected the deep hope and the heartfelt and frustrated dreams of the people of Egypt and the people of Israel and others in the Middle East for peace. This is a sentiment that's also shared by the American people. It's now up to all of us, President Sadat, Prime Minister Begin, other interested leaders, and also the people of the United States, to rededicate our efforts to these goals.

We, ourselves, will spare no effort in the search for peace. I think it's accurate to say that we have the confidence of the people of Egypt and Israel, Jordan, Syria, and others, and we will not betray that trust.

Obviously, the first responsibility is for direct negotiations between the leaders involved in the Middle East. But I've committed our own country to a continuing active role in support of those negotiations for an overall peace settlement, and I want to reconfirm and recommit our Nation today.

President Sadat and I, in just a few minutes, will leave for Camp David, and there we will have an opportunity, for the next couple of days, to discuss at length the best way to maintain and even to enhance the momentum that has already been established in the search for peace. He and I will also discuss other issues of mutual interest to the United States and to Egypt, such as the dangerous situation in the Horn of Africa.

President Sadat arrives in our country today as a friend, as a statesman whose courage and devotion to peace is deeply admired by the people of the United States, and as a leader with whom it is a privilege to work in a common dedication to end the long and tragic history of conflict that has existed in the Middle East.

President Sadat, you are welcome to our country.

PRESIDENT SADAT. Dear friend President Carter, Mrs. Carter, thank you for your warm reception and sincere words. It is always a pleasure to meet with you and to pursue our joint effort for peace. I am bringing to you and to every American heartfelt greetings from 40 million Egyptians and many other Arabs who join us in a solemn prayer for the success of our endeavor.

I came here in a continuation of my sacred mission for peace. I believe that we share a great responsibility to make life more meaningful and rewarding.

No other nation is more qualified to play this role as a contributor to world stability and prosperity. The values that are deeply ingrained in the heart and conscience of the American people can be the arbiter between right and wrong and differentiate between the just and unjust.

Like you, my dear friend, we believe in human rights and respect for the dignity of man. Like you, my dear friend, we cherish our land and sacrifice our lives to defend it against any encroachment.

Like you, my dear friend, we believe in the inherent right of self-determination for all peoples in different parts of the globe. First and foremost, we share a firm commitment to the cause of peace.

Dear friend, I am certain that you agree with me that this is the time for a concerted effort for building a solid structure for peace. We are now at a historic and crucial crossroad.

Since I undertook my mission to Jerusalem, against all odds, events have proven that the great ideal of peace is unfortunately fragile and vulnerable. We have to remedy this situation. We must fortify the structure of peace and reinforce the faith of hundreds of millions in the validity of the notion that peace is not only necessary but also possible.

We should never allow ideological rigidity or fanaticism to endanger this march on the road to peace.

My dear friend, since you assumed office, you demonstrated your genuine commitment to the cause of peace. You have been truthful and forthcoming. Your approach, which emphasized morality and legitimacy, caught the imagination of millions in the Arab world. We sincerely hope that your efforts bear fruit for the sake of all the peoples in our area.

I look forward to the talks we will have in the coming few days. I am sure they will boost the momentum for peace and give a new impetus to our search for a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

We want to put an end to wars and bloodshed. We want every people to be free and secure within its own land. We want to create a new Middle East, where nations, including the Palestinians, live together in harmony and fraternity. We want to purge all souls of prejudice and hatred. And, God willing, we shall overcome.

Thank you, Mr. President.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5 p.m. on the South Lawn of the White House. Following their remarks, President Carter and President Sadat and their wives departed for Camp David, Md.

Visit of President Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt

*Remarks on Returning to the White House From Camp David, Maryland.
February 5, 1978*

President Sadat and his wife, Jihan, I and my wife, Rosalynn, and our family, have had a very enjoyable 2 days at Camp David. During this time, President Sadat and I have had a chance to spend hours together discussing the relationships between our two countries and our renewed commitment to achieve a peaceful settlement of the differences that exist in the Middle East.

Yesterday afternoon, the Vice President, Secretary of State, and the distinguished leaders who accompanied President Sadat here from Egypt met with us for a more thorough discussion of all the issues that I've described so briefly.

During the rest of this week, President Sadat will be meeting with congressional leaders. He'll be making a speech tomorrow to the National Press Club and will be meeting with me again. And on Wednesday, when he departs, I will have a much more definitive statement to make about the results of our meeting.

We have thoroughly enjoyed being together. There is complete agreement between him and me about our determination to work, without ceasing, to bring peace to the Middle East. And we had a thorough discussion of other bilateral relationships concerning us in the Horn of Africa and other places around the world.

It's been a very enjoyable experience, President Sadat. And I look forward to seeing you again on Wednesday, after you've had this chance to meet with our officials and our Congress.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:45 p.m. on the South Lawn of the White House.

Visit of President Sadat of Egypt

White House Statement Issued Following Meetings. February 5, 1978

President Sadat and President Carter have completed 2 days of extensive talks at Camp David in which they considered carefully the further steps necessary to achieve a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East. They were joined for part of their talks on Saturday on the Egyptian side by His Excellency Sayed Marei, Speaker, People's Assembly; His Excellency Hassan Ahmed Kamel, Director, Office of the President; His Excellency Mohamed Ibrahim Kamel, Minister of Foreign Affairs; His Excellency Ashraf Ghorbal, Ambassador of the Arab Republic of Egypt; and Mr. Ahmed Maheral-Sayed, Director of the Foreign Minister's Cabinet; and on the American side by Vice President Mondale; Secretary of State Cyrus Vance; Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, National Security Adviser to the President; Ambassador Hermann Eilts, U.S. Ambassador to Egypt; Assistant Secretary Alfred L. Atherton; and William Quandt, member of the National Security Council staff.

President Carter reaffirmed his conviction that the events set in train by President Sadat's initiative in going to Jerusalem have, after decades of conflict, opened the prospect of real peace in the Middle East. The two Presidents are agreed that no obstacles must be allowed to prevent the achievement of a just and lasting settlement. They believe that an important beginning has been made in breaking through the psychological barriers to peace between Arabs and Israelis and that unremitting efforts must continue to overcome the remaining legacy of mistrust resulting from 30 years of conflict. Recognizing the overriding importance of peace to the future of the Middle East and its peoples, they stressed the importance of maintaining the negotiating momentum generated over the past few months. Both Presidents recognized that their efforts in the cause of peace will be of fundamental importance not only for the immediate future but for generations to come. Their overriding conviction is that a peaceful solution must be found to spare the people of the Middle East the agony of another war.

As a result of their extensive talks, President Carter feels that he has a better understanding of President Sadat's concerns about the need for the peace process to move forward without delay. He also took the occasion of these talks to explain in detail to President Sadat how the United States envisages its role and responsibilities in the peace process as a friend of both sides with a strong interest in peace and stability in the region. President Carter reaffirmed the commitment of the United States to play an active role in the search for peace and to redouble its efforts to ensure that progress is made in the weeks ahead.

In the course of their long discussions, President Sadat and President Carter reviewed the reasons for the slow pace of progress and the factors which have hampered the achievement of substantive agreement. They found themselves in accord that efforts should remain focused on creating conditions which are conducive to the achievement of tangible results and the broadening of negotiations, looking toward the realization of a comprehensive settlement. To this end, the two Presidents examined ways in which these objectives can be accomplished. They will further refine their views in the exchanges between their representatives over the next few days, as well as in their final meeting on Wednesday.

As part of their effort to continue the peace process, the two Presidents agreed that Assistant Secretary Atherton should return to the area in the near future to continue the work that has been under way, looking toward completion of a declaration of principles. They view such a declaration as an important step in establishing the framework for comprehensive peace in the area.

The two Presidents also discussed other issues of mutual concern to Egypt and the United States, such as the dangerous situation in the Horn of Africa.

Both President Sadat and President Carter expressed their satisfaction that the Camp David meetings had provided the opportunity for such thorough and fruitful examination of all aspects of the Middle East problem and had created a basis of mutual understanding and agreement for the continuing cooperation of their two governments in the search for peace.

National Poison Prevention Week, 1978

Proclamation 4550. February 6, 1978

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

When stored safely and used properly, products such as medicines, polishes, solvents and pesticides can make our lives easier.

But many of these products contain toxic ingredients which, when used or stored carelessly, can find their way into the hands of our children. Although special packaging has reduced dramatically the number of incidents each year, household substances still poison many children. Therefore, the theme of this year's National Poison Prevention Week is: "Children Act Fast—So Do Poisons."

To remind all Americans of the dangers of poisonings and to encourage all of us to eliminate this problem, the Congress, by joint resolution of September 26, 1961 (75 Stat. 681, 36 U.S.C. 165) has requested the President to issue annually a proclamation designating the third week in March as National Poison Prevention Week.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the week beginning March 19, 1978, as National Poison Prevention Week. I call upon the people of the United States and all agencies and organizations concerned with the prevention of poisoning and the welfare of our Nation's youngsters to join in promoting increased awareness of, and better protection against, the dangers of poisoning.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this sixth day of February, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Reception Honoring Polish Americans

Remarks at the White House Reception. February 6, 1978

First of all, let me say that Rosalynn and I are very delighted to have all of you come. In our desire to make you feel at home and arrange some Warsaw weather, I'm afraid we cut the size of the crowd down too much—[laughter]—but it is beautiful outside, and it's just as pleasant and pure and friendly as it was when we left the wonderful country of Poland.

As you noticed from the photographs outside, we had a delightful and, I think, a very fruitful visit. Rosalynn and Dr. Brzezinski had a long meeting with Cardinal Wyszynski. It was a very inspiring report that I got back from my wife. I don't think any First Family members had had a chance to meet with him from the Western nations. And it was very important to us as Christians to recognize the overwhelming influence of the Christian Church in Poland.

Later, when I talked to First Secretary Gierek, I told him that I congratulated him on going to visit Cardinal Wyszynski just recently. I told him to visit him often and we had not given up yet on converting him to Christianity. I told him it was never too late for him to have the same faith as we. [Laughter]

He and I got along well. And I thought that the Polish Government, who could have done otherwise, made it easy for us to reach literally millions of people in Poland through the fully broadcast news conference, which was unprecedented, and almost all of the news reporters were permitted to come. I commented publicly on the ones that weren't permitted to come, and I answered their written questions later for them.

It was truly an inspiring thing for me. And with a few variations in the interpretation that went out to the Polish people—[laughter—the written transcript of the interview, which was a freewheeling, open press conference, went verbatim in the major Polish news media throughout the land. So, I thought it was an excellent opportunity for us to communicate freely with them.

I was overwhelmed with the response of the Polish people when we discussed the historic ties that have long bound our countries together. As a southerner from Georgia, my own earliest studies of both Georgia and United States history have included in a major way the reports of the great heroism and dedication of Kosciuszko and Pulaski. My own son Chip's wife is from Pulaski County in Georgia, named in honor of the Polish patriot who helped us win our independence. And we discussed quite freely, both with people whom we met on the streets and those who were servants in the beautiful mansion we stayed and those in the government, the common effort that we had made in the world wars, when Poland was so nearly destroyed.

I have heard from a child about the devastation of the War Between the States that afflicted my own grandparents and some of yours. But I have never seen a nation which had been so terribly damaged by war as Poland.

We learned about the history of Warsaw and the heroism of the people there and the courage in rebuilding that beautiful city. And we saw the small portion of the visual treasures of ancient Poland that had been preserved, and we were thankful to have a chance to see that beautiful display of Polish art.

We had also an opportunity to learn at first hand about the relative freedom that the Polish people have to worship, and I commented on it publicly because I think it's a precious thing. We have many very fine Polish Americans in our Nation who have occupied positions of great importance. And you have honored us by coming here this evening.

I have decided to ask Danny Rostenkowski and Senator Muskie and Senator Robert Byrd, all of whom have contacted me about it, to introduce a special bill to authorize Mrs. Eddie Slovik to receive her insurance payments from the last war.

I had a letter earlier from the Polish American Society asking me to do this. And I have inquired with the Attorney General and with the Secretary of Defense—it's not legal for me to authorize these payments. So, there will be a special bill introduced in Congress which I will support. And Senator Byrd, the majority leader in the Senate, Congressman Rostenkowski, Congressman Rangel have already expressed their eagerness to see this introduced in the House, and I hope it will pass without delay.

I would like to say in closing that this is an opportunity for us to reassert the appreciation in our country for those historic ties between Poland and our Nation. We are tied together militarily through a long series of wars which we hope will never come again. We are tied together politically in generations past, and we still have strong friendships of trade and hope for the future in Poland now. And we are tied together culturally, and I think perhaps most importantly of all, we are tied together through blood kinship.

There are millions of Polish Americans here. I have gotten varying reports on how many millions. [Laughter] I was cautioned before I went there to be conservative in my estimates so that I wouldn't claim too much. When I was with First Secretary Gierek, the first thing I said was there are 8 million Americans of Polish descent. He said, "No, that's not right. There are at least 12 or 14 million." So I didn't argue with him. [Laughter]

But I think you know that this is a very important thing to cherish. And during the campaign, I was permitted to visit many communities in our Nation which have a heavy concentration of Americans of Polish descent. Dr. Brzezinski, who was in the receiving line, is very close to me, and the man who's had the most effect on my life, other than my own father, Admiral Hyman Rickover, as you know, is also from Poland.

I would like to make one other comment, just as a matter of interest.

We are all impressed by the beautiful musical heritage of Poland. And many of our great performers who have moved here are from Poland, the great composers. As we sat in the ballroom the evening of the state banquet, we listened with great care to the quality of the American National Anthem that was being played by the orchestra there. And we were in many other countries, but by far, the outstanding performance, the most perfect rendition of the Star-Spangled Banner, we heard in Poland. And it was with a sense of great appreciation that I told First Secretary Gierek about the high quality of this performance, and Dr. Brzezinski did not argue with me when I pointed out that this was the best performance. [Laughter]

We have a performance scheduled for you in a few minutes. The pianist, whom my wife will introduce later and whom I won't, is 80 years old. He has been at the Washington train station. It took the White House car an hour to get there. He's on the way here. So, if you don't mind until he gets here, Rosalynn and I would like to come out and just be with you for a few minutes to let you know that we cherish your presence here in our home, which is also your home.

Thank you very much.

[At this point, the reception guests sang a traditional Polish song of greeting. The President then resumed speaking.]

When Rosalynn and I laid a wreath at the Nike Monument and we walked back to the streets, the Polish Government had not publicized our presence there, to hold down the crowd. But there was a great crowd. And when we walked back, they sang that to me.

So, I just waded into the crowd and shook hands—[laughter]—because it made me feel at home. And once we did stop at a corner at Dr. Brzezinski's suggestion, just unannounced. And I got out of the car, and I was just absolutely swept up by heartfelt embraces and handshakes, and the Secret Service, who were trying to protect me, and the Polish police were not able to hold the crowd back. So, finally I got back in the car, opened the top, and I stood on top of the car and shook hands with them. [Laughter]

But it was a great reception. And I think the friendship that exists in Poland for our country is absolutely unshakable and permanent, and we have the same feeling toward Poland.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:32 p.m. at the reception held for Polish American leaders of business, labor, educational, civic, and religious organizations in the East Room at the White House. Following his remarks, concert pianist Mieczyslaw Horszowski performed at the reception.

Legislation for the Relief of Antoinette Slovik

Announcement of the President's Support for the Legislation. February 6, 1978

President Carter today informed leaders of several Polish American groups that he supports legislation pending in Congress to provide relief to Mrs. Antoinette Slovik, the widow of Private Eddie Slovik. Private Slovik was the only member of the Armed Forces executed for desertion during World War II.

The President's decision in no way condones the act of desertion. Rather it is a response to the unique nature of the situation and to Mrs. Slovik's personal plight. This case differs from all others, including those in which servicemen died by causes other than execution while in desertion status. The President does not believe that special legislation would be appropriate in such other cases.

The President reached his decision following a personal appeal from Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd and after the Justice Department advised that the President has no independent authority to assist Mrs. Slovik. The White House requested Justice's views following last year's determination by the Department of the Army that Private Slovik's punishment had been lawfully imposed.

Congressman Rangel has introduced in the House the legislation which the President supports. The bill would grant Mrs. Slovik an amount equal to the proceeds of her husband's National Service Life Insurance Policy, plus interest—a total of $70,000. Present law prohibits the granting of such benefits to the survivors of servicemen who die following desertion or who are lawfully executed. The bill has not yet been introduced in the Senate.

Red Cross Month, 1978

Proclamation 4551. February 7, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

The American Red Cross is serving the needs of the American people now, as it has served them for nearly a century. Although its programs and services have grown in scope as well as in size over the years, the relief of human suffering remains its fundamental purpose. Throughout its proud history, its spirit of volunteerism has been the source of its strength.

It is the Red Cross volunteer—our neighbor—who helps ease the suffering of disaster victims; who teaches us first aid, water safety, and proper care of the ill and injured; who instills in our young people those qualities of leadership that will mean so much to this Nation in later years; who donates the blood that gives renewed life to the sick; and who comes to the assistance of the men and women of our armed forces, and to veterans and their families.

March has traditionally been observed as Red Cross Month. It is a time for concerned people to address their thoughts to those qualities of compassion, understanding and selflessness which identify the Red Cross spirit of volunteerism.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America and Honorary Chairman of the American National Red Cross, do hereby designate March 1978, as Red Cross Month. I urge all Americans to give generous support to the work of their local Red Cross chapter.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this seventh day of February, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

JIMMY CARTER

Red Cross Month, 1978

*Memorandum From the President.
February 7, 1978*

Memorandum for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies

I have again proclaimed March as Red Cross Month to remind all Americans of the myriad services the American Red Cross provides each day in communities across the nation.

During the past year, as disaster after disaster disrupted lives and brought destruction to widespread areas of the nation, Red Cross volunteers helped ease the suffering of their neighbors. The Red Cross Blood Program expanded last year to play an even more important role in our daily lives by providing life-saving and life-sustaining blood and blood products to more and more ill and injured Americans. Through Red Cross nursing, first aid, water and boating safety instruction, we have the opportunity to train ourselves to care for the infirm.

Finally, our men and women in the Armed Forces, veterans and their families look to the Red Cross for help in coping with their emergency problems.

The Red Cross is a vital part of America. I urge all civilian employees of the Federal Government and members of the Armed Forces to support this essential effort through voluntary services, donation of blood and financial support in their home communities.

National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration

Nomination of James P. Walsh To Be Deputy Administrator. February 7, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate James P. Walsh, of Washington, D.C., to be Deputy Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. He would replace Howard W. Pollock, resigned.

Walsh was born December 28, 1944, in North Bend, Oreg. He received an A.B. from Stanford University in 1967, and a J.D. (1970) and LL.M. (1971) from the University of Washington.

In 1971 and 1972, Walsh was assistant attorney general of the State of Washington, where his duties included serving as counsel to the Oceanographic Commission of Washington. From 1972 to 1977, he was staff counsel to the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee and counsel to the Senate Ocean Policy Study.

Since 1977 Walsh has been general counsel of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation and director of the National Ocean Policy Study.

Walsh is a member of the Law of the Sea Advisory Committee at the State Department. He has attended several international conferences on the law of the sea.

United States Ambassador to Fiji

*Nomination of John P. Condon.
February 7, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate John P. Condon, of Tulsa, Okla., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Dominion of Fiji. He would replace Armistead I. Selden, Jr., who has resigned.

Condon was born August 6, 1920, in Tulsa. He received an M.A. from Columbia University in 1950 and an LL.D. from the University of Athens in 1942.

Condon was officer in charge of labor relations for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in Casablanca from 1951 to 1954 and international labor officer for the Air Force in Germany from 1954 to 1960. In 1961 and 1962, he was labor attaché in Tunis.

From 1962 to 1964, Condon was regional labor attaché for North Africa, and from 1964 to 1966, he was labor attaché in Saigon. He took Arabic language training in 1966-67 and was Middle East labor attaché from 1967 to 1970.

From 1970 to 1977, Condon was counselor for labor affairs in Paris. Since 1977 he has been on detail as a faculty adviser at the Industrial College of the Armed Forces at Fort McNair.

Democratic Study Group

Remarks at a Dinner Honoring Speaker of the House of Representatives Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. February 7, 1978

Thank you, everybody. Fortunately for me, I couldn't hear the introduction. [Laughter]

When I was invited to come tonight to be with the Democratic Study Group, I was told it was a roast for Tip O'Neill. I never knew what a roast was until I came to Washington—[laughter]—and began to read about myself every day in the newspapers. [Laughter] I had something of a preview from Mo Udall in the Michigan primary—[laughter]—and I should have known what to expect.

I really tried to think of some criticism or some funny things to say about Tip O'Neill. But his being the Speaker and such a close friend of mine, and our having such an intimate political relationship and my revering him so much, it was impossible for me to think about anything except—[laughter]—serious matters.

When I first was elected and was preparing for the transition phase between November and January, I set up what we called the Talent Inventory Program, the TIP program. And in January, when I was packing to come to Washington, I discovered that the Speaker's name was Tip O'Neill. [Laughter]

I found also that we had a lot in common. We both have an Irish background. His family was in the potato business in Ireland, and my folks came about 50 years before him as a result of the great peanut famine. [Laughter]

But in honor of Tip, we decided to let our Talent Inventory Program pick out the first two people from Massachusetts. One was Evan Dobelle, who became the protocol officer; the other one was Elliot

Richardson. [Laughter] Tip called up to discuss this matter with me and—[laughter]—he really gave me the highest compliment I've ever had. He said I had done more for the Republicans in Massachusetts than anybody since Richard Nixon. [Laughter] And he said that because I was new in Washington, that he wanted to reward me for honoring his State as I had already done—[laughter]—by making my first two appointments Republicans from Massachusetts.

You probably wouldn't know it by the way we've performed, but there were some of us that didn't know much about Washington when we got here. [Laughter] A few of us didn't even know where Pennsylvania Street was. [Laughter]

So, Tip got a Harvard professor to help some of our staff. He gave Hamilton Jordan some advice on diplomatic manners and how to dress. [Laughter] And Tip wanted to give me some personal advice, because I had had trouble, as you know, in some of the States during the general election. He wanted to teach me how to win political favor in the West. And we decided between us that the water projects was the best thing to undertake. [Laughter] We really have worked on this all year. And we've benefited greatly from Tip's friendship and help. [Laughter]

When I was at my lowest point this past summer during the Bert Lance hearings, Tip revived all our spirits by giving us some good information on air travel by Senator Charles Percy. [Laughter] And it really put us back on top of the thing there for a few days. Bert Lance was off the front page for a while; Jody Powell got on the front page. [Laughter] Tip, I want to thank you for that help.

We also have been very eager to have a good legislative achievement last year. And when the adjournment time came the first week in October, Tip wanted to make sure that I understood how to deal with the Congress effectively as we approached the conferences on energy. He said one of the main things I ought to do is to return Congressmen's telephone calls in a hurry. And the first one I got was from Philadelphia. [Laughter]

I hate to be overly modest, but most of my successes this past year, as you can see, I can attribute to my friendship with—[laughter]—the Speaker.

It hasn't been just political help. It hasn't been just advice and counsel on personal habits for my staff or inside information on the ways of Washington. Tip and I and our families have also formed a very close personal relation.

Tip and Millie came to the White House to eat supper with us on a couple of occasions, and we have some very cherished pictures of Tip holding my grandson in his lap. Later I was introduced to Millie's brother-in-law, who happened to be an unemployed Polish interpreter. [Laughter]

I've become deeply indebted to Tip O'Neill. [Laughter] My hope is that in the months ahead, Tip, I can repay you for all the kindnesses that you have shown us. [Laughter]

I would like to say in closing that in one's lifetime it's a very rare occasion when you have a chance to meet someone who is a delightful companion; someone who knows the political history of our Nation and who has the deepest and most sincere reverence for our Constitution and for the Capitol and for the White House and those who have served in it; someone who exemplifies in an enjoyable and effective way the finest elements of democratic politics; someone about whom in a period of years even in the quietness of private conversations you would never hear a word of criticism; someone who has a sense of humor and an appreciation for human beings; someone who is sensitive about others; someone who epitomizes the essence of what we all believe the Democratic Party is; and someone who can make the masculine reference to love be sincerely meaningful; and someone who in such a short time can become one's closest friend—and that's the way I feel about Tip O'Neill.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:10 p.m. in the Sheraton Hall at the Sheraton-Park Hotel.

The transcript of the remarks was released on February 8.

Financial Assistance for Higher Education

Remarks Announcing the Administration Proposal. February 8, 1978

This morning I and the Secretary of HEW, Joe Califano, and several of the key leaders of Congress have a very important announcement to make.

Today the cost of sending a son or daughter to college is an increasingly serious burden on America's low- and middle-income families. From 1967 to 1976, in just a 10-year period, the cost of college education increased 77 percent. This year the average bill for tuition, room, and board in a private college is more than $4,800, and at a typical public university a student would have to pay $2,500 per year for education-related costs.

Increasingly, middle-income families, not just the lower income families, are being stretched to their financial limits by these new and growing costs of a university or college education. No one should be denied the opportunity for a college education for financial reasons alone. And our Nation has long recognized our obligation to help lower income families in this educational area.

Now we must increasingly take steps to help middle-income families as well. This is why I am proposing and announcing today a $1.46 billion increase in the assistance that the Federal Government provides to help with these growing costs, bringing our total student assistance budget to $5.2 billion for fiscal year 1979. We are proposing additional scholarship grants, more part-time jobs for students, and more loans, primarily focused on students from moderate- and middle-income families.

About $900 million will provide tuition grants to students from families with incomes up to $25,000; $70 million will provide expanded eligibility for guaranteed loans for families in the $16,000 to $45,000 income range; and $150 million to provide part-time jobs to college students.

We estimate that more than 5 million college students nationwide will receive financial assistance from the Federal Government in fiscal year 1979, an increase of at least 2 million students over the current year.

The coordinated program that I am proposing, using grants, work study, and loans, will provide more real help than any tax credit and is a far more equitable and efficient way to help middle-income families with tuition and other college costs.

Tuition tax credits would provide benefits to those who do not need them and almost certainly would cost more than the carefully targeted measures that we are proposing today.

Congress must choose between tuition tax credits and the far more beneficial increases in Federal student assistance programs that I am requesting. This Nation cannot afford—and I will not accept—both.

Secretary Califano and I have worked very closely with congressional leaders in developing this program. Senators Williams, Pell, and Representatives Perkins, Biaggi, Ford, Brademas, and Thompson have cooperated fully with us, along with many others. They support this program and will help to move it rapidly through the Congress.

Now, Secretary Califano and the Members of Congress will explain in more detail this program and would be glad to answer your questions.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:05 a.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House. Following his remarks, Secretary Califano and the Congressmen held a news conference on the proposed legislation.

American Heart Month, 1978

Remarks on Presenting the Proclamation to Representatives of the American Heart Association. February 8, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. This is, I think, one of the most important things that the American people have to address, and I would personally like to congratulate the American Heart Association and also the Heart, Lung and Blood Institute for the tremendous work you've done.

I think it's your 30th anniversary. And I notice that, in looking at the statistics before you came in, that since 1973, we've had a substantially, I think, well-established decrease in deaths resulting from heart disease and stroke, which is primarily because of the good work you're doing in educating people on what we need to do in simple things: regular medical check-ups, good diet—watch the salt intake—and get exercise. I'm very proud of that.

We've initiated, when I was Governor of Georgia, what we called the Cripplers and Killers Analysis. And we tried to do simple things like just getting people to have the blood pressure checked and detect potential stroke victims. And as a part of that work, we've seen the death rate and the stroke rate in Georgia go down substantially, too.

I want to keep the trend going down and I'm eager to help you. But I'm very proud of what work you have done and are doing and am proud as President to associate myself with the efforts that you've undertaken and are doing so well. And I will pledge my support in every possible way.

And now I'll give you a copy of the American Heart Month proclamation and hope that all American people will join in with you to protect themselves. I understand that heart diseases are now still our most severe cause of death. In fact, about half the people die because of heart afflictions of some sort. It's very important work, and the progress has been, I think, profound.

DR. WILLIAM AUSTEN [president, American Heart Association]. Speaking for the scientific community, we not only want to thank you but we're very grateful for your help in this cause. And we are, I think, very pleased that you spent a little time with us and say these things. We look forward to working on these things in the years ahead.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, Dr. Press reminds me frequently about my need to improve the commitment to basic research and also to promote programs like yours that have proven themselves to be effective. You've got a substantial recommendation of the Congress for increases in basic research funds which have been kind of dormant for too long.

I have a slight scientific background, not very much, but I feel like I'm part of the community.

DR. AUSTEN. Well, we're very pleased about that, too, because we saw your strong statement about an increase in terms of basic research and your wish to have that happen, which we agree with very much.

THE PRESIDENT. Good luck to you.

DR. AUSTEN. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12:15 p.m. in the Oval Office at the White House. In his remarks, he referred to Frank Press, Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy.

For the text of Proclamation 4546, designating February as American Heart Month, see page 89 of this volume.

Visit of President Sadat of Egypt

Remarks on the Departure of the Egyptian President. February 8, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. It has been a great personal pleasure for me and Rosalynn to have President Sadat and his beautiful wife, Jihan, and all their fine family with us in our country for the last few days.

My talks with President Sadat for many hours has given me a clear concept of his own concerns at this important moment in the peace process. We both share a determination to reach peace in the Middle East. And we've agreed to work closely and personally together to realize this goal.

I explained to President Sadat and he well understands the deep commitment of the United States to the security of Israel. And he shares this commitment that Israel will be secure. We also discussed at length the need to continue the negotiating process, even with temporary disappointments and delays, to achieve a just and a lasting and a comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

In helping the parties to find solutions to the problems that separate them, the United States will be guided by the need to base a settlement on the full implementation of the principles of United Nations Resolution 242 on all the fronts. We also believe that a just solution to the Palestinian question is essential.

President Sadat and I have agreed to stay in close contact with one another in the weeks ahead, as we continue the search for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East. As we continue down that path, we recognize that the way is difficult. But we take inspiration from a vision of what can be, of the goal that we both seek, and we understand clearly the importance of the stakes that we see involved in this search for peace.

If we can succeed in this endeavor, there will be a peace for an area that has long known only war or the threat of war; prosperity for a people whose wealth has been too long allocated to weapons; water and fertilizer and hard, productive labor in lands and fields that have been made barren by war or the threat of war, by man and by nature; a new life for children whose future can be dominated by hope and life, rather than by conflict and fear of death.

This is a vision that we share. There is no nobler calling on this Earth than the seeking for peace. For it is that reason which caused the Bible to say that peacemakers shall be called the sons of God.

I'm honored to be with the world's foremost peacemaker, President Sadat, and to share with him a partnership in this worthy endeavor.

President Sadat, Jihan, and your family, you have been welcomed here by me and all the people of our country. We admire you deeply, and we know that with your help and with your persistent cooperation, you, we, the Israelis, and others in the Middle East can find what we all search for so deeply, and that is permanent peace in that troubled part of the world.

PRESIDENT SADAT. My dear friend, President Carter, Mrs. Carter, we have spent really a very charming weekend together in Camp David—President Carter, Rosalynn, me, and Jihan. And to be frank, I must tell you this: I was elated when I received the invitation from President Carter to visit with him here in such a precise moment like we were in. And I came disheartened, discouraged.

We had long talks in Camp David, and then after that, we have completed it in Washington, here in the house with Secretary Vance. And I must tell you this before I leave: I shall return today back to my country with much more perseverance for reaching peace through the efforts that we have started together, the United States and Egypt since November '73, and which by God's will, we shall attain all our targets in the establishment of peace, permanent peace in the area.

We have agreed together, President Carter and me, to keep in close contact like we have been before; and let me tell you this again: I must express my deep gratitude to President Carter, Rosalynn, and to all the American people for the very warm welcome and hospitality and generosity that was accorded to us.

And I promise you, the American people whom I was always and shall be proud of the sentiments that they have shown towards me, let me say this to them, I shall never fail you. Like I told my friend, President Carter, I shall never fail you.

May God protect you. May God protect my dear friend, President Carter, Rosalynn, and his family.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:22 p.m. on the South Lawn of the White House.

Visit of President Sadat of Egypt

*White House Statement on the Final Meeting.
February 8, 1978*

President Carter and President Sadat had a final meeting this afternoon.

President Carter and President Sadat continued their talks today in the same spirit of friendship and openness which characterized their stay together at Camp David over the weekend. The hours they have spent together, both alone and with their advisers, have provided the essential opportunity both sought for a relaxed and thorough review of the Middle East situation. They have concluded that the mutual trust and understanding between them, which were reinforced by these meetings, will be extremely useful in helping to maintain momentum toward their common goal of peace in the Middle East.

During the course of their meetings over the past 5 days, President Carter reaffirmed to President Sadat the broad principles which underlie United States participation in the search for that peace:

—The United States will remain faithful to its historic commitments to the security of Israel and to the right of every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries.

—Helping the parties achieve a negotiated comprehensive settlement of the Middle East conflict remains of highest importance in American policy, and President Carter will spare no effort in seeking ways to move the peace process forward.

—A peace settlement must go beyond the mere termination of belligerency. It must provide for the establishment of normal peaceful relations between Israel and its neighbors.

—The peace settlement should be comprehensive and should be embodied in peace treaties between Israel and each of its neighbors.

—The settlement must be based on all the principles of Security Council Resolution 242, including withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in 1967 and the right of every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries. Resolution 242 is applicable to all fronts of the conflict.

—There can be no just and lasting peace without resolution of the Palestinian problem.

The President reaffirmed what he said at his meeting with President Sadat in Aswan January 4: There must be a resolution of the Palestinian problem in all its aspects; it must recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and enable the Palestinians to participate in the determination of their own future.

President Carter also reaffirmed the longstanding United States view that Israeli settlements in occupied territory are contrary to international law and an obstacle to peace, and that further settlement activity would be inconsistent with the effort to reach a peace settlement.

President Sadat affirmed that the door remains open to negotiations and that Egypt will continue to do its part to assure continuity in this negotiating process in an atmosphere conducive to tangible progress.

The two Presidents also spent some time reviewing the current situation in the Horn of Africa and agreed that continuing conflict and instability there are of concern to them both. President Carter and President Sadat have agreed to consult with other countries on this matter.

Finally, the two Presidents committed themselves to remain in close personal touch through direct correspondence and diplomatic channels. In this way they are determined to ensure continuing, full understanding between them both in the peace process and in bilateral relations between Egypt and the United States.

Commissioner of Patents and Trademarks

*Nomination of Donald W. Banner.
February 8, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Donald W. Banner, of Aurora, Ill., to be Commissioner of Patents and Trademarks. He would replace C. Marshall Dann, resigned.

Banner was born February 23, 1924, in Chicago. He received a B.S. from Purdue University in 1948, a J.D. from the University of Detroit in 1952, and a Master of Patent Laws degree from John Marshall Law School in 1958.

Banner has been with Borg-Warner Corp. since 1953 and has been general patent counsel there since 1964. He is responsible for all matters relating to patents, trademarks, copyrights, and licensing and technology exchange agreements.

Banner is president-elect of the American Patent Law Association and vice president of the International Patent and Trademark Association.

Grain Set-Aside and Reserve Programs

Announcement of Approval of the Agricultural Programs. February 8, 1978

The President today made final a 10-percent feed grain set-aside program for 1978 and increased the storage payment for the farmer-owner grain reserve program. He urged farmers to make maximum use of those two farm programs.

Approval of both program actions was recommended to the President by Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland.

"Farmers have the tools at hand to raise grain prices," the President said. "By participating in the set-aside programs, they help cut the oversupplies that are currently holding down prices. By putting their grain in the reserve program, they will remove excess supplies from the market until farm prices rise. I urge farmers to take full advantage of these opportunities to improve prices."

The President said that storage payments for grains held in the farmer-owned reserve program would be increased from 20 cents to 25 cents per bushel per year for the major grains. Farmers now storing grain in the reserve will be offered new contracts to reflect the 25-cent rate.

"We hope that this higher storage payment will encourage greater use of the farmer-controlled reserve program," the President said. "Our goal is to have 30 to 35 million tons of food and feed grain in reserve prior to the beginning of the 1978 crop year.

"If our farmers use this program, it will have a positive impact on prices, which are now too low, and will, at the same time, assure foreign buyers that we will be a reliable supplier of grain."

The President also said that Secretary Bergland has under consideration other actions that could be taken to improve farm prices and income.

Signup for the 1978 set-aside programs will begin March 1 and will be conducted through May 1 in the Department of Agriculture's Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) county offices.

International Atomic Energy Agency

*Message to the Senate Transmitting an Agreement on Nuclear Safeguards.
February 9, 1978*

To the Senate of the United States:

I submit herewith, for Senate advice and consent to ratification, the Agreement between the United States of America and the International Atomic Energy Agency ("Agency") for the Application of Safeguards in the United States of America, with attached Protocol, approved by the Board of Governors of the Agency on September 17, 1976. This Agreement provides for application of Agency safeguards to nuclear facilities in the United States, other than those having direct national security significance. The Agreement will enter into force when the United States notifies the Agency that its constitutional and statutory requirements for entry into force have been met.

The United States, as a nuclear weapons state party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons ("NPT"), is not obligated to accept Agency safeguards on its peaceful nuclear activities. On December 2, 1967, President Johnson offered to place United States nuclear facilities, except those with direct national security significance, under Agency safeguards in an effort to demonstrate that the application of those safeguards would not work to any nation's commercial disadvantage. Specifically, President Johnson stated:

“... I want to make it clear to the world that we in the United States are not asking any country to accept safeguards that we are unwilling to accept ourselves.

So I am, today, announcing that when such safeguards are applied under the treaty, the United States will permit the International Atomic Energy Agency to apply its safeguards to all nuclear activities in the United States—excluding only those with direct national security significance.

Under this offer the Agency will be able to inspect a broad range of U.S. nuclear activities, both governmental and private, including the fuel in nuclear power reactors owned by utilities for generating electricity, and the fabrication, and chemical reprocessing of such fuel . . .”

Over the next ten years, both Presidents Nixon and Ford reaffirmed that offer.

I also transmit, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State concerning the Agreement.

Universal participation in the NPT is a central goal of our non-proliferation policy. The entry into force of this Agreement would encourage that participation, and would fulfill our long-standing commitment to accept safeguards. I urge the Senate to act favorably on this Agreement at an early date and give its advice and consent to ratification.

International Atomic Energy Agency

*Announcement of Transmittal to the Senate of a Nuclear Safeguards Agreement.
February 9, 1978*

President Carter today fulfilled a 10-year United States pledge for nuclear safeguards by submitting to the Senate for ratification a treaty with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). The treaty would make all U.S. nuclear facilities, except those with direct national security significance, eligible for the application of safeguards by this international agency.

Under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), the 99 nonnuclear weapon member states are required to accept IAEA safeguards on all of their peaceful nuclear facilities. While the NPT does not impose this duty on nuclear weapon states, the United States voluntary offer to enter into such a safeguards agreement has been extremely important in inducing other nations to adhere to the treaty. United States willingness to accept the same safeguards as the NPT requires for nonnuclear weapon states is tangible evidence of our belief that the NPT does not discriminate against nonnuclear weapon states. It also demonstrates the U.S. conviction that the application of international safeguards neither hampers the development of nuclear power nor puts the safeguarded party at a commercial disadvantage.

This offer by the United States to bring its nuclear facilities not having direct national security significance under international safeguards was first made on December 2, 1967, by President Lyndon Johnson. It has been endorsed by all succeeding administrations.

Upon entry into force, this treaty will be an additional signal to the world, including both nuclear supplier and recipient nations, of our continuing support for the universal application of IAEA safeguards, and our desire that all nations adhere to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

The safeguards call for inventory and design information to be submitted to the IAEA. The Agency's fundamental safeguards measure is the accounting of nuclear materials. The U.S. will submit to the Agency accounting reports on nuclear materials subject to safeguards.

*Nomination of Robert M. Sayre.
February 9, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Robert M. Sayre, of Falls Church, Va., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Brazil. He would replace John H. Crimmins, resigned.

Sayre was born August 18, 1924, in Hillsboro, Oreg. He received a B.A. from Willamette University in 1949, an M.A. from Stanford University in 1960, and a J.D. from the George Washington University in 1956. He served in the U.S. Army from 1942 to 1946.

Sayre began his Government career in 1949 in the State Department's intern program, then served as an international economist. From 1957 to 1960, he was

United States Ambassador to Cyprus

*Nomination of Galen L. Stone.
February 9, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Galen L. Stone, of Washington, D.C., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Republic of Cyprus. He would replace William R. Crawford, Jr., resigned.

Stone was born July 4, 1921, in Brookline, Mass. He received a B.S. from Harvard University in 1946. He served in the U.S. Army from 1942 to 1946.

Stone joined the Foreign Service in 1947 and served as an economic officer and political officer in various posts. In 1962 and 1963, he was Deputy Director of the Office of West European Affairs, and from 1963 to 1965, he was detailed to the Imperial Defence College in London. From 1965 to 1968, he was counselor of political-economic affairs in New Delhi.

In 1968 and 1969, Stone was chief of the political section in Saigon. He was deputy chief of mission in New Delhi from 1969 to 1973 and in Paris from 1973 to 1976. Since 1976 he has been Deputy Representative of the United States to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

United Nations Children's Fund

*Appointment of James P. Grant as U.S. Representative on the Executive Board.
February 9, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of James P. Grant, of Washington, D.C., as U.S. Representative on the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund. He replaces Michael N. Scelsi, resigned.

Grant is president and chief executive officer of the Overseas Development Council in Washington.

He was born May 12, 1922, in Peking, China. He received an A.B. from the University of California at Berkeley in 1943 and an LL.B. from Harvard Law School in 1951. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943 to 1945.

Grant practiced law from 1951 to 1954. He was regional legal counsel for the Mutual Security Agency in New Delhi from 1954 to 1956, and director of the U.S. Mission of the International Cooperation Administration in Ceylon from 1956 to 1958. From 1958 to 1962, he was Deputy Director for Program Planning of the International Cooperation Administration.

From 1962 to 1964, Grant was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian affairs. From 1964 to 1967, he was Director of the U.S. Mission of AID in Turkey, and from 1967 to 1969, he was Assistant Administrator of AID. Since 1969 he has been president of the Overseas Development Council.

National Education Association

February 10, 1978*

Well, I feel like I'm among friends.

It's a great honor for me and for my family to have you here in the White House. It's a place where you belong, and it belongs to you. Every one of the Presidents since George Washington have lived here. And the problems and opportunities faced by us have been exactly the ones that were faced on a much more personal and daily basis by the teachers of our Nation for the last 200 years.

There's an inherent partnership between those who serve in government at all levels and those who teach our students, both young and old.

I'm very delighted that the NEA chose to take an active role in politics—[laughter]—at that very propitious time. I felt at that moment that Fritz Mondale and I had formed an alliance or a friendship and a sense of mutual trust that would stand us in good stead as we deal with national problems. And I hope that as we progress through our own administration, that that realization might grow in your mind if you have friends here in the White House as well.

We do have a good program going. Our emphasis this year will be on basic educational quality, and we're trying in a special way to make opportunities available for high school graduates to go on to college.

I've just increased the proposed allocation of funds for education, which brings the increase in 1 year above 15 percent to about 20 percent. We want this trend to continue.

My own background, as many of you know, before I got involved in elective politics, was in the administration of the public school system. I've been dedicated to it.

We started our married life and had our second son born in Hawaii. So I wear the beautiful flowers with pride. And we've always had our sons and our daughter in the public schools.

When I first found that I would be moving to Washington, Rosalynn and I had some very sincere and quiet talks between us about Amy's own education. We had heard bad reports about the public school system in the District of Columbia. But I felt rather than move away from the schools, that we ought to get ourselves more deeply involved in the public school system, thinking at that time that there might be some sacrifice on the part of Amy to demonstrate the First Family's interest and commitment to the public school system.

That has not been the case. It has not been a sacrifice. I think Amy has benefited greatly from what she has derived in the public school system in the District. And I hope that our own involvement in it now and in the future will help to strengthen the interest of parents in the public school system throughout the country.

We have learned a lot in this first year. We had never lived nor served in Washington. I had never been part of the Federal Government at all, except as a naval officer. And I think the progress has already been very good. And I hope that you, in the experience of the 1976 election campaign and also in your experiences in politics at the State level, will not narrowly restrict your interests just to matters that relate to schoolteachers or school programs or even students, because the thrust of our Nation, what it stands for, what it is, what it can be, is your responsibility, not only as a private citizen but also, I think, as one who helps to mold opinion.

You're respected not only as individual teachers and administrators but also because you have a position of leadership among your own peer group. And I hope that you'll be vigorous and forceful when you take on a project in helping to shape our country for the better. I trust your judgment. I've learned since I've been in Washington that sometimes the interest groups can be very selfish. But my own experience with you is that your motives are basically the same as mine. And that's a compliment, I think, to me when I say it, not a compliment to you.

We have a group of good Members of Congress. I think their commitment to education is superb. I've gotten to know those leaders very well in recent months.

I hope that you would help me, for instance, with the Panama Canal treaties. This is a matter where the Nation's public posture is at stake. It's a pure example of a bipartisan approach to a difficult political issue but a crucial issue involving statesmanship.

And many of the Members of the Senate tell me privately that they know that it's a right and a proper and decent thing to do, but they are fearful about the political consequences at home. And I think if they knew with a personal letter from you or even an organizational expression that you would give them your support and appreciation, it would help me in that crucial issue.

There are many others where the interest of our own country might very well be at stake that I hope that you will help me.

I would like to say in closing that I believe that we need and I believe that we will get a separate department of education. This is a matter that I considered very carefully before I promised your officers before the election that I would do.

Since I've been in the White House, I've had the need for this separate department impressed even more vividly on my mind. When I was Governor for 4 years, I would guess at least 20 or 25 percent of my time was spent in dealing with issues directly related to public education at the elementary, secondary, preschool, or the college level. This is a subject that rarely arises at a Cabinet meeting of your Government in Washington.

The only time it does arise is when there's a legal question involving civil rights or the allocation of funds. And I would say that the Attorney General really has more of a problem to bring to the Cabinet meeting than does the Secretary of HEW. Joe Califano is a superb man. He's dedicated to a finer education in our country. But the point is that as long as the educational function is buried within a large department with welfare and health, I don't think that education will ever get the visibility that it deserves.

And so, my own experience, where maybe 2 or 3 percent of my time as President, even among domestic issues, is devoted to education, compared to 10 times that much as Governor, shows me that it doesn't have the visibility and the importance that it warrants in our democratic and free society.

I could talk to you a lot about our national image around the world and the need to emphasize basic human rights. But I won't emphasize those points specifically. I would like to say that I recognize in you a kind of cutting edge for social change that sometimes is quite onerous for you.

When politicians like myself have been fearful to address difficult changes in our attitudes and social structures, our educators have had to bear the brunt of criticism and have had to take courageous action.

I've seen it at first hand. And the results of your courage and your dedication and sometimes your sacrifice have been a profound benefit to our country.

I have a great admiration for you all and a great appreciation for what you have meant for our country and a great awareness and confidence in what you will mean to our country even more in the future. It's an honor to have you here.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:40 p.m. in the State Dining Room at the White House.

Federal Insurance Administrator

*Nomination of Gloria Cusumano Jimenez.
February 10, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Gloria Cusumano Jimenez, of Durham, N.C., to be Federal Insurance Administrator.

Jimenez was born July 1, 1932, in New York City. She received an LL.B. from Brooklyn Law School in 1954.

From 1955 to 1966, she practiced law in New York, and in 1965 and 1966, she also served as district aide to Congressman Richard Ottinger.

From 1968 to 1970, Jimenez was director of housing and urban programs for the North Carolina Department of Local Affairs. From 1971 to 1974, she was a housing consultant and assistant director of the Low Income Housing Development Corporation in Durham. Since 1975 she has been deputy commissioner and general counsel of the North Carolina Department of Insurance.

Federal Maritime Commission

Nomination of Leslie L. Kanuk To Be a Commissioner. February 10, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Leslie L. Kanuk, of Englewood Cliffs, N.J., to be a Federal Maritime Commissioner. She would replace Clarence Morse, whose term has expired.

Kanuk was born August 9, 1929, in New York City. She received a B.B.A. from the City College of New York in 1950, an M.B.A. from Baruch College in 1964, and a Ph. D. from the City University of New York in 1973.

Since 1967 Kanuk has been deputy chairman and professor in the Department of Marketing at Baruch College of the City University of New York. She has served on the maritime transportation research board of the National Academy of Sciences since 1975, and has served as a consultant to the U.S. Maritime Administration. She is the author of numerous articles on maritime transportation.

American Bolt, Nut, and Large Screw Industry

Memorandum From the President. February 10, 1978

Memorandum for the Special Representative for Trade Negotiations

Subject: Determination Under Section 202(a) of the Trade Act; Bolts, Nuts and Large Screws of Iron or Steel

Pursuant to section 202(b)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-618, 88 Stat. 1978), I have determined the action I will take with respect to the report of the United States International Trade Commission (USITC), transmitted to me on December 12, 1977, concerning the results of its investigation of a petition for import relief filed by the United States Fastener Manufacturing Group, the United Steel Workers of America, and the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers on behalf of the domestic industry producing iron or steel lag screws or bolts, bolts (except mine-roof bolts) and bolts and their nuts imported in the same shipment, nuts, and screws having shanks or threads over 0.24 inch in diameter, provided for in items 646.49, 646.54, 646.56, and 646.63 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States.

After considering all relevant aspects of the case, including those set forth in section 202(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, I have determined that provision of import relief is not in the national economic interest for the following reasons:

1. The USITC reported that domestic producers' shipments and exports had increased in 1976 and the first half of 1977. It also indicated that domestic producers' rates of return on sales were above the corresponding ratios for producers of all fabricated metal products and for all manufacturing corporations. Furthermore, domestic producers or their wholly owned subsidiaries imported or purchased 20-25 percent of total 1976 shipments of imported fasteners in the United States. The domestic industry, particularly firms specializing in the production of automotive fasteners, has and should continue to benefit from increased U.S. consumption of fasteners.

2. Provision of import relief would have significantly increased costs of fasteners for U.S. manufacturers who use fasteners to produce cars, machinery, equipment, and construction items. The inflationary impact of providing relief could cause unemployment in other U.S. industries, offsetting gains in fastener employment if import relief had been imposed.

3. The Department of Labor has stated that reemployment prospects for unemployed fastener workers are fair since many of these workers are located in areas with unemployment rates below the national average.

4. Provision of import relief would subject U.S. jobs in other industries to possible foreign retaliation against U.S. exports or compensation by the United States by lessening U.S. import restrictions on other products.

5. Import relief would adversely affect U.S. international economic interests, particularly in light of U.S. efforts to reduce trade barriers in the multilateral trade negotiations.

6. The appreciation of the yen during 1977 will alleviate competitive pressures from Japanese fastener exports to the United States. Imports from Japan have comprised about three-fourths of total U.S. fastener imports in recent years.

In conjunction with my decision not to provide import relief on fasteners, I have directed the Secretary of the Treasury to initiate an expedited national security investigation, under Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, of U.S. imports of bolts, nuts, and large screws. I am taking this action in light of a staff study by the Federal Preparedness Agency which indicated that domestic fastener production capability was inadequate to satisfy U.S. requirements in a national emergency. This investigation will permit assessment of U.S. national security interests as they relate specifically to bolts, nuts, and large screws; I will consider whether to take action relating to imports of these products following completion of the national security investigation.

American Bolt, Nut, and Large Screw Industry

Letter to Secretary of the Treasury

W. Michael Blumenthal. February 10, 1978

Dear Mr. Secretary:

Pursuant to Section 202(b) of the Trade Act of 1974, I have determined that provision of import relief on U.S. imports of iron or steel lag screws or bolts, bolts (except mine-roof bolts) and bolts and their nuts in the same shipment, nuts, and screws having shanks or threads over 0.24 inch in diameter, provided for in items 646.49, 646.54, 646.56, and 646.63 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS) would not be in the national economic interest.

In conjunction with my decision not to provide import relief to the domestic bolt, nut, and large screw industry, I have determined that, in light of a recent Federal Preparedness Agency (FPA) staff study which indicates that domestic fastener production capability is not adequate to satisfy wartime metal fastener requirements, further investigation of U.S. national security interests as they relate to bolts, nuts, and large screws is warranted. Accordingly, I hereby direct that you undertake an expedited national security investigation under Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 (19 USC 1862) pertaining to U.S. imports of iron or steel lag screws and bolts, bolts (except mine-roof bolts), nuts, and large screws provided for in TSUS items 646.49, 646.54, 646.56, and 646.63.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

Letter to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate Transmitting a Report. February 10, 1978

Dear Mr. Speaker: (Dear Mr. President:)

In accordance with section 203(b) (2) of the Trade Act of 1974, enclosed is a report to the Congress setting forth my determination that import relief for the U.S. bolt, nut, and large screw industry is not in the national economic interest, and explaining the reasons for my decision.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

IMPORT RELIEF ACTION

BOLTS, NUTS, AND LARGE SCREWS

As required under section 203(b) (2) of the Trade Act of 1974, I am transmitting this report to Congress setting forth the actions I will take with respect to bolts, nuts, and large screws covered by the affirmative finding on December 8, 1977, of the U.S. International Trade Commission (USITC) under section 201 (d) (1) of the Trade Act. As my action differs from that recommended by the USITC, I have included the reasons for my decision.

I have determined that import relief for the domestic nut, bolt, and large screw industry would not be in the national economic interest for the following reasons:

1. The USITC reported that domestic producers' shipments and exports had increased in 1976 and the first half of 1977. It also indicated that domestic producers' rates of return on sales were above the corresponding ratios for producers of all fabricated metal products and for all manufacturing corporations. Furthermore, domestic producers or their wholly owned subsidiaries imported or purchased 20-25 percent of total 1976 shipments of imported fasteners in the United States. The domestic industry, particularly firms specializing in the production of automotive fasteners, has and should continue to benefit from increased U.S. consumption of fasteners.

2. Provision of import relief would have significantly increased costs of fasteners for U.S. manufacturers who use fasteners to produce cars, machinery, equipment, and construction items. The inflationary impact of providing relief could cause unemployment in other U.S. industries, offsetting gains in fastener employment if import relief had been imposed.

3. The Department of Labor has stated that reemployment prospects for unemployed fastener workers are fair since many of these workers are located in areas with unemployment rates below the national average.

4. Provision of import relief would subject U.S. jobs in other industries to possible foreign retaliation against U.S. exports or compensation by the United States by lessening U.S. import restrictions on other products.

5. Import relief would adversely affect U.S. international economic interests, particularly in light of U.S. efforts to reduce trade barriers in the multilateral trade negotiations.

6. The appreciation of the yen during 1977 will alleviate competitive pressures from Japanese fastener exports to the United States. Imports from Japan have comprised about three-fourths of total U.S. fastener imports in recent years.

In conjunction with my decision not to provide import relief on fasteners, I have directed the Secretary of the Treasury to initiate an expedited national security investigation, under Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 of U.S. imports of bolts, nuts, and large screws. I am taking this action in light of a staff study by the Federal Preparedness Agency which indicated that domestic fastener production capability was inadequate to satisfy U.S. requirements in a national emergency. This investigation will permit assessment of U.S. national security interests as they relate specifically to bolts, nuts, and large screws; I will consider whether to take action relating to imports of these products following completion of the national security investigation.

Interview With the President

*Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session
With a Group of Editors and News Directors.
February 10, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, let me say that I'm very glad to have you at the White House. This has been a good experience for us to have the editors and executives from the electronic media come to visit with our Cabinet members, on occasion, the White House staff members, and with me. And in some instances, the Members of Congress have invited the individual editors to come to the Hill.

I'd like to say just a few words and then spend the time we have answering your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

This past week has been a fairly busy one for us, primarily because of the visit by President Sadat, the initiation of the Panama Canal treaty debates, and continuing efforts—not so far successful—on the energy legislation.

We have, now, the Congress ready to recess. And we'll be working this weekend for an arms package to go to the Hill concerning the Middle East. I think we have made some good progress in the last 12 months in the Middle East.

Foreign Minister Dayan is in our country now. Prime Minister Begin is in Europe. And Dayan will be meeting with Secretary of State Vance and, perhaps, with me when he gets to Washington.

Roy Atherton,<sup>1</sup> who's been chief negotiator in the Middle East, will go back within a week or so to continue the preparation of a statement of principles that might be adequate, we hope will be adequate enough, for King Hussein to come into the discussions on the West Bank, Gaza Strip, and the Palestinian question.

President Sadat has made it clear to us that there will be no signing of a separate agreement between himself and Prime Minister Begin unless the resolution that I've described on the West Bank and with the Palestinians is concluded. We have benefited greatly as a nation in seeing some progress made on the Middle East, and particularly with the new direct negotiations between Egypt and Israel.

It's a very discouraging and frustrating thing to be the intermediary or the messenger boy between a group of leaders in the Middle East who won't even speak to each other. And when you carry a message from one to another, the one who receives it doesn't like it and blames the adverse message partially on the messenger. And then when the reply gets back, there's always an allegation that the United States didn't do its best to get a favorable answer. So, it's been a very constructive thing just to get direct negotiations begun.

I think the recognition by Egypt, publicly, of Israel's right to exist, right to exist permanently, right to exist in peace, is very good. And the offer by President Sadat that if a peace treaty can be worked out, that there will be full peace and not just a cessation of belligerency, is a step in the right direction.

I think Prime Minister Begin has been very forthcoming in receiving Sadat. His proposal for self-rule on the West Bank, Gaza Strip area, as presented to us here around this table, was a step in the right direction. So, we have some hopes there that we'll be successful.

The vote on the Panama Canal treaties will be, perhaps, the most important vote that I will face during my own term of office. A loss or rejection of the treaties would be, I think, a very serious blow to our Nation's interests. This is a patently bipartisan effort. All the Joint Chiefs of Staff who were appointed by Republican Presidents, the past Republican Secretaries of State, as well as the Democratic Secretaries of State, are for it, and the business community is almost unanimously for it. It's a difficult political question.

I think the news media has done an excellent job in explaining the reasons for the treaties, arguments pro and con, effectively to the public. Last year at this time the Foreign Affairs Institute, using, I think, George Gallup, showed only 8 percent of people were for the treaties; I think 70-something were against. The rest were undecided.

And the recent Gallup poll showed that a plurality for the first time was in favor of the treaties, I think 45 to 42. That was before my fireside chat. We are interested to see whether we gained or lost support as a result of my explanation to the people.

I've enjoyed this first year in office. It's been, obviously, an exciting and challenging responsibility.

Our home life has been good and pleasant. I think one of the best things that I can do as President is to keep close relationships with the people throughout the country. So, this initiation of a series of meetings with you and others like you has been very helpful to us.

One of the interesting things has been that your questions, in my opinion, have been much more substantive and pertinent in many instances than the ones I get from the White House news correspondents, because they are encaptured here in the Washington environment and you bring a fresh and a parochial approach. And I use the word "parochial" in a positive way, because you initiate questions that haven't and wouldn't ordinarily be detected or initiated here in Washington.

I'd be glad to answer a few questions now for you.

QUESTIONS

FEDERAL DISASTER ASSISTANCE

Q. Mr. President, Ray Rosenblum from WMOA, in Marietta, Ohio. My cousin, Jay Solomon,<sup>1</sup> encouraged me to ask you this question. In view of the profound economic hardships already suffered in Ohio and the Northeast due to killer blizzards and massive snows, what do you think of expanding the statutory definition of major disasters, as opposed to the other definitions of major disasters, to permit more Federal economic assistance more rapidly to such hard-hit areas?

THE PRESIDENT. My own experience in the last number of months—we've had all kinds of disasters—has been that the present statutes are adequate. I think in the aftermath of floods or tornadoes or heavy snowstorms or extreme drought, the reports back to me, following the alleviation of suffering, have been very good.

Obviously, local business persons or homeowners or Governors or mayors who have been through that trying an experience always can accept more aid. But I think the present disaster program is adequate.

WATER AND SEWAGE PROGRAMS

Q. Mr. President, the Chicago suburbs have faced a rather severe and growing water supply crisis. They recently have been given allocations of Lake Michigan water, but the cost of financing distribution systems seems almost irresolvable by some of these communities. Are there any Federal mechanisms that they could rely on to finance these over a period of decades?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, obviously, you're familiar with the present local public works programs, the EDA programs, the CETA programs, which give help in constructive labor opportunities, and the existing water and sewage programs already and historically in existence.

We have a supplementary budget request that has been before the Congress for months, which has been held up by the repeated votes on the B-1 bomber cancellation. The Senate has voted with me on several occasions to terminate construction of the B-1 after the first four are completed, and the House is now facing another vote on this issue.

I think there's a $4½ billion program in there for water and sewage programs. And this would be an additional help. We hope that that will be resolved very quickly. Obviously, I want it resolved so that we don't waste another half a billion dollars or so building the fifth and sixth

B-1's which will never be useful to our country.

But there's an historic commitment among many Members of Congress to support the B-1 program, but that's the present holdup on additional help. But I think whenever we have expanded allocations of funds for education or for transportation or for housing, to some degree it relieves the local governments of a financial burden that they can then channel into special needs, obviously including drinking water in the Chicago area.

ALLOCATION OF FEDERAL PROGRAM FUNDS

Q. Some southern officials and southwestern officials are concerned that the so-called Sunbelt/Snowbelt controversy is going to mean fewer Federal dollars for them in the coming years—the Community Housing and Development Act of 1977, for an example. Are these fears justified, and does your administration plan to do anything to allay these fears?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think they are justified. I have taken a different philosophy from some of my predecessors in trying to concentrate Federal program funds in the most intensely needful areas. I think in the past there has been a tendency—for instance, in housing, just to use one example, where money is allocated by the Congress with the intention of helping the most destitute regions—that the money is channeled out into the more affluent suburban areas because of the higher educational level, the better organizational structure, the more effective political presentation to program administrators and, quite often, also to a better understanding of what the Federal programs offer.

So, we're trying to correct that—I wouldn't say circumvention, but that distortion of congressional intent.

The way the committee chairmanships and the voting patterns are ranged, I think there's going to be an inherent balance in the allocation formulae for Federal programs. I cannot imagine any unfairness evolving as a pattern between the Snowbelt and the Sunbelt regions. If it should develop and was detected by me, then I would move in an executive way to try to correct that.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, do you have any timetable for intervening in the coal strike, in view of the emergencies in Indiana and West Virginia?

THE PRESIDENT. No. We have helped in some way without invoking Taft-Hartley, both by the transfer of coal from excessive supply areas to those where the coal is not available, within States, and also to try to preserve peace by the use of the FBI and other Federal means.

We have encouraged the parties to continue to negotiate when they seem to be disappointed and inclined to stop their effort. And on one occasion, we asked Arnold Miller<sup>2</sup> to delay a decision for 24 hours—I think he decided 48 hours—to let there be a more careful consideration of the proposed agreement before it could be rejected out of hand.

The Taft-Hartley law gives me the authority to bring the Federal Government into the discussions only if the national security is threatened, and that point has not yet been reached. We monitor on a daily basis the reserve supplies of coal, both geographically and industry by industry.

So, I will continue to keep aware of the specific needs; transfer of coal from one point to another, now, that's already available. And we still have a fairly heavy production of coal in the nonstrike areas.

NATIONAL WATER POLICY

Q. Mr. President, Craig Lesser from Charlottesville, Virginia, formerly of Cartersville, Georgia.

THE PRESIDENT. Oh, really? Well, I'm glad to hear from you.

Q. Mr. President, I was at the seminar in Denver, where we heard about water.

THE PRESIDENT. I remember.

Q. You, at that time, I believe, said that all kinds of decisions or discussions were going to be in public. How far along the road are you on a national water policy?

THE PRESIDENT. It'll be finished within the next couple of weeks and presented to me. And then I'll assess the recommendations that are derived from the different agencies of the Federal Government—the Corps of Engineers, the Department of Interior, EPA, and others—and then I'll make a decision on it. I can't tell you yet how long it would take me to decide, but the deadline for them to present it is within a couple of weeks.

Q. How comprehensive do you anticipate that's going to be?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know yet. But I am insistent upon the fact that the Federal Government is not going to take over the responsibility for allocating water within States.

POSTAL REFORM BILL

Q. Mr. President, my name is Walter Grunfeld from Marathon, New York. I am 1 of 10,000 publishers in the weekly community field in the United States. And I'm sure that you are aware of H.R. 7700. I would like to tell you that we are wholly dependent in the weekly newspaper business on the United States mail service.

I would ask you to give the bill every consideration, and perhaps you would give us some comment on how you feel about the postal reform bill at this time.

THE PRESIDENT. My hope is that the postal reform bill as presently drafted will not get out of the Rules Committee and, if it does, that it won't pass.

Q. Mr. President, do you suggest that perhaps—is there any way that we as an association or as community publishers, since it's so important to us, can urge our association or the sponsors to modify that bill in any way?

THE PRESIDENT. It's a very complicated bill and far-reaching in its impact. It would have a very adverse effect on the Federal budget. I think that in general—I don't mean conclusively—but in general, the Congress and the President ought to stay out of the administration of the Post Office itself.

My own concern, among others, is that if the bill is approved and another $1½ or $2 billion is allocated to the Post Office, that this might be an encouragement to channel that money not into better services, necessarily, but into immediate, additional increases in salaries for the postal employees.

They already receive a higher level of pay than the average Federal employee. And as you know, this has to be negotiated according to standard management-labor contract terms. Those are some of the concerns that I have.

My guess is that the majority of the Members of Congress agree with the position that I've outlined to you.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Q. Mr. President, HEW has expressed displeasure with integration of the University of North Carolina school system in addition to, perhaps, Virginia. And HEW has also said it's going to monitor other States, including my State of South Carolina.

They're using the stick approach of threatening to cut off, perhaps, new Federal funds to the universities who don't desegregate and shuffle programs from mostly white schools to mostly black schools.

Do you think it proper for HEW to get into the curriculum program of the universities of, say, North Carolina, and take this approach?

THE PRESIDENT. As I'm sure you know, HEW got into the question because of a direct order from the Federal courts to ensure two primary things. One is a proper acceptance of black students in the predominantly white colleges and vice versa, so that there wouldn't be a 95- or 96-percent black or white student body.

And the second thing is to ensure that the State legislatures and State boards of regents in the predominantly black colleges didn't give them a lower level of physical and educational service as contrasted with the white colleges.

I don't think anybody could argue with those two basic principles. I think that, as you describe it, the punitive aspect of the HEW decision is quite modest. In other words, there won't be any massive withholding of Federal funds that would hurt all the students in a university system or even a single college.

But funds will only be withheld if the States are adamant against complying with the Federal court ruling. And in those cases, the funds would be withheld only for specific, narrowly defined programs that relate to the nonsegregation act.

So, I think that Joe Califano has done a very good job in dealing with that difficult question. As you know, so far as I know, South Carolina and Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida have all done quite well. The States, I understand from Secretary Califano as being a problem, are Georgia, North Carolina, and Virginia.

Q. HEW just told us the other day that in the next year or so they intend to look at other States, such as South Carolina, just to make sure they're complying.

THE PRESIDENT. I understand. Well, I'd like to reemphasize one more time, I don't deplore nor do I disagree with the action HEW is taking. But it is in direct compliance with the Federal court order.

FEDERAL REGIONAL OFFICES

Q. Mr. President, given the path that your administration has taken relative to implementing domestic programs which address the negative impact of high unemployment levels among our cities, specifically the intention of the Economic Development Administration Public Works program and the $400 million Housing and Urban Development Urban Action Grants program, it seems that many key Carter appointments within these two agencies have yet to be made. How does this situation affect the delivery of these well-intended programs? I'm referring to the Indianapolis head area office directorship, and the Chicago EDA regional office directorship.

THE PRESIDENT. Just before lunch, I came back from a conference, that has been underway now for 2 days, of all of our top regional officers representing the agencies that you've described and others. It's the first time this has ever been done.

When I came into office, I was very disappointed, as a past Governor, with the effectiveness of regional offices. And one of the options that we assessed was to eliminate these offices altogether. After 8 or 10 months of study at the Cabinet level and out in the field, we decided to put them together in a much more effective fashion, to keep them informed about basic thrusts not only of legislation itself but of implementing procedures.

We've eliminated the disharmonies among Cabinet officers that previously were mirrored at the regional level. And

I've asked these regional leaders of 10 regions this morning, plus, I guess, a hundred or so others, at the end of a year to give me a report on how well they were doing to work closely with the State and local officials, to have innovative programs on their own, and to call me directly if there was ever any obstacle to good administration at the Cabinet level or at the White House staff level.

I think that we have gone through a 12-month period of complete reassessment. But I feel confident that now the regional offices will have a rapidly increasing degree of both autonomy and responsibility.

NATIONAL ENERGY PLAN

Q. Mr. President, I've been a believer in the energy program from the start. And in our house, which is 50 years old, between last year and this year, in the same month, we saved 17,000 cubic feet of natural gas through insulation measures and other measures, putting in a new furnace and this and that. Where do we stand on the energy program right now?

THE PRESIDENT. I proposed a comprehensive energy plan last April 20. The House passed it in August—a very good program which was completely acceptable to me. The Senate passed an unacceptable program, which they acknowledged to be unacceptable, just to get to conference last October or November. And since then, the conference committee of the Senate has been split 9 to 9, and not a single member has changed his vote. Senator Lee Metcalf died, which left the committee 9 to 8.

And we have not been able to get a full committee meeting even in the Senate. Senator Jackson is the chairman of the Senate conferees. He's been working literally day and night since Christmas, trying to work out some resolution of the question that's been the major obstacle, and that is the pricing of natural gas.

They've now agreed in principle on deregulation with an initial price of natural gas, an increase in natural gas, with a certain percentage per year, complete deregulation to exist some years in the future. I'm being vague because the position of the Senators is vague. They've worked out at least alternate proposals on the definition of new gas, both on land and in the Outer Continental Shelf areas.

I met this morning with Senator Howard Baker. I met the day before yesterday with Senator Jackson. And both of them feel that we will have an energy bill. After we finish the natural gas deregulation discussion in the Senate, then before there's an actual vote, there would be a meeting with the House conferees and Dr. Schlesinger, who would represent me, and there would be a fairly general consensus that this is what we will support.

Then the conference committee will send their recommendations back to the House and Senate. That would leave the oil pricing legislation as the only remaining issue. And I've had indications from the Senators, Senator Long and others, that once the natural gas problem is resolved, there would be a fairly rapid decision on the crude oil equalization tax question—whether or not they have a reserve fund to enhance oil production and how the collected taxes would be distributed.

So, I've been very disappointed at the delay. The first veto of a natural gas deregulation bill was in 1950, 28 years ago. And I have never seen in my own experience, and the Members of Congress tell me that they've never seen such a complicated subject with so many highly conflicting and intensely held opinions and with such a repeated and ancient commitment expressed for conflicting points of view by previous votes.

It's very hard for a Congress Member to vote five times in a row for deregulation instantly and then decide that he'll wait 8 years before it's deregulated, or 5 years, and so forth. The inability to compromise has been very hard. But I would say that we will have bills. It's of crucial importance. And I think the Congress is feeling an increasing desire to resolve this issue once and for all. My understanding from the Senate leaders is that as soon as the Panama Canal treaties are completed, that energy will be the number one item on the agenda.

TAX REFORM

Q. Mr. President, you've recommended a $25 billion tax cut program. The Republicans on the other hand have the Kemp-Roth bill, which would cut taxes by about 33 percent over a 3-year period. Why do you think your package is better than theirs?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, you know, as President, I had all the options to choose from. We assessed tax packages all the way from $10 billion to $50 billion. And I felt that we needed several things related to taxes: One was a reform of some of the inequities that seemed to me to be obvious to provide more fairness; secondly, a substantial simplification of the tax laws and, therefore, the tax forms to be filled out; and an overall tax reduction.

I think that our proposal reduces the taxes of a four-person family, for everyone in the country who makes less than $100,000 or $200,000. And it more than compensates in almost every instance for the increase in social security taxes.

The primary people that are having to pay increased social security taxes are those who make $20,000, roughly, or above. They deliberately ignore the fact that although they are paying more for social security, their retirement benefits under social security will be substantially enhanced because they'll have a higher level of income on which to base their ultimate monthly retirement benefits. So, I think that in balance that the purposes are met.

As far as the choice between $20 billion and $30 billion or $25 billion or $15 billion or $35 billion—that's somewhat of an arbitrary figure. I wanted to be sure that our deficit this year, this coming year, was no larger than the one this year, in spite of the tax decrease. A $25 billion tax reduction shows up as a $15 billion or $20 billion net increase in the deficit. Without that, we would have had a substantial reduction. That's one factor.

Next year, the deficit would be much less than it is in the '79 budget. I wanted to be sure we didn't contribute to increased inflation. And this is another important matter. I think that we wanted to have some economic stimulation.

Our goal is to continue a downward trend in unemployment, although it would be a slight downward trend as we project it in 1978. And I wanted to try to have a target of  $4\frac{3}{4}$  to 5 percent on increasing the GNP in real terms.

In our judgment, mine and the economists who work with me—the Secretary of Treasury, Commerce, and others—the $25 billion figure was the one that best fit all those requirements.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Q. Mr. President, it was mentioned earlier this morning that there may be some reconsideration being given to the social security bill. Can you comment on that? Are you reconsidering or do you know if the Members of Congress are reconsidering?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think all of the Members of Congress are concerned. As you know, the bill that was passed by Congress was much more costly to the working families, the taxpayers, than the one we proposed.

We thought that there ought to be some shift of funds from one social security reserve fund to another when needed, and that when the inflation rate and the unemployment rate had an exceptionally high drain on the social security system, that general funds should be used and triggered for those transient times.

The Congress rejected both those elements and put all the burden of paying the social security increase on the working families themselves. I think there will be a continuing reassessment of how to better balance the origin of the funds.

With a lowered unemployment rate and, I guess, more specifically, a much higher participation in the labor force, you tend to build up the reserve funds for a given level of taxation. That will help. I think the unemployment compensation payments are dropping off.

So, a growing economy will help us to protect the integrity of the social security system. The present level of social security payments is completely attributable not to this past year's legislation, but to previous legislation that had built in automatic increases. And that's something that the public has forgotten, as well. But I don't see any substantial change in the social security income and payment.

The system has got to have fiscal integrity on a permanent basis. And I think this will provide it. There may be some modification by the Congress in the future of exactly where the origin of those funds might be and more flexibility in shifting money from one fund to another.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank all of you. I've really enjoyed being with you and hope you've had a good time coming to the White House. It was an experience that I never had. [Laughter]

And I want to express my thanks again for the great coverage that we've gotten from you—both approbation and criticism—it's very helpful. Every night about 9:30 or 10 o'clock, I get a news summary of, I guess, 8 or 10 pages, that comes upstairs to the White House. And it has selected editorial comments from, I think, about 200 papers in the Nation.

We have a summary of each item on the evening network news and how many seconds were devoted to that subject. And we have the AP and UPI reports that come to me that evening. And of course, I read a lot of newspapers and magazines myself. But the feedback from around the country on a daily basis, or even more frequently, serves as a great guide to us about what the needs of our people are.

We quite often detect the unsuccessful administration of a program or an undetected need from what you report to your own readers and listeners and viewers. And I just want to thank you for giving me this chance to reestablish a good relationship with you, at least as far as communications goes.

You know, I don't know all the answers. I've learned a lot in this past year. And I think we've got a good working relationship with the Congress that perhaps did not exist 8 or 10 months ago. I've learned about them. They've learned about me. And there's an ease of communication and exchange of ideas that didn't exist this time last year.

Thank you very much.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

*Statement by the President.
February 11, 1978*

In recent weeks I have been following closely developments in the coal strike. Earlier this week it appeared that the impasse might be over when the bargain-ers reached a tentative agreement on a new contract.

Recent events, however, have slowed and, perhaps, threatened ratification of that contract. At the same time, the situation in some areas of the country has become a matter of increasing concern.

Voluntary power cutbacks have become widespread in the east-central region, centering in Ohio, and several utilities have ordered mandatory cutbacks to industrial customers. More such cutbacks will follow even if the strike is settled soon, and employment impacts will be felt shortly.

In view of the uncertainties of the current situation, I have instructed members of my Cabinet to accelerate planning and preparation for any contingencies that may arise from continuation of the strike.

—I have asked the Secretary of Labor, working in close cooperation with the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, to continue efforts to facilitate the collective bargaining process.

—I have asked the Secretary of Energy (1) to identify and plan for possible movements of coal to points of critical shortage, and (2) to continue his efforts to ensure maximum possible electric power transfer into the affected region from other electric utility systems not affected by the coal strike.

—I have asked the Administrator of General Services to ensure that all Federal facilities in the affected region reduce their power consumption to minimum necessary levels, effective immediately.

—I have instructed the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to provide expedited review of any requests for temporary relaxation of the Clean Air Act regulations that may be needed.

—I have instructed the Attorney General, working in close cooperation with the Governors of the affected States, to review and plan for any Federal measures that may be needed to ensure continued peace and lawfulness in the areas most affected by the strike.

—In addition, I have requested formation of a Federal/State task force, with headquarters in Canton, Ohio, to coordinate efforts to ensure that employment and human need consequences of power cutbacks are minimized, and that power brought into the affected region is shared equitably. This task force, to be composed of Governors, representatives of Federal agencies, State public utility commissions, private and public utilities and industrial users, will be established immediately and will convene initial meetings within the next few days.

I continue to believe that the solution to the strike must be worked out in free collective bargaining by the parties. I hope that all those involved in the strike will abide by the law and act responsibly in all respects. I urge all parties to respect the principles of fairness and cooperation during the days ahead.

Those in areas most affected by the strike have already made great sacrifices. Before the strike is over, and for several weeks thereafter until the normal flow of coal is restored, even greater hardship will occur. I urge all those in areas threatened by power cutbacks to conserve energy, so that these sacrifices are shared equally and so that no one will suffer unfairly or unnecessarily.

Energy Emergency in Ohio

Statement by the President.

February 11, 1978

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Ohio, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I hereby determine that a regional energy emergency exists in the State of Ohio of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate control regulations under the Ohio Air Quality Implementation Plan may be necessary, and that other means of responding to the energy emergency may be inadequate. This determination shall be effective for not more than thirty (30) days, provided that the State of Ohio shall hold the public hearing required by Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act within 1 week of this determination. The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Ohio on a case-by-case basis and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to act with due care if he suspends air pollution regulations under the authority provided by this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health.

NOTE: The Presidential determination is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

Overseas Private Investment Corporation

Nomination of James M. Friedman and Richard R. Swann To Be Members of the Board of Directors. February 13, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate James M. Friedman and Richard R. Swann to be members of the Board of Directors of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation for terms expiring December 17, 1979.

Friedman, of Shaker Heights, Ohio, would replace Gustave Hauser, who resigned. Friedman was born August 1, 1941, in Cleveland, Ohio. He received an A.B. from Dartmouth College in 1963 and a J.D. from Harvard Law School in 1966. He practiced law in Cleveland from 1967 to 1971 and from 1972 to the present. In 1971 and 1972, he was executive counsel to then-Governor John Gilligan of Ohio. Friedman was chairman of the Ohio Civil Rights Commission from 1972 to 1974.

Swann, of Orlando, Fla., would replace James A. Suffridge, whose term has expired. Swann was born May 5, 1940, in Orlando. He received an A.B. in 1961 and a J.D. in 1963 from Duke University. He is an attorney in Orlando. He is currently special counselor to the Florida treasurer and insurance commissioner. He has served on the Orange County Budget Commission and the Orlando-Orange County Expressway Authority.

Food for Peace Program

Letter to Five Congressional Committee Chairmen. February 13, 1978

In accordance with the International Development and Food Assistance Act of 1977, I herewith forward a comprehensive study of the payment of ocean freight differentials between United States-flag rates and foreign-flag rates when United States-flag vessels are required to be used for the shipment of agricultural commodities under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (PL-480).

I endorse the recommendation of the study that the responsibility for funding

PL-480 ocean freight differentials be retained in the Department of Agriculture, but that the presentation of the Department of Agriculture's budget to the Congress be improved by clearly identifying these costs as support of the U.S. merchant marine. I believe that the recommended change in budget presentation will avoid the concealment of a subsidy in the budget without imposing an undue administrative burden on the departments and agencies.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

NOTE: This is the text of identical letters addressed to Thomas S. Foley, chairman, House Committee on Agriculture; Herman E. Talmadge, chairman, Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry; Warren G. Magnuson, chairman, Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation; John M. Murphy, chairman, House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries; and Clement J. Zablocki, chairman, House Committee on International Relations.

Federal Summer Employment Program for Youth

*Memorandum From the President.
February 14, 1978*

Memorandum for the Heads of Departments and Agencies

When schools throughout the Nation close for the summer, many young men and women will be seeking summer jobs. This year, due to the high degree of unemployment among youth, Federal managers, and employers in the private sector, must increase their efforts to provide meaningful employment experiences for young Americans.

Through summer employment, young people will have opportunities to apply what they have learned in the classroom. For many, summer employment will enable them to earn funds necessary to return to school in the fall.

I am asking each of you to personally support the Federal Summer Employment Program for Youth. In selecting students to work in the Federal Government, we must ensure that special efforts are made to attract needy young people. For this reason, we are again setting an employment goal of one needy youth for every forty regular employees.

Chairman Alan K. Campbell and his staff at the Civil Service Commission will provide leadership to the Summer Employment Program, and will report to me on our accomplishments. Commission staff will soon be providing you with more details on the program.

I urge each of you to take full advantage of this opportunity.

JIMMY CARTER

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

*Remarks on the Stalemate in the Negotiations.
February 14, 1978*

The present stalemate in the coal strike inflicts continuing and increasing hardships on this country and also on the miners, both active and retired. It cannot be allowed to continue.

I have just directed the Secretary of Labor to convey to negotiators for management and for the mineworkers my personal and most urgent request that serious negotiations be resumed immediately here in the White House.

I've also instructed the Secretary of Labor to participate personally in these negotiations and to give me a report, at least daily, on progress that is being made in resolving the present stalemate.

I continue to support the collective bargaining process. However, the welfare of this country must be my overriding concern. Renewed negotiations here in the White House must be viewed as a final opportunity for this bargaining process to work. If it does not, then I will have no choice but to resort to stronger measures.

While law enforcement is a primary responsibility of State and local governments, I've also asked the Attorney General to give me a complete assessment of the powers available to ensure protection of life and property in these extraordinary circumstances.

REPORTER. Mr. President, would you invoke the Taft-Hartley Act if they failed to negotiate?

THE PRESIDENT. That's one of the options available to me, yes.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House.

Energy Emergency in Indiana

*Statement by the President.
February 15, 1978*

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Indiana, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I hereby determine that a regional energy emergency exists in the State of Indiana of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate and sulfur dioxide control regulations and regulations governing reserves of low sulfur coal under the Indiana Air Quality Implementation Plan may be necessary, and that other means of responding to the energy emergency may be inadequate. This determination shall be effective for not more than thirty (30) days, provided that the State of Indiana shall hold the public hearing required by Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act within 1 week of this determination. If, during the period of suspension, I determine that a regional energy emergency no longer exists in Indiana, I will direct that the temporary suspension be terminated promptly. The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Indiana and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to act with due care if he suspends air pollution regulations under the authority provided by this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health.

I also urge the Governor to implement fully all necessary energy conservation measures, including those power curtailment orders cited in the petition, so that the necessity for suspension of pollution control regulations can be minimized.

NOTE: The statement was released on February 16.

The Presidential determination of February 15 is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

International Atomic Energy Agency

Nomination of Roger Kirk To Be U.S.

Deputy Representative. February 16, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Roger Kirk, of Washington, D.C., to be the Deputy Representative of the United States to the International Atomic Energy Agency. He would replace Galen L. Stone, who has been nominated to be Ambassador to Cyprus.

Kirk was born November 2, 1930, in Newport, R.I. He received a B.A. from Princeton University in 1952. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1952 to 1955.

Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation

Appointment of Three Members of the Board of Directors. February 16, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of three persons to be members of the Board of Directors of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation for terms expiring February 19, 1980. They are:

KENNETH L. HOUCK, currently a member of this Board; assistant general counsel of Bethlehem Steel until his retirement in 1974; and management trustee of the United Mine Workers Health and Retirement Funds.

ROBERT TILOVE, senior vice president and consultant on employee benefit plans at Martin E. Segal Co. in New York. He replaces Eugene Burroughs, whose term has expired.

CAROL W. TRENCHER, currently a member of this Board, and a partner in the New York law firm of Dewey, Ballantine, Bushby, Palmer & Wood, where she works in the field of employee benefits.

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation is an independent Government corporation established under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, to insure private sector defined benefit pension plans.

United Nations Children's Fund

Appointment of George I. Lythcott as U.S. Alternate Representative on the Executive Board. February 16, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of George I. Lythcott as Alternate Representative of the United States on the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund.

Lythcott, 59, of Reston, Va., is Administrator of the Health Services Administration at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. He is a physician, specializing in pediatrics, and has served as a consultant to various Government agencies.

Interview With the President

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session With Representatives of Black Media Associations. February 16, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Well, let me say, first of all, that it's a great pleasure and an honor for us to have you here today in the White House. I know that the history of black journalism in our country is a very fine and honorable one. And I had a chance to commemorate, I think, the 150th anniversary by greeting some of you in the Oval Office this past year.

MINORITY PROGRAMS

Very shortly I intend to send to the Congress a message, within the next week or two, extending the CETA program, so that we can focus roughly $13 billion worth of public service job money more narrowly on areas where it is needed. In addition to that, we'll add $400 million in private sector jobs.

This past year we had a substantial increase in employment among black Americans, I think about 6.7 percent, and among black teenagers, an increase of 7.8 percent. But that still leaves a tremendous unemployment rate, particularly among our young people.

We have plans in the 1979 budget to triple the amount of money devoted to the training and employment of young minority teenagers, from roughly $776 million to about $2.3 billion. So, we are making steady progress, and many of the programs that we initiated with the help of the Congress in 1978 are just now beginning to have its full effect be observed.

In addition, we have passed our goal of having $100 million in Federal money deposited in minority-owned banks, and we will meet our goal of more than 10 percent of the local public works projects being devoted or assigned to minority businesses for completion.

I've instructed all executive agencies in the Federal Government to double in this and the next fiscal year the amount of purchases of equipment and supplies from black or minority-owned businesses.

And the last point that I wanted to make is that we will send to the Congress very shortly a complete reorganization of our civil rights agencies in the Federal Government. I think you'll have a chance this afternoon to meet with Eleanor Holmes Norton, who will be able to answer your questions more specifically about that.

We have a long way to go in our country in meeting the legitimate needs of citizens who have been deprived too long of equal employment opportunities, equal educational opportunities, and equal opportunities, once they establish, through their own initiative, a business, to be treated fairly by their own government. But we are making progress, and it's gratifying to me to be able to make this brief report to you.

And I hope that during the next months, as these programs become effective, Congress authorizes the appropriation of money—and I think we have an excellent chance to be successful—that you will help us by reporting to Bunny Mitchell or someone else in the White House or me directly if you see the need, any absence of completing the goals that I've described to you.

We have a good attitude in the Congress. The Congressional Black Caucus is very vocal, very well organized, very forceful. They help to inspire me to do a better job, and I think they will tell you that we have a good working relationship here.

I'll be glad to answer any questions that you might have about these or other matters for a few minutes. I've got to go at 1:30. I've got to meet with Foreign Minister Dayan, and I'd like to save enough time to get a photograph with you all, if you have no objection.

QUESTIONS

MINORITY PROGRAMS

Q. One quick question I have, Mr. President, is that in view of some of the programs you wish to put into effect, once it's seen that they are moving ahead or the timetable being so important, is it possible perhaps by Executive order to get some things rolling sooner?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, some of the things I've described to you are being done by Executive order. For instance, the increase in deposits in black banks—that was done by orders from me to my Cabinet members.

The doubling of purchases from black-owned suppliers of equipment and supplies was done by Executive order. We've had 10 percent built into the law as a target for black-owned contractors in public works projects for construction, ground preparation. The last report I got was we were exceeding that; we were at about 14 percent level. That's at Commerce Department.

And of course, the reorganization of the civil rights agencies in the Federal Government is done under the reorganization bill. I don't have to get a law passed. What I do is submit the reorganization plan to the Congress, and if they don't veto it, it goes into effect. It's kind of a combination Executive order, in other words.

Now, the tripling of money set aside for minority youth employment is a budget item, and that specific tripling of the money allotted for youth employment does have to be approved by the Congress.

Q. I was concerned about SBA [Small Business Administration] or OMBE [Office of Minority Business Enterprise].

THE PRESIDENT. The SBA, particularly Title 8-A program, is being done now by Vernon Weaver, who's the Administrator of that Agency. And I don't believe that we will be delayed because of congressional action. I think we can proceed with a greater number of reforms there to make sure that the present law is administered properly, which it really wasn't the last 8 years.

ENERGY EMERGENCY AND THE COAL STRIKE

Q. You're meeting with the Governors this afternoon, and I'm wondering what help you're going to be able to give to the State of Ohio, where the poor are really affected by the recent weather problems, the coal strike.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we were successful last night, as you know, in getting the coal operators and the mineworkers back to the negotiating table. They recommenced their negotiations this morning at 9:30 under the auspices of and with the help of the Secretary of Labor directly.

In the meantime, though, there are a lot of things we can do to prevent people from becoming unemployed. One is to transfer electric power from the surrounding areas into the 12 States that are most heavily impacted by cold weather and by heavy dependence upon coal.

Another thing that we can do is to transfer coal, either within States or across State lines, from one source of supply, where the inventory might be quite high, to another one, which is in danger of having to shut down an electric power production plant.

Another thing that we need to do is to make sure that any transfer of that kind in coal is done without violence to those who are trying to transport those supplies. And this is primarily a responsibility of the local and State officials. And, of course, we have to be sure that we, at the Federal level, give full support and coordination.

What I'll do this afternoon with the 12 Governors—the attendance will be a hundred percent because of the seriousness of the problem—is to exchange ideas and communications with them and set up a mechanism in the White House so that any particular problem that evolves in Ohio or Indiana, Pennsylvania, the others, can be addressed to me directly without delay.

We have some administrative action that can be taken. For instance, when coal is burned in complete compliance with environmental protection standards, it's only at about 96 percent of the efficiency than if it's burned and you emit some stack gases, because you can shut down the air scrubbers and get a little bit more power production per ton of coal. And during the 30-day energy emergency that I have declared, the Environmental Protection Agency can authorize the Governors to let coal be burned without the stack scrubbers that take about 4 percent of the power away. So, there are a few things we can do in this manner.

I think that we also have to prepare for the eventuality that I hope we never see, of a breakdown in the negotiations. And if we do have to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act—and I sincerely hope we will not—then the Federal courts, if they agree that an injunction is necessary, would get such an injunction, and it would require a little more attention than to law enforcement to make sure that there is no violence perpetrated against persons or property.

ADMINISTRATION ACCESSIBILITY; BLACK REPORTERS; D.C. HOME RULE

Q. Mr. President, you mentioned for us to contact Bunny Mitchell. I've called her on several occasions, and I have several different people answering the phone. Does she have a staff, or, if not, would you see to it that she get a staff, inasmuch as she is going to be handling these problems?

Number two, we have correspondents here—and I don't know whether it's by omission or not—but we have a tendency, we don't have an opportunity for black reporters to participate in your press conferences. Very seldom are they given an opportunity to ask you a question.

And then the final question, I want to thank you on behalf of District employees, as far as coming out for home rule. How do you envision our getting full voting privileges here in our Nation's Capital? Do you have any predictions of what we could do?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, in the first place, if you need to contact the White House itself, Bunny is the proper one to call. Or if there's a matter that relates to domestic affairs, to Stu Eizenstat; if a matter relates to employment opportunities, it would be the EEOC [Equal Employment Opportunity Commission]; and if it relates to transportation, obviously you'd call the Secretary of Transportation.

I don't mean that whatever problem comes up that you have to call the White House to get it done. I think the best approach would be for you to call the member of the Cabinet who's responsible for that particular function. And I hope that after today all of you will know at least fairly clearly which department has which responsibility. Obviously, housing and urban development would come under Pat Harris; the Commerce Department administers the local public works programs and the EDA programs, and that would be Juanita Kreps. Anything related to transportation would be Brock Adams; and anything related to health, education, and welfare, Joe Califano.

I think the first preference would be for you to go to the Cabinet. I should have made that clear.

Bunny is my staff person in the White House. I have seven senior staff members. She is one of the seven, and we have a very small staff support here at the White House. We don't have a Haldeman-Ehrlichman. You don't have to go through the White House to get to a person who's administering a specific program.

Since you live in the District, quite often your people will be Federal employees and might be complaining about equal employment opportunity. Eleanor Holmes Norton would be the one to contact directly on that.

If you don't get satisfaction though at the Cabinet level, then I would welcome you calling the White House directly.

The question about voting rights in the District—we have endorsed this full representation for the District of Columbia. The hearings are now going on, I think, in the House Judiciary Committee. As you know, it would require a constitutional amendment to authorize the District of Columbia to be treated in the Congress as a State. The District of Columbia would not be a State, but it would have two Senators and the equivalent number of House Members, depending upon its population, which is growing.

We support this fully, and the members of my Cabinet, including the Attorney General, are testifying in favor of the need for this.

As far as the black reporters being recognized at press conferences, I don't know many of the names of the reporters who serve on the White House press pool. I know we had a reception for them Christmas; we had, I think, 1,400 people who came. There are hundreds of them. And I try to do the best I can to spread the questions around. But one black reporter that I call on every now and then is Ed Bradley with CBS. And I try to spread my questions around.

Q. We'll give you the names of our black-owned newspapers. [Laughter] Ed Bradley is with CBS.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I know.

Q. We are desirous, however, our black-oriented publications have an opportunity to ask our President a question.

THE PRESIDENT. I think that's a good idea.

Q. Thank you, sir.

HUMPHREY-HAWKINS BILL

Q. Mr. President, I think you should know there are 13 members of the National Association of Black Journalists here, and we took a poll last night of what we consider the most critical issue of crisis proportions facing the black people, and almost unanimously it was unemployment. And I'm asking you, are you sufficiently satisfied with the new version of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill that you will put all of your weight behind it, make it a top priority?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I am.

BAKKE CASE

Q. Mr. President, the corporate world seems to be standing still, awaiting the outcome of the Bakke case and—as far as their affirmative actions are concerned. Are you doing anything at the White House to deal with a favorable decision in this particular case, in the Bakke case?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, we filed a brief that was prepared by the Solicitor General, Mr. McCree, which I think is compatible with what you would have wanted. This is the White House position, because I personally approved the brief. I am not a lawyer. And the Attorney General filed it on behalf of me and the entire administration.

This case is in the Supreme Court, and, of course, it's a separation of powers. I don't have anything to do with the Supreme Court except to file a position, and then they rule on the ultimate case as far as Mr. Bakke is concerned.

So, I would say that now that it's in the hands of the Supreme Court and we have filed our position, that there's nothing additionally that we would do until after the Supreme Court rules.

When Ms. Norton comes in a few minutes—I think she's coming after me, Eleanor Holmes Norton—I think she could tell you in more specific terms what the entire Federal Government agencies are doing to ensure that we have equal employment opportunities, which does not just apply, by the way, to Federal employees. It applies to equal treatment and fair treatment in the private sector as well.

Under our reorganization plan, we'll try to bring together those functions, concentrated much more greatly under Ms. Norton. In the past, they've been spread in Commerce and Labor and HEW and other agencies. And so we're trying to focus them more clearly so that we can address them more effectively.

OHIO ENERGY EMERGENCY

Q. Back in Ohio, there's great fear from the mass layoff that was talked about yesterday, and we were wondering if there was any hope—of the layoffs expected in the next 2 or 3 days, some of them have already started. So, we were wondering—this really affects the black community, and more for the babies, so we were wondering what, if anything, that we have to hope for, or whether or not there's anything that you can help in this area.

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, I've declared Ohio not only a disaster area, to give help in matters of transporting energy materials, coal and oil and natural gas, but we've offered the services of the Federal agencies to help with the maintenance of law and order.

We've tried to bring the negotiators back to the table. And in addition, Ohio is one of the two States that I've declared an energy emergency area to let energy be burned more efficiently. I could answer your question better after I meet Governor Rhodes this afternoon. He will be here, and with the 11 other Governors, myself, Dr. Schlesinger, who heads up the Energy Department, and others, we'll share ideas on what we can do to minimize the damage that has already occurred and is rapidly building up among those who are employed.

I know that quite often when a plant has to lay off 10 percent of its workers or 15 percent of its workers, that the last ones hired are generally the ones laid off first, and quite often, because of the recent arrival of civil rights laws on the scene, the last ones hired are minority citizens and, in some instances, women.

But we'll be discussing this around the same table this afternoon with the 12 Governors and myself.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN THE UNITED STATES

Q. Mr. President, we know that you're very outspoken on human rights issues around the world. I'd like to know, really, what is your human rights policy for the United States—I'm thinking specifically of the Wilmington 10 case and seeing that that sort of thing is no longer allowed to continue.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, obviously we deplore any sort of violation of human rights or civil rights in this country. And I think that the basic structure of our courts, although sometimes it seems a tedious process and the delays are excessively long, justice tends to triumph ultimately.

Our Justice Department, with the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and others, has been very aggressive in trying to defend those who are the victims of the violation of civil rights.

I understand—well, the Wilmington 10 case has been entirely within the North Carolina courts. They have now filed, I think, a habeas corpus petition, and this will get the case into the Federal courts. Again, though, although I don't have any apology to make, I think our Founding Fathers were correct—once the case gets in the court, other than the filing of brief papers that the judges can assess, I don't have any authority over the courts themselves. But we try to search out instances like the Bakke case, where we didn't have to intervene and filed a brief on behalf of the proper administration of civil rights.

As you know, the judge in North Carolina—I'm not familiar with the details of the case—has made a ruling, which many people think is not adequate, some think it went too far, that will let almost all the imprisoned people be eligible for parole this year. And in the meantime, though, the Federal courts are just now taking under advisement their habeas corpus petition.

MINORITY OWNERSHIP IN BROADCASTING

Q. Mr. President, secretary of National Association of Black-Owned Broadcasters, and I have several other members of the board sitting here with me from Savannah, all the way to New York City. We would like to thank you and your staff for your efforts in supporting minority ownership in broadcasting in the United States. However, we have a major problem confronting us in not having the enabling legislation to make the proper funds available so that we can procure these facilities and would like to know what your plans are so far as MESBIC [Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Companies] and SBA loans are concerned.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, in the first place, our administration over this past year has been very concerned about the difficulty of black citizens and other minority groups in trying to acquire ownership of the electronic media. And on behalf of the minority citizens of our country, we have now filed a petition directly with the Federal Communications Commission, as you know, and I have sent a message to Congress—and Walt Wurfel or somebody can get you a copy of it—expressing to Congress the need to ensure that in the future black citizens and black citizens' groups can acquire ownership and control of the electronic media, both television and radio.

And now over a longer period of time, the Congress will evolve and pass legislation. In the meantime, though, we are moving as aggressively as possible with the FCC under a Justice Department petition filed on my behalf to expedite the process.

So, you really have a two-phase effort. One is the Federal Communications Commission taking action under its existing authority, and the other one is the message to Congress that will, in the long run, bring about legislation, perhaps.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, sir.

Q. One more question.

THE PRESIDENT. Just this question and I really have got to be on time for the next meeting.

SELECTION OF FEDERAL JUDGES ; ETHIOPIA-SOMALIA CONFLICT

Q. Just two quick ones. One, I'm from Philadelphia; the Marston affair is still in the news. The question is, did you or Mr. Bell meet with Senator Eastland anytime after your election and agree to take the selection of Federal judges out of the patronage process, but leave the selection of U.S. attorneys in the patronage process?

And the second question is, what do you plan to do about the situation regarding Ethiopia and Somalia? Will there be any transfer of arms to Somalia directly or indirectly, perhaps from Iran?

THE PRESIDENT. I met with Senator Eastland at the Governor's mansion in Georgia after I was elected. And we discussed with him my desire to have Federal judges appointed on a merit system basis.

He pointed out to us what we already knew, and that is that historically, the United States Senators in States had been the ones to put forward names of judges to be appointed. We informed Senator Eastland that the circuit judges, the ones that come from several States, that we would set up immediately, when I became President, screening committees to make sure that they gave me the names of the five most qualified people before I made the selection.

We now have a screening commission set up in every one of the circuits in the Nation. Neither Senator Eastland nor I have the authority to remove, against their will, the historical right of Senators to participate in the district judgeships. But we have encouraged the Members of the Senate—I've written handwritten letters to every Democratic Senator—to do so, and I think now in 18 States, these merit selection commissions have already been set up.

There was never any discussion at all about U.S. attorneys.

And the other question is, we don't intend to send arms to either side. We've called on Somalia to withdraw from Ethiopian territory, out of the Ogaden area.

The Somali Government position, you know, is that these are not Somali troops, but they are independent groups who went in to protect citizens of Somali heritage who lived in Ethiopia.

And we've also let Ethiopia know that we would consider it a very serious breach of peace, endangering even worldwide peace, if they should cross the Somali border in their counterattack.

I have hopes that this will not be the case, and we hope also that the OAU, the Organization of African Unity, will play a more forceful role in bringing Ethiopia and Somalia together.

The Ethiopians said they will not negotiate until Somalia is off their territory and the Somalis are willing to negotiate on what to do about the Ogaden area. But we do not intend to send weapons to Somalia or Ethiopia.

Well, let me thank you. We covered a lot of points.

NOTE: The interview began at 1 p.m. in the Cabinet Room at the White House. Walter W. Wurfel is Deputy Press Secretary.

The transcript of the interview was released on February 17.

United States Mint at Denver

Nomination of Evelyn T. Davidson To Be Superintendent. February 17, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Evelyn T. Davidson, of Denver, Colo., to be Superintendent of the U.S. Mint in Denver. She would replace Betty Higby, who has resigned.

Davidson was born May 16, 1921, in Hearne, Tex. From 1964 to 1967, she was chief clerk and administrative officer of the Colorado House of Representatives.

From 1967 to 1971, she was administrative assistant to Mark Hogan, Lieutenant Governor of Colorado. She was owner and operator of a legislative reporting service which analyzed legislation in the Colorado General Assembly from 1971 to 1974.

From 1974 to 1977, Davidson was chief clerk and administrative officer of the Colorado House of Representatives. She is currently a staff assistant to Ruben Valdez, minority leader in the Colorado House of Representatives.

Interstate Commission on the Potomac River Basin

Appointment of Alvin R. Morris as a Member. February 17, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Alvin R. Morris, of Berwyn, Pa., as a member of the Interstate Commission on the Potomac River Basin. He replaces Daniel Snyder III, who has resigned.

Morris was born July 17, 1935. He received a B.A. from Lafayette College in 1957, and an M.S. in microbiology (1959) and Ph. D. in biology (1963) from Lehigh University.

Morris began work with the Federal Water Pollution Control Program in 1963 as a biologist, and then served as technical director of the Delaware Estuary Comprehensive Study and director of the planning branch of Edison Water Quality Management Laboratory. In 1970 he became Assistant Regional Administrator for Management for Region II of the Environmental Protection Agency, and in 1973 he became Deputy Regional Administrator of the Region III office of EPA in Philadelphia.

National Health Resources Advisory Committee

Appointment of Francis A. L'Esperance, Jr., as a Member. February 17, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Francis A. L'Esperance, Jr., of Englewood, N.J., as a member of the National Health Resources Advisory Committee. He replaces John Venable, deceased.

L'Esperance, 45, is an associate professor of clinical ophthalmology at Columbia University College of Physicians and Surgeons and an associate attending ophthalmologist at Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center. He is president of the Ophthalmic Research Foundation and a governor of the American College of Surgeons.

National Brotherhood Week, February 19-25, 1978

*Message of the President.
February 17, 1978*

I have said on many occasions that government cannot solve all of the critical problems we face. Our ability to surmount these challenges of modern life depends greatly on the selflessness, generosity and resilience of our spirit as a people.

In the earliest days of our history when there was little organized government, everything often depended on the willingness of individuals to help each other, to work together as brothers for the common good. The observance of National Brotherhood Week focuses on the value of such personal commitment. It gives us a chance to look with pride on a heritage that was profoundly strengthened and enriched by it, and it encourages us to revitalize and expand it in our family, community and national life today.

Be it the day-to-day plight of the poor, the elderly, the sick or the disadvantaged; be it an unexpected disaster or misfortune—there are endless opportunities for us to show our kindness and goodwill toward those in need.

Inspired by the courage, compassion and unselfish perseverance of our forebears, let us join with the National Conference of Christians and Jews in making this Brotherhood Week the rallying point of a renewed commitment to accept freely and fully our individual responsibilities as members of a democratic society.

JIMMY CARTER

Department of Agriculture

Nomination of P. R. Smith To Be an Assistant Secretary. February 17, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate P. R. "Bobby" Smith, of Winder, Ga., to be an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. His area of responsibility would be market and consumer affairs, and he would replace Robert Meyer, resigned.

Smith was born February 25, 1925, in Winder, Ga. He served in the U.S. Air Force during World War II.

From 1948 to 1977, Smith was self-employed as president and general manager of Smith Farms, Smith Seed & Gin Co., Smith Bonded Warehouse, and Piedmont Acid Delinting. He served as vice president of the Georgia Farm Bureau Federation, president of the Georgia Seedsmen Association, and president of the Southern Cotton Growers Association. He was also on the board of regents of the University Systems of Georgia.

Since 1977 Smith has been Special Assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture. He serves on the Agriculture Department's Agriculture and Energy Policy Group, on the Peanut Task Force, and as Chairman of the Tobacco Task Force.

Vice President Mondale's Trip to the Pacific Area

Statement by the President Announcing the Trip. February 17, 1978

Since my schedule will not permit me to travel to the Pacific area during 1978, I have asked Vice President Mondale to serve as my personal representative on a trip to this region in mid-April.

The Vice President will visit New Zealand, Australia, Indonesia, Thailand, and the Philippines, in that order. His mission underscores the importance my administration attaches to this region of the world where we retain vital security interests and where we have very large and rapidly growing commercial ties.

The Vice President will discuss our security and economic relations with our ANZUS partners during his stops in Wellington and Canberra. His visits to Jakarta, Bangkok, and Manila will enable us to strengthen our links with the nations of ASEAN.

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Samuel L. Evans, president of the American Foundation for Negro Affairs;
- Charles L. Schultze, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

The President has declared a major disaster for the State of Rhode Island as a result of snow and ice, beginning about February 6, for the purpose of implementing those programs of Federal agencies that provide assistance to individuals only, as authorized by the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, Public Law 93-288.

The President has declared a major disaster for the State of New Hampshire as a result of high winds, tidal surge, and coastal flooding, beginning about February 6, for the purpose of providing assistance to State and local governments and individuals. The President also determined that the damage resulting from snow and ice, beginning about February 6, is sufficient to warrant implementation of those programs of Federal agencies that provide assistance to individuals only, as authorized by the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, Public Law 93-288.

The President declared a major disaster for the State of Maine as a result of high winds, tidal surge, and coastal flooding, beginning about February 7, for the purpose of providing assistance to State and local governments and individuals. The President also determined that the damage resulting from snow and ice, beginning about February 7, is sufficient to warrant implementation of those programs of Federal agencies that provide assistance to individuals only, as authorized by the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, Public Law 93-288.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF FEBRUARY 17, 1978

Held in Providence, Rhode Island

THE COAL STRIKE

THE PRESIDENT. It's nice to be here in New England, in Rhode Island, and I'm very proud to have a press conference here for the Nation.

I've just talked to the Secretary of Labor about progress on the settlement of the coal strike. They are making good progress. No final agreement has been reached.

I've been in coal mines in Pennsylvania and other places to see the miners at work. I know that they are hard-working and patriotic Americans. They and the industry leaders both recognize that there is a tremendous responsibility on their shoulders, because the future of the unions, the future of an effective collective bargaining process, the future of the coal industry, and the welfare of our Nation depends upon the success of these negotiations.

They've been bargaining now, steadily, since they began at the White House a day and a half ago. They continued in their discussions until 2 o'clock this morning, and then after that, management with the Secretary of Labor from 2:30 until 5 in the morning. And I've asked them to stay at the bargaining table until a final agreement is reached.

I have confidence that they will be successful, because they and I want to avoid the necessity for me, as President, to take more serious action if the bargaining process is not effective. The whole Nation is looking to them with hope and with confidence.

THE NATION'S ECONOMY

Before I answer your questions, I'd like to cover one other point that's very crucial to New England, and that is the Nation's economy. In many ways, our economy last year was good. The inflation rate went down, and wages, profits, production, housing starts, real income, investment all went up.

Four million new jobs were created, an alltime record, and many of these jobs, I'm glad to say, were in New England. Employment here in New England last year went up 5½ percent. The unemployment rate dropped 3 full percentage points, from 8½ percent down to 5½ percent. But unemployment and inflation is still higher than I'm willing to accept, and so my top priority this year on the domestic scene is still the economy.

I've asked the Congress to help me put into effect a coherent program to make more jobs and to bring inflation closer under control. We need a cooperative anti-inflation effort, with voluntary action being taken by industry and by labor to keep wages and prices from pushing each other up.

We need an expanded jobs program to help those who are hit hardest by unemployment. Next week I will send to the Congress legislation that would reauthorize the $12 billion Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, provide for 725,000 public service jobs and for a billion dollar youth employment and training program.

Also, we need tax reduction and tax reform. They go together. They add up to $25 billion in net cuts in the income taxes Americans have to pay, and they are also designed to create an additional 1 million new jobs. Seventeen billion dollars of this tax cut will be for working families in our country, personal income tax reductions, and the rest in corporate tax reductions.

Corporations will also receive higher tax credits for investing in the sort of new plants, new equipment that will make New England and the rest of the Nation competitive with aggressive foreign exports.

But we can't have these cuts in taxes unless we help pay for them by eliminating some of our unnecessary and unwarranted income tax subsidies. Two of these are the deferral subsidy and the DISC subsidies. Both have a particularly bad effect in New England, where competition from abroad has had such a terrible effect on businessmen and on workers alike.

The deferral subsidy sets a situation in effect where multilateral corporations pay lower taxes on foreign profits than they pay on their U.S. profits. This amounts to subsidizing corporations to export jobs overseas. The so-called DISC subsidies are just as bad. They let U.S. corporations set up dummy corporations to handle foreign exports, so as to keep from paying U.S. taxes on half their profits. Both these giveaways go overwhelmingly to a few of the largest multinational corporations, and both mean that the average taxpayer has to pay the bill, more taxes, just to take up the slack caused by these subsidies. And both cost America, and particularly New England, jobs. Both loopholes should be closed.

As for the famous three-martini lunch, I don't care how many martinis anyone has with lunch, but I am concerned about who picks up the check. I don't think a relatively small minority has some sort of divine right to have expensive meals, free theater tickets, country club dues, sporting events tickets paid for by heavier taxes on everybody else.

If the Congress will help me by getting rid of these tax loopholes and by enacting the entire economic program, we can have a good start on correcting unemployment and inflation.

The economy won't turn around overnight, of course, any more than an ocean liner can turn around on a dime. The job will require slow, careful planning, not dramatic master strokes. It will require small corrections, of course, that we adhere to very patiently. It will require careful planning, careful adjustment, careful tuning and cooperation.

The machinery of the American economy is sound. We have a lot to be thankful for. It's worked well despite severe shocks, but it can work better, and that's our major goal in this country this year.

And now, I'd be glad to answer your questions.

Ms. Thomas [Helen Thomas, United Press International].

QUESTIONS

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Do you think that Congress will go along with your decision to send sophisticated fighter jets to the Middle East? And can you give us your rationale for including, for the first time in these sales, Egypt and Saudi Arabia along with Israel?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I think Congress will go along with the proposal to sell a limited number of airplanes in the Middle East. F-15 planes are already being delivered to Israel, and in the new proposal Israel will receive additional F-15's and F-16's, very advanced fighter planes.

We have for a long time sold military equipment to Saudi Arabia, one of our closest allies, staunchest friends, and economic partners. This is the first time we've sold F-15's to Saudi Arabia, but they have other advanced equipment.

The first planes will be delivered to Saudi Arabia not this year or next year, but in 1981 or 1982. The planes that we have agreed to sell to Egypt are the F-5E's, not nearly so advanced a weapon as the F-15's or F-16's. But as you know, a few years ago, Egypt, which is now one of our staunchest friends and allies, severed their close relationship with the Soviet Union and, in effect, became an ally of ours. And I don't believe that there's any danger of this relatively short-range, not advanced fighter causing any disruption in the peace between Egypt and Israel.

So for those reasons, I am advocating to the Congress that they approve these sales, and I believe the Congress will agree.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, without asking you to announce a deadline for a coal settlement, can you give us any clue as to the extent of your patience with the situation?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the country is suffering already from the consequences of the coal strike. I have asked the Secretary of Labor and I've asked the negotiators from the workers and from the coal operators to stay at the bargaining table in constant sessions until they reach an agreement. There has been some progress made to date.

As you know, there is a division within the labor union itself. But the bargaining council, which consists of 39 members, is being kept as close as possible to the negotiating team that represents labor. We hope that when an agreement is reached that this will be in such a form and with close enough consultations ahead of time that it will be presented immediately to the membership of the United Mine Workers for approval.

So, I think that all of us are determined. I've met personally at the White House with labor and management in the coal industry, and I can testify to you that they are sincere in wanting to reach an agreement.

Q. Would you be willing to see it go on for another week?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I don't think we could afford another week of negotiations. I would hope that they could conclude their negotiations within the next few hours or a day or so.

DISASTER ASSISTANCE FOR NEW ENGLAND

Q. Mr. President, Dan Rea, WBZ-TV, channel 4, in Boston, Westinghouse Broadcasting. Last week, as I'm sure you very well know, New England was hit with a very bad blizzard, and hundreds of thousands of hourly production workers in Massachusetts lost wages, wages that will be made up in some part by the State unemployment compensation fund. But the difference between the unemployment compensation fund and their total salaries in some families is up to $100 or $125. Is the Federal Government prepared to do anything for these workers?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, your own State and others in New England that were so heavily damaged by the snowstorm and also by the actions of the seas and wind have been declared major disaster areas. This involves several elements of aid. One was an immediate dispatching here of Sea Bees and members of the other military forces to actually help in the clearing of the highways and the restoration of normal life in your economy.

I have also authorized personal loans for those who have damage to their homes, those who have serious economic problems, and we've worked very closely in harmony with the State and local officials on this element as well.

These loans are at very low interest. Sometimes the interest payments are almost nonexistent. We hope that there can be some additional economic aid, if necessary, granted within the bounds of the law. But I don't know of any specific feature that would permit us to compensate workers for lost wages.

(The President's disaster declaration for Massachusetts, as well as for Rhode Island, does provide for the full legal amount of Federal unemployment compensation benefits to workers unemployed by the disaster.)<sup>1</sup>

I think most of the industry here that employs people has now been restored to full employment—almost to full employment—but with that one exception, I think we are providing the maximum amount of aid that can be under the U.S. law.

Q. Ed McHugh, Worcester Telegram. Considering how deeply some of the New England States are already in hock to the Federal Government, do you consider it proper for some of them to convert their unemployment insurance programs into disaster relief funds for people who lost wages during the storm?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know enough about the answer to give you a response. I think in every instance of this kind, the primary responsibility has got to be for the Governor or local officials in the State to make a judgment on what's best for that particular area. And if a Governor or a legislature or a mayor has made that decision, I would not want to contradict it. Whether the unemployment compensation payment is more crucial—at that one moment during or immediately following a disaster—or whether it's more important to correct the consequences directly if there's a disaster in physical terms, I would not want to judge. That's a decision the Governor will have to make.

NUCLEAR POWERPLANT CONSTRUCTION

Q. Steve Bascade, WJAR-TV in Providence. The Federal appeals judge, Mr. President, has asked the Environmental Protection Agency to reconsider the approval of a cooling system for the nuclear plant in Seabrook, New Hampshire, part of his reasoning based on the fact that opponents of the plant didn't have access to all the relevant information.

My question: How much say should people have over construction of a plant, and should they specifically have veto power in a referendum to oppose a nuclear plant if they so wish?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, there are now no legal prohibitions at the Federal Government level from proceeding with the Seabrook plant. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has not yet given a license. But the Environmental Protection Agency has ruled that the cooling system, as proposed, was adequate.

I do think that a State, or the people within a State, should have the right to determine the degree of shifting to nuclear power as a source for energy. As you know, some States have had referenda on this subject. This is a prerogative that the State legislature and the Governor and, in some instances, through referenda, can be accomplished.

But the Federal Government does not have and would not want to have the right to prohibit the construction of a nuclear powerplant in a State if the Federal laws were met. But I do think that in New Hampshire or Vermont or other States, that the legislature certainly should have a right to set the standards by which those plants should be built.

Q. What about the voters themselves in a referendum—not the legislature, the individual?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, that depends upon whether or not there's a provision for a referendum to override a State law. As you know, in California, for instance, there is an initiative by which citizens can pass a law absent the legislature taking a stand.

But I think that—I know New Hampshire fairly well, having visited there several times during 1976, and I know how close your members of the legislature are to the people. I think there are just a very few people per member of the House. And I think that your legislators are adequately responsive.

U.S. ATTORNEY LINCOLN ALMOND

Q. Mr. President, Jim Roberts, WEAN News in Providence. We have a U.S. attorney here, Lincoln Almond, who's a Republican. You have not yet fired him, but Tom Murray of Newport has been recommended to take his place.

During your campaign, you promised to take the politics out of the selection process for U.S. attorneys. Can you tell me first of all if you intend to replace Mr. Almond and, if so, why?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. This matter has not come to my attention yet. Ordinarily, I wait until the Attorney General gives me a recommendation about a replacement before I get involved in the process.

The number of Republican U.S. attorneys still in office now, I think, are about 25 out of 90-something. I think during the last 8 years, before I came in office, there was never a Democrat appointed to a U.S. attorneyship. But we've tried to keep in office those who were doing a good job, and when we have made a replacement, I believe in every instance that the selection has been made on the basis of merit.

Whether or not that particular person is going to be replaced, I do not know.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, given the tension that already existed over the Israeli settlement policy, do you have any second thoughts about the timing of your announcement to sell warplanes to Egypt, or was the timing of that announcement and our public statements about the Israeli settlement policy a message to the Israelis to become more flexible in the current negotiations?

THE PRESIDENT. The two were not interrelated in my decisionmaking process. When I was in Saudi Arabia early in January, I told them that shortly after the Congress reconvened I would send up a recommendation for military sales to the Middle East.

Every time I've ever met with Prime Minister Begin, both in the public sessions, that is, with staff members, and also in my private sessions with just him and me present, this has been the first item that he's brought up: "Please expedite the approval of the sales of military planes to Israel."

I think that the timing is proper. We're not trying to shortcircuit the allotted time for the Congress. As a matter of fact, we will not begin the process until after the Congress reconvenes, the Senate reconvenes. So there will be a full 50 days for the Congress to consider the matter. Twenty days after this coming Monday, I'll send up the official papers.

So, I don't think it's a bad time to send it up. I recognized ahead of time that there would be some controversy about it. And we did give it second and third thoughts before I made a decision about the composition of the package and the date for submitting it.

Mr. Bradley [Ed Bradley] with CBS.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, back on the subject of the coal talks, does that 2-day deadline that Secretary Marshall talked about yesterday—is that still in effect? And if at the end of that period they have not reached agreement, you can invoke the Taft-Hartley Act, but the miners have said they will not mine the coal and the Army can't. If you do invoke those provisions and they refuse to mine coal, what can you do, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, that's all spelled out in the law. The miners, the coal operators, the Secretary of Labor, I, the Attorney General, the Governors all would like, if possible, to avoid an invocation of the Taft-Hartley law and to let the coal dispute, through collective bargaining, lead to a new and acceptable contract. So there's no rigid time limit.

If it's obvious to me that progress is being made, then my preference would be to keep the bargaining process going.

In the last 24 hours I have detected progress, and we have not yet been able to get a final settlement. Even after a settlement is reached at the Labor Department, even after the bargaining council, who represents the coal miners, approve the terms that have been derived with the negotiating team, it would still have to be submitted to the union members back home for their approval. So that would take 2, 3 weeks. And I think it would probably take an additional week or so before coal could start flowing to its destination after it has been mined.

So we still face a substantial delay. And I recognize that it's one of the most serious problems that I've faced as President. And I believe that the negotiators do, too. But I'm not trying and don't want to predict exactly what will happen in the future. And I don't want to set a rigid time limit on anyone. But I have had the urgency of this question imparted by me personally and constantly by the Secretary of Labor during the negotiating times.

HUMPHREY-HAWKINS BILL

Q. Mr. President, Robert Goldman, University of Rhode Island. You're an advocate of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill. Will the bill help with providing job opportunities for college graduates?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I think the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, if passed—and I think it has a good chance to be passed—would provide enhanced job opportunities for college graduates as well as others. It would set a goal of a 4-percent unemployment rate, and it would permit me to judge when this was in conflict with a control of inflation.

It would also bring into being a much closer coordination of effort between the President, the Federal Reserve Banks, the Congress, and others in the Government and in private industry to work together.

It would require me to submit to the Congress an economic plan over several years, 4 or 5 years, that would ultimately lead to the realization of those goals. So, I think the planning concept, the involvement of all the elements who determine the outcome of our economic goals, would be a step in the right direction itself, and it would put a heavy emphasis on the reduction of unemployment.

INDIAN LAND CLAIMS

Q. Mr. President, John Day of Bangor News. Mr. President, last October you were quoted as saying that Judge Gunter's recommendations for settling the Maine Indian suit were fair and equitable.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. The new proposals which your task force has recently recommended have been severely criticized. What leads you to believe that the new recommendations are more fair and equitable than the old ones submitted by Judge Gunter, the difference being that the new recommendations call for substantial contributions from the private landowners of the State as opposed to no contributions under Judge Gunter's proposal?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, Judge Gunter's proposal concerning the Maine land issue involving the Indians was not accepted by the Indians. And when it was rejected by the State, the landowners, and the Indians, then I appointed a task force headed up by Bo Cutler (Eliot Cutler), who happens, coincidentally, to be from Bangor, Maine, to try to work out an agreement.

We have now reached an agreement as far as the Federal Government is concerned, represented by me, and the Indian tribes. It would not require any further negotiation nor litigation by any landowner in Maine who owns less than 50,000 acres of land.

It does leave up to the State of Maine and, I think, 14 landowners who have more than 50,000 acres, an option without any constraint on them—they can either accept the negotiated settlement, they can negotiate further for a better settlement for themselves, perhaps, or they can continue to litigate in court.

The reason that I got involved in it, reluctantly, I might say, was because almost every piece of property in Maine was potentially tied up in a lawsuit, could not be bought or sold, and I could foresee a very serious economic consequence to Maine unless I made some effort to address it.

This settlement would cost the Federal Government about $25 million. But I would like to point out, too, that we are bound by law—that is, the Department of Interior, represented legally by the Attorney General—to represent the Indians.

And this is a recent development, brought about, as you know, by the discovery of some old treaty papers, I think in 1971, and we've tried to expedite the process. But there is no constraint on the large landowners nor the State to accept the settlement that we have evolved. That's up to them.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, as you know, the coal strike has passed all records in length.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. Do you feel that the negotiators have really reached a point of being irresponsible in not reaching a settlement?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't ascribe irresponsibility to the negotiators.

When the negotiations broke down, when the bargaining council refused to accept for presentation to the miners the first agreement, that's the point at which I decided to intercede.

I invited both sides to come to the White House, which they did, and the union expanded their negotiating team from six members to nine members to try to bring in some of those who did not agree with the first settlement, to more closely assure that when another settlement was reached the miners would accept it. Now we are keeping the bargaining council in an adjacent room to the negotiators themselves, and there's a constant interrelationship of communications with them.

But I believe that all of the negotiators and the bargaining council, on behalf of the union, are negotiating in good faith.

THE NATION'S ECONOMY

Q. Mr. President, Joshua Resnek, the Chelsea Record, Chelsea, Massachusetts. Earlier you said that the machinery of our economy is sound despite shocks. However, shortly before the American Revolution, the great economist Adam Smith wrote about governments like our own which incessantly spend far more than they raise in taxes and which, as a result of such practices, are doomed to inevitable bankruptcy.

First, I'd like to ask you if you agree with economic reasoning like Mr. Smith's. And second, will your administration continue to spend moneys it is clearly incapable of raising?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, my goal, as you know, is to balance the budget. This year we are faced with a deficit that's about $15 or $20 billion higher than it would have been because we're trying to give a tax break, tax reduction, to the American people. In every instance, you have to make a judgment on that.

One of the reasons that we are giving the tax reduction is because the taxes are too high; another one is that it would result in a stimulated economy, a million more people at work and paying taxes rather than on the Federal dole. And so you have to make a judgment.

We have expectations, with some fairly accurate projections, that the budget deficit next year, fiscal year 1980, will be considerably below 1979. And if the economy continues to progress, then I have good hopes that in 1981 we will reach my goal. Obviously, I don't have complete control over the economy. But I've not given up in trying to carry out the principles that Adam Smith espoused in your quote.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, on the Middle East, arms to the Middle East, I want to ask a kind of a philosophic question. How do you rationalize the idea of selling weapons, more sophisticated weapons of war, with the argument that they would help to bring about peace?

And does it bother you that these more and more sophisticated weapons are being sold to both sides and that if a new war were to break out, it would be a more violent confrontation than any in the past?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, we are not introducing new weapons into the Middle East. F-15's are already being delivered into the Middle East. Also, I have pledged myself to cut down on the volume of weapons each succeeding year as long as I'm in office, barring some unpredictable, worldwide military outbreak. This year there will be less weapons sales than last year, and this will include, of course, the Middle East.

I think it's very good for nations to turn to us for their security needs, instead of having to turn to the Soviet Union as they have in the past. I'm talking specifically about Egypt. And you have to remember that Saudi Arabia has never had any active aggression against Israel. Saudi Arabia is our ally and friend. Egypt is our ally and friend. Israel is our ally and friend.

To maintain security in that region is important. Egypt has other threats against its security. The Soviets are shipping massive quantities of weapons into the Middle Eastern area now, into the Red Sea area—Ethiopia, into Syria, Iraq, Libya—and we cannot abandon our own friends. So, I don't think that it's wrong at all to ensure stability or the right to defend themselves in a region with arms sales.

We are continuing multinational negotiations with other sellers of weapons to get them to join with us in a constant step-by-step, year-by-year reduction in total arms sales. If they do, I think the world will be much more peaceful in the future.

FRANK CORMIER [Associated Press]. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

Providence, Rhode Island

Remarks at a Reception for Senator Claiborne Pell. February 17, 1978

Senator Pell and Governor Joe Garrahy, distinguished members of the State house, senate—I don't know if the Congressmen are here or not. Oh, good, there they are. [Laughter] Congressman Beard and Congressman St Germain, all the wonderful people from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, I'm glad to be here.

Looking at your fine Governor, your Members of the Congress, your U.S. Senator, and the results of the general election in 1976, I can tell that you have excellent political judgment. I had a slight doubt there for a few days at the time of the Democratic primary, but it was soon alleviated completely. [Laughter]

I am very proud to be here, to visit with my friends, to let you know of my deep interest as President of the United States in you and in your State, to express my admiration for what you have done during the last few days in setting an example for the Nation of courage and tenacity and of cooperation and good will under very adverse circumstances. I think you've demonstrated what's made our country great, and I'm very proud of you.

You may not have thought about it before, but this is an election year. [Laughter] And I would like to say a few words this afternoon about a special friend of mine, Senator Claiborne Pell. He's a close friend and a partner of mine, but he has, as you well know, a mind of his own. He knows your State and he cares about you. He has had a remarkable record even before he went to the United States Senate. And since then his experience has given him a profound knowledge of our Nation, both in domestic affairs and also in foreign affairs. He had perhaps more experience in the diplomatic service than almost any Member who's ever served in the Senate. And as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, he's grown day by day.

He's a good adviser for the Secretary of State. He's a good counselor for other members of the Foreign Relations Committee. And he's a good adviser for the President as well.

I think you all know that he's the head of the Subcommittee on Arms Control. And this year, we hope and we pray that we will have a successful conclusion to the SALT negotiations with the Soviet Union. This is good for our Nation's security. It's good for the attitude of the whole world. And it's good to ensure the deepest hope of all humankind that we can have international peace. It's also incumbent on us to have strong men like Claiborne Pell who believe in a strong defense. And in the negotiations with the Soviet Union, which are going on every day, on a comprehensive test ban, and on limiting and then reducing and hopefully, God willing, in the future completely eliminating atomic weapons from the face of the Earth, he occupies a crucial position.

And it makes me feel much more sure of myself to know that he is one of the key Members of the Congress with whom I have been and will be consulting in those crucial times.

As a Coast Guard officer, he knows the seas, and I feel a special kinship with him there, because for 11 years, I was in the U.S. Navy. And this is a time, I think, that he additionally serves in exploring how best to utilize and to protect the riches of the sea. We're engaged in tough negotiations in how to harvest the minerals and the fishes of the sea. And we also have difficult decisions to be made with a rapidly growing technological world on how to preserve the purity of the oceans and their openness to the use by all nations. And he has that special responsibility in the Foreign Relations Committee.

He specializes in Europe, among all the nations of the Earth. And as you have noticed, I'm sure, in analyzing the priorities that we've placed in our budget proposals, we're trying to strengthen our ties with the historic friends and relatives, blood relatives, where our ancestors lived in the nations of Europe.

NATO is one of our most important alliances. We're not granting favors to other people when we strengthen the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We're defending our own country. And it would be a devastating blow to have any hope engendered in the minds of potential enemies of our friends in Europe because of a lack of strength on our part.

And so we're trying to increase the spirit and the hopefulness and the confidence and the cooperation that exist among us. And there is his special focused responsibility.

There are a lot of things that I could talk about in foreign affairs, but I know you are interested as well in domestic matters. Claiborne Pell has been an innovator. I was at one of the first examples of a health maintenance organization today. And I saw people going to get medical care, not after they became sick, but to prevent sickness—tiny children and grown people, as well, who form kind of a family with medical personnel at a very low cost to get good health care.

Our Nation now spends more of its gross national product, we spend more per person on health care by far than any other Nation. And we still don't have good health in our country. We rank 18th among nations in life expectancy, and 14th or 15th or 16th in other measures of good health care, like infant mortality and the incidence of severe diseases.

And we have to explore new ways to provide better health care. And Claiborne Pell was the author of the legislation that set up this new approach to good health care. I think we've caused too serious an economic problem among the middle-income families of this Nation. And because of his innovation and hard work, we are now proposing a drastic improvement in college loans, college grants, and work-study programs for students, to help the middle-income families of the country.

And the whole Nation can thank Claiborne Pell.

I don't want to brag on him too much, but I would like to say just one more thing.

I became President probably because of the election or campaign reforms that were initiated by Claiborne Pell, to try to prevent in the Presidential elections the outcome of the contest being determined by who had the richest friends. And with a limit on contributions and the broadening of support among millions of people and not just a few thousand people, the democratic process was enhanced. And I think this is very good. And I thank him personally for helping make me the President of the United States.

Well, he's a gentle man and a kind of a quiet man. But he's experienced and he's strong and he has courage and he has a lot of foresight. And it's just a pleasure to work harmoniously with people like Claiborne Pell.

I think that you all know that this election year is going to be very difficult. The Democratic Party and what it stands for is what I believe in. It epitomizes what our country is, and it shows us in the future what our country can be. And I know that Congressman St Germain, Congressman Beard, and others will be out this year seeking reelection, and as a Democrat, I hope that you will help us all even to strengthen the principles of our party as they are exhibited both here in Rhode Island and also in Washington.

I want to again thank Ed Garrahy for his tremendous demonstration—Joe Garrahy for this tremendous demonstration of leadership in this State.

I think I will come out to the crowd. Thank you again, everybody.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:15 p.m. at the Cranston Hilton Hotel.

Bangor, Maine

Remarks at a Reception Following a Fundraising Dinner for Senator William D. Hathaway. February 17, 1978

It's a great pleasure to be here with all of you who formed close friendships with members of my family. One man came through the line and said he had been with my wife when she campaigned in the northern part of Maine in Aroostook County, along the Saint John River, and said that he had had my Aunt Cissy to spend the night in his home with him and his wife, and had a chance to pray with my sister Ruth, and he was looking forward to drinking a beer with Billy. [Laughter] But I was really the bottom one on his list. [Laughter] He was also glad to shake hands with the President.

I'm glad to come back to the State that's got the most interesting Democratic Presidential primary law in the world. It kept Maine in the forefront of my mind for at least a month—[laughter]—while two delegates came forward, you know, every 2 or 3 days. Also, I've noticed that the Indian treaty question is not as unpopular with country club members as I had thought it was. [Laughter] At least you haven't changed the name of the country club. [Laughter]

This is a State where difficult issues are addressed with courage and conviction. I'm going to talk primarily about a close friend of mine who introduced me. But I would like to say this about two former Governors of yours—perhaps one of the closest friends I have in the world, a man who epitomizes what I think a public servant should be and one who's done a tremendous job for the Democratic National Committee the last year, Ken Curtis. For a few months I spent almost as many nights with him and Polly and Angel as I did with Rosalynn and Amy. Ken, I thank you for what you've done for all of us.

And I think one of the great statesmen of our Nation, a man who with his sincere, quiet logic, cooled the almost frantic searching for truth in our country during the years of the previous administration, a man who has transformed the Democratic Party in Maine because of his integrity and competence, and a man who's now completely recovered, ready to go to work with me back in Washington, Ed Muskie. Ed, thank you very much for being here.

Senator Hathaway announced earlier today that I had approved the emergency declaration for Maine. And I want to express my thanks as President to him as Senator for making this announcement for me—[laughter]—earlier today.

I think in the coastal region where you have been so severely hurt, I think again it's a tribute to the strength of the Maine people that you've come through so well. You've been able to bear this kind of physical hardship, and I'm sure it's brought your people closer together.

I would like to say a few words about Bill Hathaway. If there ever was a tenacious and aggressive fighter for his own State, it's Senator Bill Hathaway. He is willing to address difficult questions. He always keeps in the forefront of his mind what's best for his people back home. And at the same time, he occupies a remarkably important series of positions in the U.S. Senate. As a member of the Finance Committee and the Subcommittee on Energy, he deals with one of the most crucial questions of our country. And I know that everyone who lives in New England, particularly Maine, recognizes that the consumers' interest and our Nation's interest must be protected.

At the same time, the second most important issue that we face this year, domestically speaking, is our economic problems. And he's the leader of the subcommittee responsible for economic problems, for employment, for tax reform. And it's remarkable how, with his own capability and quiet attention to detail and legislation in the Senate, he's acquired those responsibilities so early.

He's responsible for revenue sharing, and as you know, this again has been a very, very important panacea for us to strengthen the ties between the Federal Government and the State governments. He's also a man of compassion, which I think is important because that's an element of leadership that never changes. Other issues come and go, but a close, sensitive attention to those who suffer in our society is the mark of a great leader and a great statesman. He's been particularly interested in trying to alleviate the problems that result from drug addiction and from alcoholism. And he's been particularly concerned about the treatment for those millions of Americans who suffer. He's also extended this one generation in the future, because he's made a special study of the adverse effect on infant children of alcoholism in their mother during the time of pregnancy.

He's interested in our national security. He's been especially singled out for honor by serving on the Senate committee on intelligence and I don't think there's any more sensitive area in the whole Federal Government than the special committee on the intelligence community in the U.S. Senate. That's a small group of carefully chosen leaders who are extremely trustworthy, because in their hands and in their minds are placed the utmost sensitive secrets about our interrelationship with foreign governments. And they are also trusted, along with the President, the CIA, and the Defense Department, in protecting our country against subversion. And there has to be a careful balancing there between strength in protecting our country and the protection of the basic rights of American people. We've seen during the Nixon years that this can be abused.

Bill Hathaway happens to be the chairman of the subcommittee that looks into the financing, the budget of the Intelligence Community. And he did the first complete audit of how funds are spent and whether they were legal. And his work and those of others on that committee have been responsible already for the preparation of an Executive order that I issued recently, in close cooperation with the Senators involved, that I think brings order out of the chaos that previously existed in the management of this sensitive area of our country.

And now legislation is being prepared for the first time to spell out the authority, responsibility, and the limitations in the collection, dissemination of intelligence, and the protection of our country against counterintelligence.

Just in one day in my life as President, I had encounters with Bill Hathaway. In the morning, I met with the intelligence committee to talk about these things that I've just described to you. And later on that day I signed the small business assistance legislation for 2 years to help small business people. That was authored by, you guessed it, Bill Hathaway.

It's a very fine record and one that quite often is not adequately recognized around the Nation, because Hathaway is a Senator who doesn't protect his own achievements by personally bragging about them. He doesn't call press conferences to say, "Look what I did," or "Look at the error I found," or "Look at the advantage that I've now achieved for the people back in Maine or the United States." He's almost too reticent. But his peers in the U.S. Senate and his executive partner in the White House recognize the stature and the competence of this man.

He's had a special responsibility also in career education, which is important to me as a person who's had to work all my life. And I come from a part of the country that's very poor; many parts of Maine are very poor.

Those who grow crops under the ground have something in common. We don't make much money. [Laughter] And a lot of our children don't have a chance to get an advanced education and career education. And the matching of the graduates of our vocational schools, high schools, technical schools, with the job opportunities has been the special province in the United States Senate of Senator Bill Hathaway. And he's the author of that legislation that I signed into law this past December.

I won't mention many other things, but I would like to say that he is a coauthor of the Older Americans Act, and a lot of people don't know it.

I've been all over the country during the campaign to meet with, and I've eaten many lunches with older people in a renovated old building, and I've also been into homes when the meals on wheels were served.

I'll bet you not more than a thousand people in the whole country know that Bill Hathaway was the coauthor of the legislation that treats older people with dignity and respect and compassion.

And the last thing I'd like to say in just a brief few minutes is he knows his own State. He has a special interest in textile workers. Georgia has 60,000 textile workers. And Bill understands them and fights for them. He understands and knows the potato farmers. He protects them and he fights for them. He understands the capabilities of the shipbuilding opportunities at Bath, Maine. And I've just put into the 1979 budget authorization for eight more patrol frigates. And I think there's an excellent chance with Bill Hathaway and Ed Muskie working on it that Bath will get their share of those contracts. [Laughter] He understands the special problem of fishermen, and he fights for them.

And I think you all know that Maine in the past has really suffered because of your heavy dependence on imported oil. Your fuel bills for the same amount of heat are about 45 percent higher than many other parts of the Nation. Some of your industries have been here a long time, and the foreign competition is very severe.

And he understands people who work in places like Maine shoe factories. And he not only understands them but he fights for them.

If I were a resident of Maine, I would consider it not only a source of pride but also a source of assurance about the future and gratitude if Bill Hathaway was my Senator.

I was trying to think of something bad to say about him, but—[laughter—] I can't think of anything at this time. And maybe I should have talked to Ed Muskie ahead of time. But everything that I've said is absolutely true. And I have a special sense of responsibility as a Democratic President, the titular head of the Democratic Party, to assess the principles of our Nation and our party and to speak up when I deeply believe in someone.

And I especially feel this responsibility when that person quite often is not a show-horse but one who quietly and meticulously and competently and courageously goes about his work and doesn't ask for accolades or appreciation, but gets his gratification out of knowing that he does a job well. And I can't think of anyone who most accurately fits that description than Bill Hathaway, who's a personal friend of mine.

And I come here to let you know that I hope that you'll leave this rally for him, the fundraising banquet for him, with a determination not to be satisfied with what you've already done. I know that many of you are personal friends of Bill Hathaway's. You've made substantial contributions, and that's not enough.

He's going to have a tough campaign on his hands this year. And it's going to require that each one of you become kind of a focal point or an organizer to recruit other people, to contribute heavily financially, and also to arouse the spirit and the enthusiasm and the commitment of others who feel like you do, that Maine needs Bill Hathaway. And I think the United States needs him, too. So let's work together to get him elected.

NOTE: The President spoke at 7:11 p.m. at the Penobscot Valley Country Club.

Bangor, Maine

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session at a Town Meeting. February 17, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. This reminds me of 1976, in the latter part of the campaign, not the first part, because when I came to Maine for the first time, no one knew who I was or cared. [Laughter] I made a speech to the Democratic State Convention, and I remember that I was the 23d person on the program, and I started speaking about 10:20. And then when I began to run for President and came back, some of you were very hospitable to me and took me in and made me feel at home. Later my wife came, my three sons, their wives, my Aunt Cissy, my sister Ruth, my mother, and maybe later Billy will come as well. [Laughter]

We've had town meetings now, since I've been President, in Massachusetts and in Mississippi. We'll have an hour and a half. I'd like to make a brief opening statement on a subject that is important to you and then I'll answer questions. I'll take the last question about 20 minutes after 9.

ENERGY

Last year, New England suffered the worst winter ever recorded, and this winter may be just as harsh. Certainly, the blizzard of 1978, just 10 days ago, will go down in history along with the terrible blizzard of 1888.

You are expert in an average year in contending with freezing weather and winds of gale force and in handling large snowfall. And yet in some ways you are more vulnerable to winter than any other section of the country. You don't have access to cheap supplies of natural gas or oil, and you are heavily dependent on imported energy, primarily oil. It costs you more to heat your homes and your factories here than it does anywhere else in the 48 States in this country—Alaska maybe a little more. But even now Alaska has cheaper supplies of oil. Your jobs are in danger of leaving Maine, some of them, because to provide a certain amount of heat, the energy costs you about 45 percent more than the average place in our country.

No part of the Nation has suffered more from a lack of a comprehensive national energy plan than has New England. I've tried my best to close that gap, to correct the unfairness in energy distribution and energy prices. The House and Senate have both passed now a version of our energy proposal, and the conference committees are hard at work.

Let me tell you some of the ways, very briefly, that this energy package would make your own lives more prosperous and your own future more sure.

At present, natural gas produced and sold within a State like Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, Mississippi, Oklahoma brings a higher price than gas exported to another State. The energy bill would create a single price so that producers would no longer be discouraged from marketing their natural gas in other regions like your own State.

The energy bill sets efficiency standards for motor vehicles, for appliances, and for buildings, to save energy. The bill gives tax credits to homeowners and business leaders who insulate their buildings and save energy. For those with incomes so low that they don't pay taxes, the energy bill establishes a program to weatherize the houses of the poor at no cost to them.

Local utilities will be required to work with their customers on energy audits to see where energy is being lost and where economies can be effected. Energy bills can be cut down even more by use of solar energy to meet part of your heating needs. The energy bill also encourages this by offering tax credits to those who install solar energy equipment.

The bill provides research and development funds to study ways in which we can make better use of energy sources that are renewable, the ones that come from the Sun. One of these, obviously, is wood, which has traditionally been an important fuel throughout much of New England and also in my own home State of Georgia. But wood can be used in many new and innovative ways, and we aim to explore those ways by research and development.

I don't mean to suggest that any of these things can come about easily or overnight. The problem of energy has been ignored too long for us to expect any quick solution. But we need to start down the road, or we will never bring our demand for energy into balance with our continuing supply. Nor are there any attractive shortcuts. Our progress will be slow and sometimes hard to measure. But we must save oil. We must encourage energy production in our own country, and we must shift to more plentiful supplies of energy.

One immediate step that we can take is to lessen our dependence on foreign oil by conserving energy now. Some people have argued that conservation, the elimination of waste, will slow down our economic growth and cost jobs. But this is the opposite of the truth. Not only does energy conservation create jobs in the building industry and elsewhere, but conservation also means saving money by the efficient use of energy. It means the return to self-reliance in energy matters. Simply stated: Conservation means thrift. And since when does thrift mean stagnation? Any New Englander knows the answer. We must have a good, sound, comprehensive national energy policy. You know the answer to that.

And now I'm ready to take your questions on other issues.

QUESTIONS

REGULATION OF BUSINESS

Q. My name is Bob Sherlock, and I live at 49 Bradbury Street in Old Town.

Mr. President, Americans have long looked to government to constrain private decisionmaking for the good of society. Do you think the Federal Government should play a role in constraining U.S.-based multinational corporations from following investment, production, and marketing policies which weaken and destabilize the American economy?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I do. There are several ways that this is being done now, as you know. One is the antitrust laws which try to enhance competition in our country and preserve the finest aspects of the free enterprise system.

Another one is to cut down on unnecessary regulation. One of the great improvements that we've made in the last 12 months has been in the deregulation of the airline industry. And now, as you know, because of the changes that we have made, there's much more competition in overseas flights. You can now fly to England and back for, I guess, half what you could a year ago. The Senate is now getting ready to start voting on a bill to deregulate the domestic air routes. And we hope to eliminate unnecessary regulation, also.

I mentioned earlier today, in a press conference in Rhode Island, some of the tax provisions that I think would accommodate what you've just described. The elimination of overseas deferrals, which means that major corporations who invest overseas and therefore start employing foreigners to work in their factories pay a lower tax bill on a given amount of profits overseas than they would pay if they made those same profits in our own country.

We've got what they call a DISC operation, which encourages overseas investments and sales, where a big corporation—and almost all these credits go to big corporations—can set up a dummy corporation and export American products, and they only pay taxes on half their profits. But when they don't pay their profits in taxes at a fair rate, you know who has to pay the taxes for them—just the average working people of our country.

Another thing that I've tried to do is to eliminate some of the special loopholes that have been enjoyed by very wealthy people and influential people. One is what has been inaccurately called a three-martini lunch. Now, if a working man or woman takes your lunch to work—say, a $1.50 or $2 sandwich and something to drink—or buys it in a restaurant, you can't mark it off as a business expense. But if a salesman or someone else has a very fancy lunch and has a customer with him, then they can mark all that off, maybe a $25 or $30 lunch, as a business expense. The same thing is applicable with tickets to sporting events, tickets to the theater. If they carry a customer with them, then they can mark it all off as a business expense. I don't think that's right, and I think we ought to do away with it.

But it's very difficult for the Members of Congress to support these kinds of tax reforms because the more influential people are, the more of these tax breaks or loopholes they've gotten for themselves. And the same ability to hire lobbyists to get the tax breaks in the first place keeps those lobbyists who are very effective in Washington now to preserve the tax breaks for them. And the average working family doesn't know anything about it. And I think it's time to have comprehensive tax reform.

So, I'd say antitrust, deregulation, tax reform, intense competition brings out the best in our free enterprise system and does not hurt business; it does not hurt employment. In most instances, in my opinion, it would help employment.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS;
DICKEY LINCOLN DAM

Q. Bill Bussey from Bath, Maine. Before my question, Mr. President, the citizens of Bath, Maine, and the employees of the Bath Iron Works, wish to take this opportunity to express their gratitude and appreciation to you and the State Department for awarding contracts which enable the iron works to continue building the finest ships in the world.

Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you. I might interrupt you to say that in the 1979 budget, which I've just sent to the Senate, we have eight more patrol frigates. And I feel sure that with the very fine quality work that you do and with your two U.S. Senators, Ed Muskie and Bill Hathaway there, I'm sure that Bath is going to get its share of the new contracts.

Q. Well, keep them coming.

THE PRESIDENT. I will. Now, what was your question?

Q. All right. Do you support Senator Hathaway's stand on the Dickey Lincoln power project?

THE PRESIDENT. Both Senator Hathaway and Senator Muskie have been long supporters of the Dickey Lincoln Dam on the Saint John River. We will make a decision—I will make a decision on the dam after August. We have an environmental impact statement that will be coming to me, I believe, on August of 1978. And until that time comes, I will not decide whether or not to put my request for that dam in the 1980 fiscal year budget.

As you know, we did put enough money in the budget this year to do the basic research and the preliminary planning for it and to complete the environmental statement. But I will not decide that until after August, when I get the statement about the environmental impact.

Q. Wayne Bayer, Bangor, Maine. Mr. President, may I just say that I want to thank you for your support and recognition of the courage and contributions of Senator Hathaway, in coming to the State of Maine.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE

Q. You have been accused, unfairly, I believe, of sending Congress too many legislative proposals. I'm concerned, if this argument gains increasing acceptance, that Senator Kennedy's plans and yours for some form of national health insurance will be kept on the back burner.

As you know, it's been over 30 years since Harry Truman first proposed that the United States join the other progressive countries in the Western World providing its low- and middle-income citizens some protection from unexpected medical costs that wipe out savings and financially ruin families.

My question, Mr. President, is, how long will it be before Congress and the executive branch finally join hands in providing protection to those citizens who cannot afford adequate medical care?

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, I've been in office now for 13 months. And most of the problems that affect our Nation I inherited. And I think that this past year has been a good opportunity for us to address those difficult questions.

Energy—we've never had a comprehensive energy proposal put forward. [Inaudible—I'm working on with the special committees involved, reorganization of the Federal Government, the establishment of a new Department of Energy, the economic stimulus package which was so successful last year in bringing down the unemployment rate. In fact the unemployment rate dropped about 3 percent in New England from an average of about 8½ percent down to about 5½ percent.

We've also, on the foreign field, gotten deeply involved in the Middle East in a comprehensive settlement effort, and the Panama Canal treaties are a very difficult political question that are not popular, but are crucial to our Nation.

I know that Congress has been hard at work trying to deal with these questions, and so far, their final decisions have been very good on all these matters. I will present to the Congress, before the end of this session, legislation on a national health insurance program.

We've been working on this now for about a year. It is accurate to say that until we get the energy legislation, welfare, tax reform, tax reduction, out of the Ways and Means Committee in the House and the Finance Committee in the Senate, on which, as you know, Senator Hathaway serves, I don't think they can handle the health care question.

I've met with Senator Kennedy on this subject, and my guess is that his committee will begin working early in the summer or late in the spring. But we will present to the Congress a comprehensive health plan before they adjourn this year. And I would guess that next year would be the time for the Congress to take action on this legislation.

MENTAL HEALTH CARE

Q. Mr. President, my name is James Clark, and I reside in Hermon, Maine.

Mr. President, I realize that you have a national commission studying the Nation's mental health needs and that that Commission will report to you around April 1. The anticipated report of the Commission notwithstanding, would you please tell us tonight some of the specific improvements that you would like to see in the Nation's system of mental health care?

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, before I was President I was Governor of Georgia for 4 years, and my wife, Rosalynn, and I both undertook the mental health program in our State as a major new task. We were successful then in putting into effect a strong preventive care program, and an attempt, through diet and through education in the prenatal months of a mother's life and also in the early stages of a child's life, to prevent future mental illnesses.

We also emphasized the shift away from incarceration in large mental institutions into community treatment centers where the retarded child or other person with mental problems could live at home and have 8 or 10 hours a day to utilize what talents God had given them.

I think we established about 85 of those around the State during the 4-year period. In addition, we had a heavy emphasis on the problems that are caused by alcoholism and drugs. And, as you know, the foremost Senate proponent of correcting or addressing the alcohol and drug problem just also happens to be Bill Hathaway. He's been an innovator there, particularly the effect of excessive uses of alcohol and drugs on a mother before a child is born.

My wife is heading up the Commission that you referred to that will make a report to me in April. One of the things they asked for was a heavy increase in research and development funds, even in the new upcoming budget. And we've advocated, I think, $39 million to start a much more heavy research program in mental health.

So, I would say that on a Federal level we would emphasize these major things just similar to what we did when I was Governor of Georgia. And many other States are already doing these things. We have a need for increased funding. We had the title IV(a) program, as you know, a while back where local people could set up in an abandoned house or storefront a place for retarded or other mentally afflicted people. And we had a good response there.

I think once you give a local group an image of what can be done, almost every family knowing some person with a mental problem can help. So, I would say prevention, research and development, a combination of treatment in the physical and mental health field, an increased use of paramedical personnel and even non-trained personnel for rehabilitation and care, the utilization of Federal funds to match local and private funds and State funds in setting up community treatment centers, those are some of the things that will be part of a new program. But I'll have to wait until my wife gets through with the Commission in April before I can give you a better answer than that.

AID TO PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS

Q. My name is Joe Hughes, and I live in Bangor. Mr. President, how do you feel about Federal aid to parochial schools?

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much, Joe.

Well, within the bounds of the Constitution of the United States and the ruling of the Federal courts, I'm in favor of it. We have in our own State, while I was Governor, authorized the payment of a certain amount of State money to students who went to any of our colleges in the State, whether they were State-owned or related to religious institutions. This was declared constitutional in our State, and we did it.

We also are providing textbooks and other assistance to students in parochial schools. I think that's completely legitimate. As you know, the Congress is restrained in its passage of legislation on that subject because the Supreme Court and the Federal courts have ruled that direct aid to religious institutions, even including schools, is prohibited. I think it would take a constitutional amendment to completely open up that subject.

So, I would say to summarize that, within the bounds of Federal court and constitutional prohibitions, I would be in favor of giving aid to the parochial school students whenever possible.

Joe, thank you for that easy question. I appreciate it. [Laughter]

Q. Mr. President, my name is Bobby Burr, and I'm from the "Canoe City" of Old Town. On behalf of the Fifth Street residents, I would like to welcome you to Maine.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, Bobby.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Q. The Democratic Party has long proclaimed that they are defendants and champions of the poor, the oppressed, and the elderly. I would like to know how you, as the leading Democrat of the country, can equate the fact on the one hand that the House and the Senate has either done away with or decreased drastically any aid for these people and, on the other hand, has granted themselves a continuous cost-of-living raise?

THE PRESIDENT. I think that under Democratic or Republican Presidents, there have been substantial increases in the salary and the other benefits of Members of the Congress. And the same thing has applied to the top Federal employees. I'm sure that it's been the case with State employees and others who serve in local government. I think that we have done a great deal to help the elderly and those who are unemployed and those who have been suffering from chronic poverty.

The Democrats were the ones who initiated social security. The Republicans unanimously, with one exception, voted against social security. The Democrats were the ones that advocated the minimum wage when it was only 25 cents an hour. The Republicans voted overwhelmingly against it.

The Democrats were the ones who initiated rural-free delivery of mail to farmers and isolated families. The Republicans voted overwhelmingly against it. The Democrats initiated Medicaid, Medicare, the old age programs that we presently have in existence. The Older Americans Act was coauthored by Bill Hathaway, and in many cases the Republicans voted overwhelmingly against it.

This past year we initiated a strong economic stimulus package, and I think our economy was helped greatly. I just pointed out a few minutes ago that the unemployment rate in New England, which had been 8½ percent when I took office, dropped to 5½ percent in 1 year. I can't predict that that downward rate is going to continue. I don't know about the future. But we will have going to the Congress next week from me a recommendation for a $13 billion continuation of the comprehensive education and training act, because the Democrats have always felt that people who don't have great wealth ought to have an opportunity for vocational training and education tied directly to a job. We've advocated more than doubling public service employment and greatly expanding jobs for young people. And I think you know that the civil rights acts were initiated and passed by a Democratic President working with a Democratic Congress.

We've got our faults in the Democratic Party, but neglecting old people, unemployed people, poor people, young people is not one of our faults.

Q. Mr. President, my fifth grade class would be upset if I didn't say hello for the fifth grade class in Fitzborne Middle School in Hampden, Maine.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

INDIAN LAND CLAIMS

Q. My question is, since the ice hasn't been broken yet, since our land claims case will set a precedent across the country, I would like to know, will other States have to be as lucrative in the giving of land and money as we are in the State of Maine?

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, the Indian claims case in the State of Maine was initiated, I think, about 1971, when copies of old treaties were discovered and the Indians felt that they had a legitimate claim in court. Under the laws of our Nation, the Interior Department is responsible for Native Americans and is obligated to defend and to protect and even to intercede in court on behalf of the Indians, and the Attorney General is required to represent the Secretary of Interior in that relationship.

When I came into office a year ago, this case had been continuing for a long time. And if you think back a year, you can remember that almost every property owner in Maine was in danger of not being able to transfer their own property or to buy additional property, because no one could get a clear title even to their own land because of the threat of the Indian lawsuits.

Well, obviously, I've got as much as I can handle as President. And I could recognize very clearly that there are more non-Indians than there are Indians in Maine. So, politically, there's no advantage in trying to resolve a question of this kind.

I could have washed my hands of it and said let the people of Maine sweat it out. But I felt then that there was a need for us to resolve it fairly quickly, and we've been working on it for a year.

I sent the best lawyer I know up here to work with it, Judge William Gunter, and he worked out an agreement that he thought was fair, that the Indians rejected. Later, I got Eliot Cutler from Bangor, Maine, knowing your people, to come in and take over as the head of a negotiating committee.

What we've worked out, I think, is a very good resolution. The Indians have accepted it. And what it says is that anybody in Maine that owns less than 50,000 acres of land will no longer have to worry about lawsuit attacks on their rights or deeds to their own property. That's an agreement that I reached on behalf of the American people and the Congress will have to ratify.

The only ones left still not resolved are 14 landowners in Maine who have more than 50,000 dollars (acres)<sup>1</sup> and the State of Maine itself. What we have negotiated doesn't put any obligation on those large landowners, nor the government of Maine.

The Indians have said, if you want to accept it, fine. We are ready to accept it on those terms. But if the Governor of Maine or the 14 landowners don't want to accept it, they have three choices. They can either continue to negotiate, they can accept the agreement that we worked out and have an end to it, or they can stay in court and litigate. I have no preference about it.

I don't have any personal interest in it, as you well know, but I thought it was good to get this question out of the way as quickly as possible to let the people of Maine, in two-thirds of the area of your State, stop worrying about possible future lawsuits about which they know very little and over which they had very little control.

So, I think I've done my job as well as I could. We have not imposed the will of the executive branch on the State of Maine at all. The government of Maine is still completely free to do anything it chooses.

Q. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. One other part of your question, how many other States will be in a similar condition, I don't know. My own preference is that the executive stay out of it and let, you know, the Interior Department, representing me, and the Federal courts settle it. But I felt that in this particular case, so many citizens were adversely affected in Maine, that it was a special case. But I hope that this will be the only instance of this kind in which I, as President, will be involved.

WOOD ENERGY SOURCES

Q. Mr. President, I am Ed Meadows. I live in Hamden, Maine, just down the river from Bangor. You are certainly correct that we in New England are much concerned with the dilemma of energy sources and supplies in this region. And for that reason, references to wood energy in your opening statement were very heartening. However, we know that up until this point, that the ERDA administration has not been particularly concerned or convinced about the potential for great regional impacts and balance of payment and other benefits that wood energy could have.

My question is, therefore, what specific steps will your administration now take to ensure that wood energy plays a more prominent role in Federal energy policy?

THE PRESIDENT. Last November, I think, maybe December, I had the State forester from my own State come up to Washington to meet with me and to meet with the head of the American Foresters, who works in the Agriculture Department, to expedite research and development in the use of wood for energy.

About two-thirds of the State of Georgia is covered with forests. A lot of that forestland is suitable for paper pulp or timber, most of the soft woods, the pines, poplars. But we have thousands and thousands of acres of land that's not good for pulp wood nor for timber construction that would be perfectly suitable for fuel. And there are some fast-growing species of trees, as you know, that would give us a replenishable supply.

The problem is the cost of harvesting lumber. We now are experimenting with chippers that can take a whole tree and run it through the chipping machine in the forest; load it on dump trucks that can take it directly to the railroad siding, and with vibrators on the side of the boxcars, can haul substantial quantities of that material to major plants nearby.

I think that this is a subject that needs more attention. Jim Schlesinger has been to the White House specifically to discuss this with me, and we will increase our research and development effort in this use of wood far beyond what we've done in the past.

I can't give you an exact figure yet on what will be advocated, but it will be a top priority for me because I know at first hand how valuable wood is. But if you'll give me before we leave or give one of my staff members your mailing address, I'll get Dr. Schlesinger to give you in writing a more specific answer, spelling out in detail what projects we have underway now and what we advocate for the future.

Q. Thank you very much. We appreciate your understanding of this issue as a scientist. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Q. Mr. President, my name is Dave Porter from Hampden. I am also a teacher. I'm a science teacher at Weatherbee Junior High School. As I understand it, you are planning to recommend implementing a separate department of education. What benefits do you feel that this will have on our educational system?

THE PRESIDENT. There is already a bill in the government organization committee under Senator Ribicoff, to set up a separate department of education. When I first went into government, I was on a local school board. I ran for the Georgia Senate, and I was the chairman of the university committee and in the education committee.

When I was Governor, I would say I spent 25 percent of my time, at least, working on improvements in education.

Since I've been President, we have a Cabinet meeting every Monday morning for several hours. And then I meet with my Cabinet officers, two or three of them individually each day.

I doubt that I've spent a half of 1 percent of my time dealing with educational matters as President. Education is buried deep within the same department as health and welfare, which are the more dominant matters of interest, at least in Washington. And I believe that in that process, education is neglected.

There's a tremendous opportunity in our country to get back to basic education. We've got too many people, I think, going into the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth grades that can't even read and write. And we've got too many vocational and technical schools, career training programs, high schools, even colleges turning out students that are not accurately matched in their learning capabilities with the jobs that are available when they graduate.

There's very little correlation between jobs that need to be filled and the product of our educational institutions.

I think that this is also a matter that ties very closely to employment, in the comprehensive education and training programs, you know, working with both private employers and also with the State and local governments as well as the Federal Government, where you can have a combination of training and education. I've just advocated recently a tremendous increase in scholarships and loans, grants and work-study programs for college students.

The Federal Government is just now getting involved in that process. We also have a real need to tie together the training and education programs for the mentally afflicted Americans, or those who are slow learners, and in many ways I think the Federal Government ought to give more attention to education.

I think the control of the education system ought to be at the State and local government. I don't want to get the Federal Government into controlling of any colleges or high schools or grammar schools or kindergartens. But I just would like to have as President a much more sure sense that I'm devoting an adequate amount of my own time to bringing about a raising of educational standards in our country.

We spend too much money and get too little education benefits back from it, and I think a separate education department or agency with that one single responsibility would give education the high visibility on a national level and the voice of the President promoting better education, that I don't think will ever be possible with education buried in Health, Education, and Welfare.

WOMEN IN DECISIONMAKING POSITIONS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Mary Smith, and I'm from Bangor.

During your campaign for President, you made a firm commitment to put more women in decisionmaking positions should you become President of the United States. I was on the State steering committee for the 51.3 Carter-Mondale campaign.

Do you feel that your administration has in fact put more women in decision-making positions than your unenlightened Republican predecessors? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. At the executive level of Government we've got, I would say, at least three times as many women now as we had before. We still don't have enough. The General Counsel for the Defense Department is a woman. Juanita Kreps, the head of the Commerce Department, as you know, is a woman. The person who's in charge of all the housing and urban development programs, of public works programs, is also a woman. And we've had the first women appointed as U.S. attorneys and also women being considered and appointed for Federal judgeships.

I think that we have a difficulty in that it's hard to locate women with proven records in business administration or local or State government administration or in the Federal Government that we can promote into a major job, because they've been discriminated against for so long.

But we have on the regulatory agencies, as well, in the top regulatory agencies, appointed women in major positions of responsibility. Compared to what my predecessors have done, we've done an excellent job; compared to what we can do, we have not yet done so well. But we are doing better every day.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

Q. Mr. President, Morris Shay, 36 Grove Street, Bangor.

Mr. President, there's been a lot of talk in recent years about the role of the Federal Reserve Board and its impact on our economic welfare. How do you envision the Fed's role under your new Chairman, Bill Miller, and do you feel that they will be of help to you as you try to meet your goals?

THE PRESIDENT. The Fed should always be independent and not subservient to a President. I'm sure that you are well aware that the President, the Congress, and the Federal Reserve Board have a joint responsibility under our legal structure.

I, as President, for instance, can with my Cabinet make many administrative decisions that concern the rate of spending of money, what month the money is spent, what part of the country the money is spent in. I can propose the overall budget figures, and the Congress quite often complies, within reasonable limits, with the President's proposal.

The Congress has an equivalent responsibility, for instance, in the tax laws. They can modify very quickly the tax laws, giving an instant rebate, which has a profound effect on the economy.

And at the same time the Federal Reserve in controlling the flow of money into and out of the banks can determine how much money is extant at one time and indirectly control the interest rate.

So, I think those three can balance one another.

I had a good working relationship with Arthur Burns, and I have a great respect for him. I think he did a good job. As you know, his major concern was inflation. But I think that under his administration, which was combined with a Democratic Congress and Democratic and Republican Presidents, including myself, the inflation rate continued to grow up, and I think the interest rates last year went up too much.

I don't say that in criticism of him. But I think Bill Miller will be an outstanding person. I felt it was time to bring in a tough, competent business leader into the Federal Reserve Board system and not just a professional economist or even a banker.

Bill Miller is someone who is intimately familiar not only with business management but he also understands international trade problems. And he's been one of the most dedicated and unselfish public servants I've ever known in trying to enhance job opportunities for minority groups, young people, Vietnamese veterans, and so forth, working with private business.

I think Bill Miller will bring a very well balanced approach between controlling inflation on one hand, enhancing the value of the dollar overseas with sound international trade practices, and at the same time, he has a heartfelt commitment to cutting down the unemployment rate.

Also, I think that Miller will be much more inclined to at least consult with me and the Congress, perhaps, than Chairman Burns was, because he's a younger man, he's coming in, and he knows that he has a lot to learn, as do I.

So, without any criticism of Arthur Burns, I think that we will have a very good administration of the Federal Reserve Board under Bill Miller.

LORING AIR FORCE BASE

Q. Mr. President, my name is Bill McDonald. I'm a master sergeant in the United States Air Force, and I live here in Bangor, Maine.

My question, Mr. President, is what are your feelings on the proposal to close Loring Air Force Base?

THE PRESIDENT. When the decision is made, probably later on this year—almost surely later on this year—I'll make a judgment as to what I think is best for our country, its defense, with attention to the efficient use of money and, obviously, with its strategic advantage in case we are attacked over the Arctic Circle in a war.

Under the previous administration, when President Nixon I believe was President, maybe President Ford, a decision was made to close Loring Air Force Base or to cut it down substantially. Ed Muskie and Bill Hathaway recognized that in addition to environmental questions and defense questions and Federal budget questions, there's a major additional factor of economic damage to the northern part of Maine if Loring Air Force Base is closed.

I have asked Secretary of Defense Harold Brown to reassess the decision made by the previous administration about Loring. And I've told him to take into consideration not just environmental questions and defense questions but also the economic impact on Maine of closing Loring Air Force Base.

I don't know what their decision will be when it's recommended to me. But I do know that there's a much better chance now to keep Loring Air Force Base open because of the interest of your Senators, your Governor and others, and because of my interest, than there was before.

But I can't promise you at this point that I'll keep Loring Air Force Base open at its present full strength. But if there's any doubt whatsoever about the overall balanced impact, then my inclination would be to maintain Loring at as high a strength as possible. But I'll have to wait until I get the recommendation before I know the final answer.

ABORTION

Q. My name is Elizabeth Vickery. I live in Orrington, Maine.

Mr. President, during your election campaign, you stated you were against using Federal funds for abortion.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. Congress has recently passed a restrictive Hyde amendment. Could you give me your view of HEW's liberal interpretation of this amendment?

THE PRESIDENT. I do not favor and I have not favored the use of Federal funds to finance abortions. I am willing to use Federal funds if the pregnancy is a result of rape or incest.

I think, though, that this should be administered in such a way that women are not encouraged to lie about it and to use that legal, congressional mandate as an excuse for abortions when no rape or incest has taken place. And if it appears to me and to Joe Califano, who feels the same way I do about the question, that the ruling is being abused and that women who have not actually been raped or had a pregnancy caused by incest, then I would favor a tightening up of those HEW regulations. I think we ought to be very strict about the administration of the law and the ruling.

INDIAN LAND CLAIMS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Francis Anthill, I am a Penobscot Indian, full-blooded. I live at Indian Island, Maine.

Would you veto any attempt by the Congress to abolish the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy Indian land claim suit?

THE PRESIDENT. I doubt that I'll face that prospect. I can't imagine the Congress abolishing a lawsuit by statute.

I would say yes, I would veto such legislation.

Q. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Now, let me add one other thing, because I'm not sure I understand all the meaning of your question. If I felt that the suit had been resolved in a fair way, say, based on the settlement that the Indians have already agreed to, then the lawsuit would no longer be necessary. But I would not take away the rights of the Indians that have already been negotiated by short circuiting the process with Federal legislation.

Is that what you meant? In other words, if the lawsuit is successfully negotiated and the Indians accept the negotiation, then the lawsuit would no longer be needed; is that correct? Did I understand your question right?

Q. Would you veto any attempt by the Congress to abolish the Passamaquoddy and Penobscot Indian land claim suit?

THE PRESIDENT. The answer is yes. I would veto any legislation that would try to resolve the whole Indian claims question just by abolishing your suit. Yes, I would veto that.

IMPORTANCE OF THE INDIVIDUAL

Q. Good evening, Mr. President. My name is Marie Mathieson, and I live in Bangor, and I attend John Baps High School.

My question to you tonight, sir, is, whom do you consider contributes more to the welfare of our country, a coal miner or a United States Senator? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, there are coal miners who are now United States Senators. And there are peanut farmers who are now United States Presidents. [Laughter] So, I don't think you could say who contributes more. Quite often when someone does become a United States Senator, it's because in their own profession—whether it be a college professor or a schoolteacher or a farmer like myself or a miner or perhaps an engineer or business executive or a lawyer—they have shown leadership qualities, and they've either been in the Congress or been a Governor and proven to be a good representative of many people. And because of the trust that they've built up among people who know them, they've been sent to the United States Senate in a much more responsible job.

Obviously, a U.S. Senator has more impact as one person on our Nation's attitudes and perhaps its welfare than one individual coal miner would. But that doesn't mean that coal miners as a collective group are not very important.

I think each person in the eyes of God is of equal importance. And I would guess that many coal miners, if they never go away from their homes more than 10 miles, could do as many or more great things in the eyes of God and their families and those who know them than even a President could. So it's hard to say who would be the greatest.

DEFAULT ON STUDENT LOANS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Cathy Lewis, and I'm a resident of Veazie, Maine. My question for you is, with the recent news concerning defaulted governmental educational loans, will there be new and stricter requirements when applying for a Government-guaranteed loan?

THE PRESIDENT. For college education?

Q. Yes.

THE PRESIDENT. The answer is yes. In the comparison of Federal employees' names with students who have deliberately defaulted on loans, we've found many people who are now drawing a good Government salary who just did not pay their student loan. And Joe Califano is now requiring those Federal employees to pay off their loan without working a hardship on them and their families because of too high a payment per month.

One of the things that has endangered the entire college aid program has been the deliberate cheating by college students off the taxpayers when they signed a contract, "If you will lend me money to get my college education, I will repay it and let that money go to help another student." And because of a loophole in the law, many students would finish college and immediately declare bankruptcy so they would not have to repay the loan. I don't have any sympathy for a student who does that on purpose. And I think we ought to do everything we can to collect those loans when they've been made in good faith and received in good faith, because the ones who suffer are the taxpayers in general and also other students who could benefit if that first student did his or her duty.

THE PRESIDENCY

Q. My name is Sharon Corvey, and I live in Bangor.

Mr. President, I am a second grade teacher at the Abraham Lincoln School in Bangor.

My class and Donna Chappitt's class have been studying about the many facets of a President's job. Our second grade children would like to ask these questions: What part of your job is the hardest? What part of your job do you enjoy the most? And do you get dizzy flying in Air Force One? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Can I take my choice? [Laughter] No, I don't get dizzy flying in Air Force One. Sometimes on a long trip with a lot of stops and not much rest and time zones changing, you know, I can't say that I'm particularly in charge of all my faculties. But I don't really get dizzy. [Laughter] I think the most enjoyable thing that I have to do as President is just to realize the tremendous history that has preceded me in the White House and what our Nation stands for and the difficulties and challenges that have faced the American people, and the courage and strength and the cohesiveness of Americans in overcoming those difficulties.

Every single President has lived in the White House, except George Washington.

The White House was built while he was President. And I walk through the White House sometimes, you know, alone, and see the portraits there of Thomas Jefferson and his little writing case and go in the Lincoln Bedroom where the Emancipation Proclamation was signed and think about the difficult times they had and the time of Harry Truman and Franklin Roosevelt when we fought the Second World War and Woodrow Wilson at the conclusion of the First World War, and I think about the strength of our country.

So, I think the most gratifying thing is feeling that the American people have trusted me, that I'm part of this tremendous Nation and that I share a heritage and a history and a future in the greatest country on Earth. It's a very reassuring thing.

I think, obviously, the most difficult thing is to recognize the limitations of a President's power. There are so many things that I would like to do instantly that take a long time. But I think in general that frustration that I feel is a good thing.

The balance of power between Presidents and Governors, between the President and the Congress, between the Congress and the courts, although it's frustrating, it also is good. There are some difficult decisions that I have to make—SALT treaties with the Soviet Union, I would like to be able to eliminate nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth and prevent other countries—[applause]—and I would like to prevent other countries from developing explosives that don't have them now. And I would like to see the Middle East peace negotiated.

And you know, I would like to see a good health insurance program and welfare reform and the State—and the Federal Government, rather, reorganized, the tax system reformed. I have to negotiate and work with the Congress.

And sometimes I'm impatient, but then the more I've gotten to know the individual Members of the Congress, the more I see that they have a special experience and an expert knowledge that I don't have. And they bring up questions that I haven't thought about.

So, I have to be very cautious about how I move forward. In general, though, I would say that I have enjoyed being President.

Our family is close together now. We enjoy the house where we live in. It's convenient to my working place. [Laughter] The salary is very good, and the perquisites are nice. And I think the reception of the American people has been good so far.

We've addressed some very controversial questions, and I feel that I've got adequate support from the American people. So, I think the most enjoyable thing is knowing that I'm part of a great nation.

The most difficult thing is the limitations that have built in to a President that makes his actions checked and balanced with others, both internationally and domestically. But I think it's one of the greatest jobs I've ever had.

Q. My second graders thank you very much, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Tell your second graders to come and see me and Amy. [Laughter]

Q. They would love to. We've talked a lot about Amy, and they really would like to meet her.

THE PRESIDENT. You bring them to Washington, and I'll be glad to see them. [Laughter]

HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Q. Good evening, Mr. President. I would like to ask a question on employment as far as the handicaps are concerned. Are we going backward or forward?

THE PRESIDENT. I think in the last 12 months in carrying out the mandates of the Congress, with the implementation of employment standards in the Federal and State, local governments, and also in private industry, that we've made the greatest step forward in ensuring handicapped Americans rights that we've ever taken.

I think most of the groups that represent handicapped people agree that this is true. It applies not only to jobs and to educational opportunities, to special education grants and loans that are available but it also applies to physical facilities, the design of buildings, the design of buses and other transportation available.

So, I think that we've made a major step in the last 12 months, not because I initiated it but because we carried it out—a decision that Congress had made before. So, I think we're moving forward with the handicapped.

Q. Mr. President, please send our fondest wishes to your wife, and we love you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. I love you, too.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Hello, Mr. President. My name is Jack Arruda, and I'm from Bangor, and I attend Bangor High School.

Mr. President, don't you think that it's contradictory to sell arms to Middle East countries when you're pushing for peace?

THE PRESIDENT. No. [Laughter] And I'll tell you why.

I have promised and I will carry out my promise to cut down year by year the quantity of arms sold to overseas markets.

We'll obviously have to meet our treaty obligations with NATO and with Japan and with New Zealand and Australia. Other than that, though, each year the amount of arms we sell will be reduced.

We have already begun discussions with other arms suppliers—France, Belgium, Great Britain, the Soviet Union—to try to get them to join with us in this commitment. So far we are moving on our own. We have made some progress.

Later on this year the United Nations will have a general disarmament conference, and many of those leaders that I just described to you will be speaking at the United Nations. And I may go and make a keynote speech there myself.

In the meantime, the Soviet Union is selling tremendous quantities of arms, very advanced in nature, in Ethiopia, in Libya, Iraq, and Syria, and formerly they sold large quantities of arms to Egypt.

Our historic commitment in the Middle East has been to keep Israel strong and secure, and obviously we are honoring that commitment.

The Saudi Arabians have very close relations with us, as do the people of Iran, and as you know, they are between Israel and the Soviet Union, in a very highly tense part of the world. We've never before sold Egypt any weapons that could be used in an attack. The F-5E's, which I have asked the Congress or will ask the Congress next week to sell to Egypt, are not nearly so advanced as the F-15's and 16's that Israel is getting. And no one could think that the F-5E's could challenge an F-15 or an F-16.

But you have to remember that we cannot abandon our own friends in the Middle East. If we did, Egypt would soon be overrun from Libya or perhaps even from Ethiopia. And we cannot afford to let that happen.

I might say in closing that it's not a matter of confrontation between Saudi Arabia and Egypt on one hand and Israel on the other. We're trying to negotiate a peace settlement there, and I think we have an excellent chance to succeed this year. But Egypt has to be able to meet the threat from other sources as well. So, we're doing three things. To recapitulate: We're trying to get other nations to join in with us in cutting down the sale of advanced weapons around the world. Unilaterally, we're cutting down the quantity of arms we sell overseas. At the same time, though, we have to meet the legitimate defense needs of our allies and friends so that they will be secure.

MALPRACTICE INSURANCE

Q. Mr. President, Joan Holmberg, Maple Street, Bangor.

Each State is currently undergoing much debate and legislation over malpractice insurance due to the problem of increasing premiums from the increasing financial awards. How do you feel the Federal Government could help in this dilemma which might in the long run be able to keep down the cost of medical care?

THE PRESIDENT. One of the things that has been done in some States is to have a three-person board that acts as a mediator for a given hospital community, where the doctors agree and the hospital agrees and the patients agree that when they go into the hospital, if there is any malpractice involved and the patients suffer therefrom, that the patients would choose one member of the negotiating board, the doctors would choose one member, and perhaps either the courts or those two would choose another.

And instead of going into a lawsuit, where the doctors might suffer from unscrupulous lawyers, that they would be negotiated between the patient and the doctors and a fair payment made.

That's one legal procedure that has been used in some areas. When I was in Rhode Island earlier today, I visited a health maintenance organization which goes an even greater step. And I strongly favor this kind of health care.

They have in Providence, Rhode Island, about 28,000 people who come in individually or who work in small or large factories. And they pay a certain amount of money per year per family, and they have their health needs taken care of on a continuing basis—the emphasis on the prevention of disease.

Every adult goes into the clinic where, I think, 25 doctors work, and they have a physical examination, complete, once a year. A small baby would go in every 3 weeks or perhaps every 4 months when they get to be 2 years old—I don't know the exact statement. But they form kind of a partnership between the patients on the one hand and the doctors on the other, where the doctor's best interests are served if the patient doesn't have to go to the hospital.

The average cost for excellent health care there, including hospital costs, is about half the cost for Americans on an average. And they use the hospital about half as many days per year as the average American does. At this time, as you know, it's sometimes to the advantage of the doctors; it's sometimes to the advantage of the hospital. And the patients pay in the long run through insurance premiums to put the patient in the hospital where they don't need to go at all.

My wife recently, for instance, had a tumor in her breast, and it turned out later to be benign, not malignant. And she went to Bethesda [Naval] Hospital, and she was only there about an hour, and she came back home.

But if she had been in Plains and had gone to the local hospital, chances are that she would have been admitted to the hospital and stayed a day or two because the doctor and the hospital would want her to stay there. So, I think that this kind of approach to health care—prevention, outpatient care, a constant relationship between the patient and the doctors—is the best broad-range prevention against abuses from malpractice suits, and I think it would help to prevent malpractice itself.

The old family physician is not the common thing now. In the situation I described in Rhode Island, though, each family can choose their own doctor, so there is a close relationship there. So, I think that's a free enterprise system. It's not even a Federal program.

If we have a national health program in the future, I think this would be kind of a pattern that might be used, either using insurance companies or some other means to manage the financing. So, I'd say those are two approaches that could serve to control malpractice suits.

The last point I'd like to make is that this is kind of a regional thing. The most severe threats to physicians on malpractice, I think, is in California. And it's kind of a community attitude that if a malpractice case does arise that enormous payments or fees can be collected from the doctor or the hospital above and beyond the actual damages that incur on the patient.

So, I can't give you an answer. I don't know the answers. But that's two ideas that just come to mind on the spur of the moment.

Q. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. I'm not a lawyer or a doctor. Thank goodness I'm not a patient right now, so I'm not very well qualified on it.

CYPRUS

Q. Paul Perdikas, 94 Third Street, Bangor, Maine. I was wondering—

THE PRESIDENT. What was your last name?

Q. Perdikas.

THE PRESIDENT. Okay.

Q. Do you know how to spell it?

THE PRESIDENT. That's all right. [Laughter]

Q. I was wondering what are you going to do about the Cyprus situation over there in Cyprus? They're having a lot of hard times, you know. And most other Presidents haven't done anything. We're all depending on you to do something. We hope you will.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

The first thing I did when I got to be President was to talk to Cyrus Vance, the Secretary of State, to see what we could do about the Cyprus question.

It's very complicated, as you know, because in the past the leaders of Turkey and Greece have not been willing to communicate with each other. And they have nations that are sharply divided on the argument over the Aegean Sea rights, both the rights of passage of ships and also possible future explorations for oil in the area between Greece and Turkey, in the ocean.

I sent Clark Clifford to represent me, and he met with Demirel and Caramanlis at that time. Recently, Turkey has had a new election, and Ecevit has been elected now the Premier of Turkey.

Recently, Secretary Vance visited both Ecevit and Caramanlis and urged them to make progress toward a resolution of the Cyprus question. They have now agreed to meet personally with each other in March, this coming month.

This is a very good step in the right direction. We have pending now mutual defense treaties between ourselves and Turkey, ourselves and Greece. They've not yet been concluded finally by Greece, Turkey, and the Congress.

I would hope that if we could make major progress toward a Turkey-Greece settlement of the Cyprus issue, using the local administrators there working with Turkey and Greece, that we could proceed to bring Greece and Turkey back into NATO.

So, we're doing all we can. I think that there's a limit, though, to what the United States can do, because the Turks and Greeks are highly independent people and the right progress has already been made now—the scheduling of direct talks between the heads of state in Turkey and Greece.

Q. Okay, so as long as you do your best, you'll win in 1980.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, if we can get that done, it will be a great step forward. Thank you.

ABORTION

Q. Mr. President, my name is Jerry Thibodeau from Bangor. Do you believe that abortion is the taking of human life; if so, will you be taking any steps to protect this vulnerable life?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I do. I have come from a State and from a family which is highly religious. Georgia and Texas had the two very stringent antiabortion State laws that were stricken down by the Supreme Court while I was Governor.

As soon as that was done, under my leadership as Governor, Georgia passed the strictest abortion law that was permissible under the Supreme Court ruling. As you know, the ruling, in effect, said that no State could prohibit abortions during the first 13 weeks, and later in the second and third trimesters that they could prevent abortions. Georgia took that stand in a very strong way.

As President, you know, I favor, as I said earlier, the prohibition against the use of Federal funds for abortions, recognizing that under the Constitution of the United States as interpreted by the Supreme Court, States are authorized to permit abortions under certain circumstances.

So, I do think that abortions are the taking of a human life, and I have done and will do all I can to minimize the need for abortions.

I might say that there are things that can be done to prevent an unwanted birth—an education program, the availability of contraceptives for those who believe in their use, family planning programs, more easy adoptions, and so forth. And we are moving on those areas, too.

I might add one other sentence, and that is that Joe Califano, who is the head of HEW, is a very devout Catholic, as a matter of fact—I happen to be a Baptist—and his views on abortion, I believe, are the same as those I've described as mine.

Q. Could I add one thing?

THE PRESIDENT. Please.

Q. I think the effect of the Supreme Court decision has been to legalize abortion on demand for the full 9 months of pregnancy, rather than just the first trimester.

THE PRESIDENT. But the point I was trying to make is that a State, if it wishes, can prevent abortions in the second and third trimesters. A State cannot prohibit abortions, I think, in the first trimester. That's what I understand about it.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Q. Mr. President, I'm Marie Urbanski from Orono. We agree on one fact, at any rate. I agree with you that life is unfair.

My question is this, Mr. President: Would you be willing to use the power of your office, the great moral power that you have, perhaps make a fireside chat to awaken the Nation to the importance of extending the time for the passage of the equal rights amendment?

THE PRESIDENT. I can't promise you the fireside chat, but I do favor the extension of the time for the ratification of the equal rights amendment.

My wife, Rosalynn, is in Tampa, Florida, today trying to get the equal rights amendment ratified in Florida.

This ruling has been issued by the Attorney General, Griffin Bell, that it would be constitutional to extend the time for ratification, and legislation will be considered by the Congress.

The Congress would have to pass such legislation. I support it. And if it is passed, I will sign it with pleasure.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

OIL SUPPLIERS

Q. Mr. President, I am Chris Cookson, and I'm from Brewer. My question is, I would like to know where you plan to get oil if the Mideast refuses to sell to the United States?

THE PRESIDENT. Okay. This will have to be the last question. But, Chris, that's a good question to ask, and it's one that's very important to your area of the country in particular.

As you know, the OPEC nations, the oil-producing and exporting nations are not all Arab countries. And I think it's accurate to say that now we have a much better relationship with the Arab countries than we had in 1973, when an embargo was placed on our country.

We've now gotten to be very close, for instance, to Saudi Arabia, the major oil-producing nation of the world. And Iran is a very good friend of ours, and so are others.

Outside of the Middle East, there are major suppliers of oil. England is now able to export oil from the North Sea. We will be building up our Alaska oil production to about 2 million barrels per day. Mexico has great reserves of oil that they're just beginning to explore for. Venezuela provides a large portion of our oil—that's a country in South America, as you know.

Nigeria is an OPEC nation in Africa. We now have a very good relationship with Nigeria. Formerly, when Secretary Kissinger was in office as Secretary of State, we had such bad relationships with Nigeria that they wouldn't permit him to come into the country to visit. But now we have good relationships there.

So, I would think that there's much less of a chance for the OPEC nations in the Middle East to declare an embargo against us because we are better friends than we used to be.

Secondly, many nations outside of the Middle East who are OPEC nations can provide us with oil. We have a major supply of oil in our own country. We produce now about 50 percent, a little more than 50 percent of what we use. And we have strict conservation measures that could be built up.

One other point is that we are putting in the ground, in underground storage, in salt domes, about 500 million barrels of oil which will be built up by 1985 to a billion barrels of oil. This is enough to carry us over for about 8 or 10 months, even with a total embargo against our country.

I will do all I can to prevent an embargo. And as I said many times during the campaign, if another nation declares an embargo against us, I would declare a total embargo against them and not ship them any food, not ship them any weapons, not ship them any spare parts for the weapons they've got. And I've made that very clear.

So, I believe that we won't have to face that prospect. If we do, with our reserve supplies and other supplies of oil from non-Middle East countries, we can get by.

We also, obviously, have large supplies of coal and natural gas that can be substituted with hardship, but we could get along.

Let me say one other thing before I have to leave. This session has been very helpful to me. It's a very enjoyable thing for a President to get out of Washington. And I forgot to tell that to the second grade. But to come back and visit with friends who took me in when I was a lonely, unknown candidate is a very fine experience for me as President. And I thank you for it. You've had some very challenging, very difficult questions. I don't claim to know all the answers. And part of my answers have not been adequate for the questions that you've asked. But I really appreciate your hospitality here.

And I would just like to remind you of one thing in closing: We do have problems, economically, politically, sometimes we've been embarrassed with our government officials' actions. But we're still the strongest nation on Earth. We're still the best nation on Earth. We're still the greatest nation on Earth. And I think all of us would serve ourselves and our country well to think about the good things and the positive things and the tremendous future that we have as Americans.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:03 p.m. at the Bangor Auditorium.

Following the town meeting, the President spent the night at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Murray of Bangor.

Nashua, New Hampshire

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session at a Town Meeting With New Hampshire High School Students. February 18, 1978

MAYOR AREL. Mr. President, Senator McIntyre, Senator Durkin, members of the Board of Aldermen, students, ladies and gentlemen:

My name is Maurice Arel, and as mayor of Nashua, it is my pleasure to welcome all of you to our city for today's historic New Hampshire town meeting.

We in Nashua have been visited by Presidents of the United States before, but never before have so many of our citizens had a chance to share their views with the Nation's Chief Executive.

So we are proud, Mr. President. We are proud not only that you are here, but that you have come to meet in a special open forum with the people of New Hampshire.

Ladies and gentlemen, I can think of no more appropriate person to introduce the President than our own senior United States Senator, Thomas J. McIntyre. While serving New Hampshire for more than 15 years in Washington, Tom McIntyre has come to represent the essence of the New England town meeting tradition—an honest, open, courteous way of doing business.

Ladies and gentlemen, it's my pleasure to present to you United States Senator Tom McIntyre.

SENATOR MCINTYRE. Mr. President, Senator Durkin, ladies and gentlemen, students and teachers, special guests and dignitaries:

Today we welcome Jimmy Carter back to New Hampshire. In a sense his visit is a homecoming, for it was just 2 years ago this month that the voters of our State provided the first indication that he would win the Presidency some 10 months later.

This was not the first time New Hampshire voters of one party or the other anticipated the eventual outcome of the Presidential election. Indeed, our first-in-the-Nation primary has been an unfailing bellwether in seven consecutive primaries dating back to 1952. Today, the man we foresaw into the White House long before many others did has come back to New Hampshire. He has come here to engage in a public dialog with the young people of our State. But before I invite the President to the podium, I'd like to say a few words about him, about the people of New Hampshire, and about the format of this program.

The first thing I want to say is that I believe Jimmy Carter's performance as a President has vindicated New Hampshire's judgment of him as a candidate.

We all know you've had some disappointments in your first year in office, Mr. President. Not everything you set out to do has been accomplished. But I think you should know this about the people up here. They are realists and they are fair-minded. They don't expect miracles from their Chief Executive, any more than they expect to agree with him on every point and every issue. What they do expect of their President is this: They expect him to love justice and to hate iniquity and to stand for the very best that is in us as a people.

You have met those expectations, Mr. President, and that's why my readings up here show that there is a wide and a deep reservoir of good feeling for you among the people. We like you, Jimmy Carter, and with all our hearts we want you to do well.

We are especially pleased to have you meet with us in the context of one of our honored traditions, the New England town meeting. Here in New Hampshire, we still believe that the town meeting offers the most democratic, direct, and effective means of conducting the course of government, because the decisionmaking process involves the entire community. Those decisions are made after the free and open exchange of views, and this is what we seek here today.

Now a word of explanation about the procedure we will follow. The President believes, and I share that belief, that we must do all that we can to encourage the involvement of young people in the process of government. With that in mind, he suggested that a representative cross-section of the high school students of New Hampshire be invited here today to ask questions and exchange views with the President of the United States.

More than 500 students were invited. And after his opening remarks, the President will respond to the questions they have prepared. That said, ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. It's good to be back in New Hampshire, back in Nashua. The first time I came here as a candidate, the crowd who met me was not quite so large as this. [Laughter]

We had a political rally in a small front living room, and there were a lot of empty seats that faced me that evening. But as I campaigned for months here in your State I not only made many dedicated friends who later gave me a victory in your crucial primary, I not only learned a lot about New Hampshire, your special attitudes and your special hopes and dreams, but it gave me in microcosm a good preview of what I was to face in the 29 other primaries that I entered in 1976.

Here is focused in an unprecedented, unequalled way, a sense of person-to-person campaigning. Your demands on candidates even for President are quite severe, because you want to know in detail stands on issues, personal characteristics, and the dedication that that candidate has to win an ultimate victory in spite of tremendous, adverse odds.

The first time I came to New Hampshire was in 1974 to campaign with Norm D'Amours. We walked the streets and shook factory shift hands, and I learned then about the intense, personal commitment of New Hampshire people toward government.

You have very good political judgment. The election of Congressman D'Amours then, and again in '76, your long-time commitment to the superb leadership of Senator McIntyre, the recent election of John Durkin, and last but not particularly least, your support of me in 1976—thank you for it. I'm glad to be with you.

THE COAL STRIKE

Just before walking into this auditorium, I received a report from Washington that the coal mine operators and the coal miners are willing to continue their negotiations today. This is a very difficult negotiating process. It has broken down on several occasions, but the constant involvement of Secretary of Labor Marshall has been successful so far in at least continuing the discussions, the dialog, the probing for an agreement.

If no agreement is reached, it would be a severe blow to the miners themselves. It would be a severe blow to the coal mine operators and owners. It would be a severe blow to the collective bargaining process and, also, a severe blow to our country.

We hope and we pray that we can be successful. The prospects right now are not particularly encouraging. But we are dedicated to continuing that process to avoid much more serious intrusion into the free enterprise system by the Federal Government through various means.

So we will be continuing today and tomorrow, if necessary, these discussions. It's just a late news item in which I thought you might be interested.

I'd like to make a brief statement on an issue that is important to you here in New Hampshire and around the country, and then I'll start answering questions for roughly an hour and 15 minutes. I have heard through the grapevine that you've been carefully preparing your questions.

I don't know what any of them will be, but I'll try to do the best I can to be frank with you. Young people don't like evasion, they don't like equivocating, and I know that my own standard of performance as a President is going to be judged by you according to how well and how truthfully and how frankly and thoroughly I answer your questions.

FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM

When I came to Washington, a little more than a year ago for the first time, I was surprised and pleased to find how good our Government was. But I'm still not satisfied, and I believe it can be better.

One of the ways it can be better is through Government reorganization and, specifically, through civil service reform. For more than half our Nation's history, the Government was changed almost entirely and completely from top to bottom, every time a new President went in office.

The party that won the election would kick out all the old officeholders and replace them with new ones—maybe or maybe not qualified—who were loyal to the victorious candidate for President.

A large part of every President's time and energy was spent just taking up personnel matters. Abraham Lincoln said that it was the most difficult thing that he had to contend with as President. This system inevitably led to government by favoritism, it led to corruption and incompetence. There was no room there for evenhanded, highly professional, competent, professional managers, independent of either party.

Plenty of people know how bad the system was. But it took the tragic assassination of a President, James Garfield, by a disappointed officeseeker who had not been appointed, to provide the push that led to the creation of a professional civil service. This was done in 1883, when Chester Arthur was President. In the 95 years since then, the huge bulk of Federal officeholders have been professional civil servants. Only a few thousand jobs, much less than one percent, are still filled by Presidential appointment.

Creation of a permanent, professional civil service was a major Government reform. There's no question about that. And yet in some ways, that very system has become over the years an obstacle to what I want to see—the very best possible government for our country. The Federal civil service is still basically sound, but its machinery has grown old and complicated and rusty.

Too often nowadays, the system stifles individual initiative and protects the cozy jobs of even those within the system who don't do a good job. Too often, the length of time that the employed person has served is automatically rewarded, as if you were automatically promoted from one grade to another in school whether or not you passed any of the courses in which you were enrolled. No one is more frustrated by this situation than our thousands of hard-working, competent, and dedicated public servants themselves. I found this to be true on the State level when I was Governor of Georgia. People told me ahead of time that if I tried to reorganize the State government, the civil servants would be opposed. But by and large, I found to my surprise that they were the ones that wanted most to have a good government in which they could do their life's work with effectiveness.

We need an improved civil service on the Federal level, a system that rewards those who serve well, disciplines those who are inefficient or incompetent or irresponsible, and gets rid of those who can't do their jobs well at all. We must restore the merit principle to the civil service. By early next month, I expect to announce full details of such a plan and submit it to Congress for approval. This plan will create stronger safeguards against the abuse of official power. It will reward merit, not just longevity. It will reduce redtape and delays. It will simplify and speed up the way we handle employee grievances and disciplinary actions. It will make it easier for women and for members of minority groups to get ahead or get fair treatment in the Federal Government. And it will allow every single department of your Government in Washington to meet the needs of the public with more efficiency.

I hope it will help us to make a government that people like you will want to work in, the best and the ablest young people in our country. If you should choose Government service—and I hope many of you will—I want you to find yourselves in a system that allows you to give our country your best.

Thank you very much. Now, I'd be glad to answer your questions.

QUESTIONS

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. I am Cass Spanos from Stevens High School in Claremont, New Hampshire. Mr. Carter, President Sadat of Egypt has shown a great deal of courage in initiating peace overtures in Israel. Do you think you have done anything to negate or to disrupt these negotiations by agreeing to send fighter planes to Egypt?

And further, do you feel that by taking this action the Israelis will be pressured into making more concessions with Egypt?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't. I have met already with Prime Minister Begin, personally, on two occasions, and he will be coming to our country next month on the 14th and 15th and 16th to meet with me again.

Every time I've ever met with him, either privately or within a small group, his first request has been to go ahead and approve or recommend to the Congress approval of the sale of very advanced fighter planes, the F-16's and F-15's, our best planes of all, to Israel.

The previous administration and I have promised our long-time friends and allies, the Saudi Arabians, to sell 60 F-15's to them. The Egyptian request was much more modest—to sell them the F-5E's, which is not a very advanced fighter plane. It's of fairly short range. And to be perfectly frank, in a combat situation, they would not be a match for the F-15's.

I thought it was proper and advisable and hope the Congress will approve the sale that I have advocated to the Israelis, the Saudi Arabians, and the Egyptians. It will not upset the balance of strength in the Middle East. I would say that the Israeli Air Force will still be the dominant and the most efficient and effective air force there by far.

One reason that I wanted to honor President Sadat's request is that a few years ago, Egypt was closely allied with the Soviet Union and was completely dependent upon Russia to give them their military weapons. Since then, Egypt has moved toward us, and now Sadat and I have the closest possible personal relationship, and Egypt is one of our own closest possible friends. So, we cannot leave Egypt defenseless.

I don't think there's any likelihood at all of a war between Egypt and Israel.

They're well on the way toward peace. But Egypt is still threatened by some of their neighbors. Libya has heavy shipments of arms coming in from the Soviet Union; Ethiopia, the same; Iraq, the same; Syria, the same; Algeria, the same. And Egypt has got to be able to defend themselves. The weapons that they did buy, years back, from the Soviet Union are now becoming obsolete.

And so I think this is a well-balanced package. It does contribute to a greater sense of security in the Middle East among our own friends and neighbors, and I think it also does not upset the balance of military power in the Middle East. I might close by saying this: I pledge myself each year while I'm in office to cut down on the volume of sales that we make to nations of this kind. And we will reduce our sales.

We've also begun to discuss this issue with other arms suppliers, not only France, Germany, Belgium, Britain, and so forth, but also the Soviet Union. And we hope that we can get a worldwide commitment to lessen or reduce the sale of those conventional weapons at the same time we work to reduce and then, hopefully, to eliminate nuclear weapons in the future.

Thank you very much.

TAX REDUCTIONS AND THE BUDGET

Q. Mr. President, my name is Ken Estey. I belong to Calvary Christian School in Derry, New Hampshire, and I live in Brookline, New Hampshire. My question is, during your campaign for the Presidency, you expressed a desire to balance the budget by 1981 and reduce the size of the Federal Government. How can this be accomplished in the light of the fact that you approved a budget of over $500 billion, which is a sizable increase over the last budget?

THE PRESIDENT. The budget that I've recommended to the Congress has the least increase in spending of any budget that has been produced in the last 4 or 5 years, only a 2-percent growth in the budget itself. Obviously, the programs that have already been approved by the Congress and by my predecessors in the White House have to be financed.

We had a substantial economic stimulus package that was passed in 1977. This has had very good benefits for our country and, in the long run, will pay rich dividends even in balancing the budget. For instance, in New England, just a year ago, the unemployment rate was 8½ percent. At the end of the year, the unemployment rate in New England had dropped to 5½ percent, a full 3-percent reduction in the unemployment rate.

This is because we were able to give about $6 billion in tax reductions. We were able to provide jobs and training for young people and all those who were unemployed, and we were also able to give many other services to the people. These are temporary programs, but I will send to the Congress next week a recommendation that this $13 billion investment in education and training for those who are unemployed will continue.

Obviously, the Government saves money in the long run by having a million people working and paying taxes than if they are on the welfare rolls or drawing unemployment compensation.

We could have had about a $20 billion reduction in the amount of the deficit this year if I had not wanted to give a tax reduction. But I've advocated to the Congress reducing the net taxes on all our people by $25 billion this year. Again, that's an investment in the future. I think the Government ought to cut down on the amount of money that we collect from people and then spend on Government programs.

I still am committed to do my best to balance the budget in 1981. And we'll have a much less deficit next year than the budget that I just presented. Our projections now show that if the economy does stay strong, which it is at this moment, we still have an excellent chance to get the budget balanced. But we are holding down the growth in Government.

Tom McIntyre is the strongest advocate in the Senate of taking care of, for instance, small business leaders and giving tax reductions to them and cutting down on paperwork and unnecessary regulation by the Federal Government.

I think that we can make our free enterprise system work. And we are strong in moving toward the goals that I described to you during the campaign. We're making good progress. That progress will continue.

Thank you.

NATIONAL HEALTH CARE

Q. Mr. President, my name is Ann Sheahan from Dover High School in Dover. On June 12, 1976, you stated that our present national health care system is in need of drastic reorganization and that our Nation lacks a workable, efficient, and fair system of health care.

In your press conference on November 11, 1977, you said it was too early to lay down a schedule on the issue of a national health insurance. When will we see a schedule, and will the bill be introduced to Congress early enough for it to be acted upon?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I will present to the Congress an actual bill, after hearings all over the country and after congressional committees have hearings themselves, before the end of this congressional session.

One of the things that I have learned is that the Congress doesn't move as fast as I had anticipated. And one of the reasons is that certain committees in the House and Senate have extraordinary responsibilities. For instance, in the Ways and Means Committee in the House and the Finance Committee in the Senate, they have responsibility for the economic stimulus package, for tax reform, for tax reduction, for the welfare system, for health care, plus the very important elements of energy and other matters. And there's a limit to how much they can consider at the same time.

So, this year they are working on energy. They're working on tax reduction and tax reform. They're working on welfare reform, and before the year is over, before they adjourn for next fall, they will have a completed bill recommended by me to them for a comprehensive nationwide health care system.

PRESIDENT'S RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

Q. Mr. President, my name is John Bryant, and I attend Conant High School in Jaffrey, New Hampshire. What I'd like to know is what do you think about the Bible prophesy in Isaiah 19, verses 23 and 24, apparently being fulfilled in our times, when Egypt and Syria will be aligning themselves with Israel in the last days? And in what way has being a born-again Christian affected your role as the President?

THE PRESIDENT. Very fine. I believe that one of the great, positive factors in eventually finding a resolution of the differences in the Middle East is the deep religious conviction of both Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat.

They and we, as Christians, worship the same God. Our religious beliefs differ in some degrees. But there's a special interrelationship between the Arabs in Egypt and the Jews in Israel.

They recognize Abraham as a common father of them all. And I think they understand, as you say, the prophecies in Isaiah as applying to both peoples, that peace between Egypt and Israel is foreordained by God, and that they play a role in carrying out God's purposes.

The second part of your question about my being a born-again, devout Christian and how it's affected my public life is one that I've had to address many times. There was a great deal of doubt in the country when I began my campaign because I am a devout Christian.

I've never found that this interfered with my performance of duty as a Governor or as a candidate or as President of our country. I recognize very clearly the prohibition in the Constitution about an unwarranted intrusion of the state or the Government into religion or vice versa.

I worship daily. The last thing I do every evening is to have a private worship service with my wife. We never fail to do this. I pray frequently during the day. I seek God's guidance. I don't try to use the power and prestige of my office to cause other people to adopt the same faith that I happen to have.

I don't think this is contrary to the hopes or the expressed beliefs of our Founding Fathers. In the Constitution of the United States, we recognize God as the guiding leader of us all.

We leave people a right to either worship Him or not, or to worship whatever form of God they choose. But I found it very beneficial to me to have something in my life that never changes.

In the face of constantly changing political and military and economic circumstances, my religious faith doesn't change. And it's a stabilizing factor in my life. It binds me closer to the members of my family; it gives us something in common. And I believe and hope that our Nation's deep belief in God will be a stabilizing factor in generations ahead.

So I would say it's very good for me. Thank you.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT'S CAMPAIGN PROMISES

Q. Mr. President, my name is Bryan Gifford. I'm from Concord, New Hampshire, and I represent Concord High School. After reading several evaluations of your first year in office, one underlying point that I seem to notice throughout all of them was that you may have promised a bit too much during your Presidential campaign. You said, quote, on December 28, 1977: "I think my biggest mistake has been inadvertently building my expectations too high." My question then, sir, is looking back on your first year in office and in light of this, what are you looking forward to in this coming year?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, let me say that I still stand by all my campaign promises. There are two factors that made me make that statement. It was the night before I left on my around-the-world trip. One was that, as I've described earlier about the national health program, that the Congress can only deal with so many issues simultaneously because, quite often, one or two committees in the Congress have to handle a series, a wide range of issues, and the Congress has simply moved slower than I had anticipated.

The energy question is one. We've never had a national energy policy. And I proposed an energy policy on April 20 last year. The House of Representatives passed my proposal, basically intact, before the recess in August. The Senate later passed a completely different version of an energy policy. And since the late fall, the House and Senate conferees have been trying to resolve their differences, so far unsuccessfully.

We haven't given up hope there. This is an issue that's been before the Congress for more than 30 years. The first natural gas deregulation bill was vetoed by Harry Truman, I think, in 1950. So we are dealing there with an issue that's almost the most difficult domestic issue that the Congress could possibly face. We're both a major oil producer—one of the greatest producers of oil in the world; we are also the greatest consumer of oil in the world. And those conflicts are slow to be resolved.

The same thing applies to many other issues. We've made our proposals to the Congress, and I don't think we've proposed too much.

The other point I'd like to make is that when I made those promises to the American voters, I never said that I would accomplish everything the first year. I've only been in office 13 months, and I've about 3 more years to go. And there has been some patience exhibited by the American electorate and also by the news media, but when you get to the end of the first 12 months and say that you haven't done everything that you promised to do in 4 years, that's not a fair way to measure what I and the Congress have been able to do together. There's a very good sense of partnership and mutual responsibility now that exists between the White House and the Capitol Hill Members of Congress. And I think this has not been the case in the past.

So I'll stand behind my campaign promises. I think the American people have to realize the difficulty of some of these issues, be patient with me and the Congress, recognize what we have accomplished, and I'll be much more careful in the future about the rate of recommendations to the Congress to accommodate their very careful, very beneficial process for passing major legislation.

Thank you.

STANSFIELD TURNER

Q. Good morning, Mr. President. I'm David Carle from Contoocook Valley Regional High School in Peterborough. The CIA has been run by a civilian all its history, except for at its birth and now. Why do you have Stansfield Turner, a military man, running the CIA, with all of his ties to the Pentagon?

THE PRESIDENT. The legislation that originally established the CIA specifically authorized the leadership of either military officers or civilians. The only prohibition is that both of the top two people cannot be military officers. Stan Turner is one of the most competent and brilliant and forceful leaders I have ever known. He happens, coincidentally, to have been a classmate of mine at Annapolis. I never knew him then personally. He was so far above me in academics and in leadership that I just admired him from a distance. He was a star football player. He was the top officer in the Naval Academy Brigade of Midshipmen, and he was right at the top in our class.

He was a Rhodes Scholar afterwards and had a brilliant career in the Navy. He was one of the first members of my class who ever made admiral and then made four-stripe admiral. He was the leader, a president of a Navy War College in Rhode Island, and completely transformed a relatively dormant organization into one that is vibrant and aggressive and very beneficial now to the Navy, to the Armed Forces, and to our country.

Because of those reasons, after considering many people, I thought that Stan Turner was the best person to lead the intelligence community. I still think so.

As you know, by far the majority of total employees involved in the collection and collation, dissemination of intelligence are in the military. They collect information on a tactical basis that's used every day by me, the State Department, and by the Secretary of Defense and others.

And so far, I am completely and totally satisfied and pleased with the performance of Admiral Turner. He obviously has a very difficult and sensitive job to perform. The CIA had very low morale when he came there. Its trust by the American people had been damaged because of the revelations of past illegalities. And he's worked closely with me, with the Intelligence Committee in the Senate, the new committee in the House, to evolve a structure for the entire intelligence community which gives him a much more important job than he had in the past.

Now we have what we call a tasking committee to decide what the major responsibilities of collection and dissemination of intelligence information are. He'll be in charge of the whole thing now. He'll be in charge of the entire intelligence community budget, both that in the CIA and that in the military as well. So, because of the recognition of his good leadership qualities in the past and since he's been head of the CIA, there's no doubt in my mind that he is the right man for the job.

Thank you.

NUCLEAR POWERPLANTS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Karen Thompson. I'm from Epping High School. And I'd like to know, do you feel that the design of the plants like the Seabrook nuclear plant sufficiently protect the resources of the ocean?

THE PRESIDENT. Karen—is that right?

Q. Yes.

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, the Federal courts and State courts have been involved in the Seabrook plant discussion for, I think, about 3 years. At this point, all the Federal agencies have determined that there is no prohibition against proceeding with the Seabrook plant.

They don't have a license yet from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, but I think that's a likely prospect. In the last few hours, there's been another court ruling issued that temporarily delays the issuing of that license.

My own background in graduate school is as a scientist, in the early stages of nuclear power development and use for peaceful purposes.

While I was Governor, I approved the construction of a major nuclear powerplant in Georgia and approved another one that has not yet been built. I think there's a legitimate place in our country for nuclear power. The environmental considerations that have been the major obstacle at the Seabrook site is a matter to be resolved by the people who live here in this State and by the Federal courts that provide a voice for people who are dissatisfied. As far as the technical elements that are under my own responsibility, directly or indirectly, the Seabrook powerplant design meets those requirements.

New England, as you know, is heavily dependent on uncertain supplies of energy. In this whole region, you rely in an extraordinary way on imported oil. Georgia produces 85 percent of its electric power from coal, and we import very little oil. I think that there needs to be a coordinated approach here in this New England area, in New Hampshire, to make sure that offshore oil drilling is permitted, that oil can be imported and coal can be imported without delay, and that nuclear power can be produced.

Whether or not the Seabrook plant is the best site for a nuclear powerplant, I can't decide that, and I don't have the authority nor the desire to do so. Some States, as you know, through referenda or through action by the State legislatures, have put very tight constraints on the location of powerplants and whether or not they could be built at all. In some States, it's illegal now to build a nuclear powerplant at all.

I think the nuclear powerplants are safe. There has never been and cannot possibly be an explosion of a nuclear powerplant. It's physically impossible. And the safety record there among nuclear powerplants is far superior to the safety record of powerplants that are fueled by oil or by coal.

So, I think that we have a problem concerning environmental quality, the protection of your beach or seashore areas, that addresses itself to the people here with an ultimate voice in the Federal courts. Technically, though, the Seabrook plant is qualified. And I think there is a legitimate role in the future as there is in the present for nuclear power.

My first preference is for permanent energy sources, like solar energy. The foremost proponent of solar energy in the Congress is Tom McIntyre.

Wood is a major, replenishable supply of energy that's growing by leaps and bounds in its use in New England and also in my own State of Georgia, where two-thirds of the State is covered by forests. We have wind power that can be introduced, a form of solar power, as you know.

You have tremendous tides up here and ocean current gradients that can be used in the future. Domestic oil and natural gas need to be distributed here. The new energy proposal will help you get natural gas on the same price level as exists in other parts of the country, which will be quite a change for the better. We hope to increase the production of coal.

But after all those possibilities are explored and exploited, there is still a need in the foreseeable future for nuclear power. And I think New England is one of the areas of our country that needs nuclear power perhaps better than some others.

So, that describes as best I can my attitude on the subject. If the courts rule that the people's interests are being met by continuation of the Seabrook plant, in spite of my own record as a very devout environmentalist, as President, I would approve its construction.

Thank you.

AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, I am David Young from Fall Mountain Regional High School in Alstead, New Hampshire. My question to you is this: The Soviet Union and Cuba are supplying Communist influences in south African nations with arms, technical assistance, and troops. Why is the United States not being a political and military leader and just being a political liaison?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you probably know, up until just recently, our country played no significant role at all in Africa. Since I've been in office, we have greatly increased our interest, involvement, and influence in Africa—southern Africa, to which you refer, and also the rest of the continent.

I would say that on the West Coast of Africa or among the black nations, the most heavily populated, the most powerful, the most influential, perhaps the richest, is Nigeria.

Earlier, when Secretary Henry Kissinger tried to go to Nigeria for a visit, they refused to permit him even to come into their country. Because of the superb leadership of Andrew Young and his trust throughout the continent of Africa, we now have a very good friendship with Nigeria.

During the Easter recess of the Congress, I intend to go to Nigeria, to Lagos, to meet with the leaders there. We have formed with the British, French, Germans, Canadians, a five-nation bargaining committee who are now working between the Southwest Africa People's Organization—we call it SWAPO—and the South Africans to resolve the questions in Namibia.

Just this past week—this week, as a matter of fact, Cy Vance, our Secretary of State, was in New York at the United Nations meeting with the Foreign Minister of South Africa and the leader of the SWAPO organization to try to provide majority rule in the territory in the southern and western part, formerly known as Southwest Africa.

In Rhodesia, again, we have joined with the British, who legally still have responsibility for Rhodesia, to bring about a resolution of those differences—a peaceful resolution of those differences—based on majority rule, based on the right of any person more than 18 years old to vote to choose the leaders who present themselves in a free, open, and democratic election, to try to assuage the legitimate demands of the blacks who live there under the domination of a very small group of whites.

We look upon South Africa and their form of apartheid as completely contrary to the principles that Americans have always espoused. The only American leader that I know who's endorsed, in effect, apartheid and condoned or approved the attitude of the South African Government is your own Governor here in New Hampshire.

But there is a growing realization throughout Africa, I believe, that the United States is a strong and formidable force. I might say that we have not been successful in Angola. There is a government there headed by Mr. Neto, who is not a friend of ours. There is still a guerrilla movement there under the leadership of a man named Savimbe, who still struggles for ultimate power in Angola. He is supported by several of the European nations, directly or indirectly.

But I don't know of any instance in South Africa in the last 2 years where our own influence has not been increasing. I know of no place where it has been decreasing. And we've tried to spread our influence not on the basis of military intervention as a single nation, but we've tried to bring in other leaders both in Africa and the black nations, the Organization of African Unity, and the European nations and Canada, to join with us to bring about a peaceful progress of majority rule, independence, and democracy in South Africa, and to minimize the influence of the Soviet Union and Cuba, which was increasing very rapidly up until a year ago.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

STANDARDS OF GOVERNMENT

Q. Good morning, Mr. President. I hope you enjoy your visit in our State. My name is Keith White. I attend Manchester West High School. I live in Bedford.

Your position as a Christian was probably a very major element in your winning campaign. I'm curious, what do you think the Government's responsibility to the spiritual and moral development of its people should be? What do you think it is? And since you have been President, how have you tried to meet that responsibility? I think this is a very pertinent question to the youth here, because in our times, there is a great deal of misleading forces in the world.

THE PRESIDENT. Keith, that's a good question, and I'm glad you referred to youth. I think if there is one group in our Nation who is the most alienated and disillusioned when public officials do not exemplify decency and morality and humanity and sensitivity and compassion, it's young people. You've been in the forefront, you and others who are now older who were your age, of trying to restore morality to our country within our Nation and on international affairs.

When we were struggling in this country to give black people and other minority groups equal treatment under the Constitution—the simple right to vote, to go to school, to have a job, to own a home—young people were the ones who were courageous enough to endanger their physical health or even lives to strive for an unpopular cause.

When our Nation was involved in the war in Vietnam, the ones who first spoke out and said, "This is a war that's not compatible with the principles of America" were young people. At first it was a tiny group. Then it grew and grew, primarily through people your age or perhaps college age. And eventually the older people, the parents said, "Well, maybe my child is right." And ultimately, we withdrew from Vietnam because of the influence in young people demanding that our country stand for the same principles on which it was founded and which made it great.

I sensed, as I campaigned throughout this country for 2 years, that there was a frustrated feeling and a sense of despair and even embarrassment about some of the things that had been happening in Washington: the Watergate revelations, the breakdown in compatibility and partnership between the President and the Congress, the constant blaming of one another for mistakes that were honestly made, the revelations about illegalities in the CIA, and involvement in the Vietnam war, as well.

And I think that we felt that on an international basis, that our country had abandoned those principles. We espoused any sort of totalitarian dictatorship if it furthered our own interests temporarily in different parts of the world. And we forgot about trying to spread what we stand for among the other nations of the world.

In my own acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention, in my inauguration speech, I promised the American people that when I was President that the principle of human rights would again be raised as a banner behind which American people could rally and of which American people would again be proud.

And this is what we have tried to do. It's a difficult and sensitive issue, because it's easy to say you're for human rights but it's difficult to force other nations over whom you have no control to honor the principles of human rights. We've made very good progress.

I welcomed the new Ambassador, for instance, the other day, from Indonesia. This past winter, this winter, I think in December, Indonesia released 10,000 political prisoners. Some of the countries in South America who have been dominated by military dictatorships have now committed themselves to have democratic elections.

I don't believe there's a single leader in a country in the world who doesn't think frequently, or even constantly, about the question of human rights: "How is the world going to judge me in how I treat the citizens who are ruled by my administration?" We've made good progress already. But I think the restoration of that decency and common sense and humanity and morality to our own Government is the only thing that can hold us together.

And when you think back through history, even the most unpopular Presidents now are the ones that are identified as being the greatest. And they were the ones that made difficult decisions based on the principles of religion that you described. Abraham Lincoln was probably excoriated or criticized most by the press of almost any President who ever served, but he did what he thought was right. Harry Truman's popularity went down to 23 percent—the lowest that any President has ever had—but he did it because he thought it was right to begin giving black people a chance to have equal treatment in the Armed Forces, not popular in the South.

He wanted to restore Europe with a great financial aid that came from the taxpayers' pockets in this country, not a popular thing at all. He gave aid to Turkey and Greece. He organized the United Nations. And now, I think it's generally accepted that Harry Truman is one of our great Presidents.

I don't consider that they were great because of something within them, and the same thing applies to me. But I think the greatness comes from accurately exemplifying, in the White House, the highest principles of the American people. And the demands that you make, the direct involvement that you have as young people in government, will help to restore those standards, make them more rigid and more demanding. And I think whether or not an incumbent officeholder is a mayor or a Governor or a Senator or a President, Democratic or Republican, that you ought to demand the utmost in ethics, integrity, and morality from them. If they don't measure up to your standards, I hope you'll work as hard as you can to put somebody else in office.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

NATIONAL ENERGY PLAN

Q. Good morning, Mr. President, and welcome to New Hampshire. My name is Carol Ann Mongeon, and I'm from Newmarket, New Hampshire, and I go to Newmarket High School. My question is, Mr. President, do you feel that in 1978 an adequate energy program will be passed, and if so, could you please explain why?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I believe that an adequate energy program will be passed. I've described earlier the difficulty of it and the intense lobbying that is going on constantly on Capitol Hill.

The oil companies have enjoyed a position of privilege in our country for too long. We've not had a fair distribution of natural gas or oil throughout our country. There have been wide variations in price, which prevents the natural gas companies from wanting to send that fuel to New England. Your fuel costs in this region are about 45 percent higher, on the average, than the rest of the country. And if, for instance, a large conglomerate corporation has 10 different factories and they have a drop-off in sales of, say, 10 percent, and they have to close down one of those factories, and all other things are equal as far as competence of labor and wage rates and so forth, but energy costs are 45 percent higher, then you labor at a disadvantage in trying to keep the job opportunities here in your region of the country.

There's another problem in that we have not adequately addressed research and development and a spreading of our use of energy to other sources that are more plentiful or even renewable. That's got to change.

I think we're becoming more and more aware that our whole economy is dampened because we import now, last year, $45 billion worth of oil from overseas. It makes us vulnerable to interruption of those sources.

We need to emphasize conservation, to start building and repairing homes, to get more savings in the rapidly increasing price and cost of energy.

So, in research and development, increasing production of oil and gas and coal in our own country, fairer distributions, more equitable cost or prices, the increase in the security of our country by reducing the threat of interruptions of supplies—all those things combined together are part of our energy package. And the need is so urgent that I sincerely believe that the Congress will successfully resolve this issue. And those are the reasons that I believe so.

But in the confusion with television advertisements and so forth, quite often American people don't get aroused to demand from their Members of Congress that they take immediate action. In the meantime, the oil companies and others are aroused and their lobbyists are working day and night. And quite often, a doubtful Member of Congress only hears one side of the question.

So, I hope that you and all your friends will let your Members of Congress know how important this is. The Democratic Congressmen and Senators have been very helpful in areas that don't produce oil and natural gas. Some of them even in the oil-producing States are now seeing the need and the advisability in the long run to pass an energy package. So, I just hope that we can get this done before we have crises that really hurt us to demonstrate how serious the need is. So, those are the reasons that I think an energy bill ought to be passed. Those are also the same reasons that I think the Congress will pass one.

Q. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, Carol Ann.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Q. Mr. President, my name is Dean Eggert. I represent Lebanon High School and live in the city of Lebanon. Do you feel that the recently proposed changes and amendments to the suggested Panama Canal Treaty are necessary, and if so, would you please tell us why?

THE PRESIDENT. The Panama Canal treaties have been under negotiation now for more than 14 years. These treaties were originally signed in the early part of this century, between the United States and a Frenchman who benefited greatly from the treaties themselves.

No Panamanian ever saw that treaty before it was signed, and no Panamanian has ever signed the treaty either. We are not ashamed of having signed that treaty or built the canal. It's a source of great pride to me, as President, to know that American engineers were able to bring the canal into being. It's been helpful to our own country, to Panama, and to the rest of the world.

Those people have known in Panama that the terms of the treaty were not fair to them. As a matter of fact, Theodore Roosevelt, who was then the President, Secretary Hay, who was Secretary of State, said publicly, "These treaties are highly favorable to the United States. They are not favorable to Panama."

Over that whole 75-year period, the Panamanian people have been expressing their displeasure. And back 14 years ago, when President Johnson was in office, there were outbreaks of violence in Panama by dissident groups who wanted to have control of their own territory and a stronger voice in the operation of the canal.

The canal is important to our country. Our security, our economic well-being is dependent upon a continued operation of the Panama Canal that we can use. We have never had sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone itself. That has always been under the sovereignty of Panama. We've paid them rent on that zone every year from the very beginning, beginning with $250,000 and increasing as we've gone on. This is an issue that I think is very important. It's obviously of crucial importance here in New Hampshire.

We have to get, as you know, a two-thirds vote in the Senate. There is no political benefit to be derived by me or any Member of the Senate in voting for the canal treaties themselves.

I think the canal treaties negotiated are good. I think they are better for our own country—[applause]. Thank you. They're better for our own country. They're better for Panama. They preserve our permanent right to use the canal. They preserve our permanent right to defend the canal. They preserve our permanent right to go to the head of the line and use the canal expeditiously if our warships need to do so.

And I hope and I believe that the Senate, in a great demonstration of patriotism and courage, will ratify the Panama Canal treaties.

Thank you. [Applause] That made my trip worthwhile. Thank you.

PRESIDENT'S RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Bruce Prevost. I attend Hillsboro Deering High School in Hillsboro. You've mentioned in two previous questions your sincere beliefs in the Bible and God. And in relation to this—and in the Old Testament it mentions many times where God has called the nation to repentance for their immoral actions and things they have done.

And I would like to know, do you feel you are in a position to do this before the American people and before God, and would you do it?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, my own religious faith is one that's much more personal. I feel that we have a direct access to God through prayer and that repentance is a personal thing. I don't believe that it's my responsibility to repent before God for what our Nation has done in the past or may do even while I'm in the White House. I think that's something that has to be initiated and carried out by individual Americans.

Obviously, if I see a sinful act or an improper or heartless act being carried out by our Nation in the past or present or future, it's my responsibility as President to stop that action and to condone through action, for inequities or suffering that has been caused by it.

So, I don't know any better way to describe the question than that. I don't consider myself to be the spiritual leader of this country. I'm the political leader. I have a right, I think, and a duty to be frank with the American people about my own belief. And I'm not a priest nor a bishop nor someone who, you know, fills a religious pulpit and is authorized nor asked to repent for the whole country.

I've answered your question in a fumbling way. But that's the way I feel about it. And I recognize my own personal shortcomings and sinfulness. I do ask God to forgive me. I try to do better. And I think that the American people, whether they are religious or not, have the same strong inclination to correct deficiencies, to repair wrongs, to turn ourselves in a much closer way, personally and collectively, to exemplify the highest possible moral principles on which our Nation has been so great.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, my name is Jim Evans, and I attend Nashua High School. My question concerns the coal strike, and you talked about the negotiations currently going on. But what if they don't reach an agreement? Will you invoke the Taft-Hartley Act and, if so, when? Do you have like a deadline set in your mind at all?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, let me say that if any such action should be required in the future, an action by Congress or an invoking of the Taft-Hartley Act, it would be a major loss for our country. It would hurt me as President. It would hurt the mine owners and the mineworkers. It would hurt the status of the United Mine Workers union, which is already on shaky grounds because of divisions and intensely fought recent elections. It would hurt the entire bargaining process, where working people have a right to negotiate with their employers for fair working conditions.

There is also a history among mine-workers of intense independence and an aversion to the intrusion of the Federal Government into their own lives.

Obviously, as President, I cannot permit the country to suffer from a delay in negotiations. Last night, we were at the point of narrowing down the issues between the owners and the workers to a very few but important points.

The way the negotiations are taking place is that there is a negotiating team or committee representing the workers, that's nine people. The employers have a negotiating team of their own. And there is a so-called bargaining council of 39 people representing the workers.

We brought all of those now together in the same building, the Labor building, and the Secretary of Labor moves from one group to another. They are quite often separated from one another in different rooms, caucusing. And he tries to explore some common ground on which they might agree.

The dissatisfaction with the present proposal is lessening. But there are some hard and firm positions that are difficult to change. So, we will continue, and so far successfully, to get the leaders of the workers and owners to continue to negotiate. And progress has been made. I can't predict success.

I'll be back in Washington this afternoon about 2:00 or 2:30, and on the way back on Air Force One, I'll get a telephone call from the Secretary of Labor describing to me what the current situation is then. We'll decide our own strategy, try to keep the parties involved in Washington. I will intercede personally, if necessary. It may be necessary for the Secretary of Labor to evolve a proposal that could be presented to both sides as his own. We don't know that yet.

But it's very doubtful, if the Taft-Hartley law is invoked, that the Federal courts could force miners to go in those deep mines and work. And then you are faced with the proposition of law enforcement officers on one hand and miners on the other, and possible violence, incarceration of the workers, continued loss in their salaries, no restoration of their pension funds, no restoration of their health care benefits, the mine operators losing money every day, the country suffering. And I don't want to face that prospect and neither do the miners or owners.

But if I have to, of course I will take such drastic action if the entire collective bargaining process breaks down. I don't want to predict that yet, because I still have confidence that the miners and owners and I and the country want to have the situation settled through collective bargaining. But that's always a possibility that's on my shoulders as a responsibility, and of course, I would not avoid it if I have to take that action.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

FOREIGN ASSISTANCE

Q. Mr. President, my name is Susan Bachelder. I'm from Pittsfield High School in Pittsfield. I just want to know, we are sending billions of dollars to help poor countries to feed their people. And I was wondering why we don't send food to help the nations instead of money, and this way we could get rid of some of the surplus food that we have that is making the farmers get such low prices for their produce.

THE PRESIDENT. Very good. For a number of years, we've had what is known as Public Law 480, which permits the transfer of food and feed grain products from our country directly to people who are hungry. We are expanding that program now, and both the Senators behind me on the platform are strong supporters of that particular aspect of our foreign aid program.

In other areas, we make long-term loans to countries to permit them to buy our own products, food and other products as well, which tends to keep American workers employed and increases our exports of goods produced in this country.

The amount of actual cash money that's given to another country is very, very small compared to those other programs that I've described to you. We have a mixture in our foreign aid program of that kind of humanitarian support—food, feed grains, loans, economic aid to let them build electropower dams, irrigation projects, highways, hospitals, schools—and the hard loans, so-called, where they have to repay just as firmly and with substantial interest payments as if your parents or you borrowed from a bank.

But we are expanding the very aspect of food distribution that you've described. That's an excellent thought that came from you, and I think it shows very good thinking.

We've now got substantial surpluses on hand of soybeans, corn and other feed grains, and wheat, for making food. This is an excellent idea that you've described. It's one on which we are already moving. And I think it's a much better way to distribute aid than the loans in the past. I have said often during the campaign that I'm not in favor of collecting taxes from the poor people in our rich country and giving that money to the rich people in the poor countries. And that's what we're trying to do in Government now.

Thank you very much.

EDUCATION

Q. Good morning, Mr. President. My name is Anne Mary Dulski, and I am from Mount St. Mary's Seminary here in Nashua. I'd like to know why do you propose to establish a separate department of education, and would this mean that there would be more Federal controls on education in the future?

THE PRESIDENT. I am not, under any circumstances, willing to see the Federal Government have more control over colleges, high schools, grammar schools, kindergartens, or any other aspect of public education or private education in our Nation. The reason for advocating a separate department of education has nothing to do with control.

When I was Governor of Georgia, I spent about 25 percent of my time trying to have a better education system in our State. It was a constant challenge for me, and I was constantly involved in it, working with the State administrators in education, the classroom teachers, PTA groups, and others.

When I became President, I was deeply concerned about the quality of education in our country. We spend enormous sums of money. We have, in many instances, young people who graduate from high school who can't read and write. They know very little about the political structure of our own Government. They know very little about the principles on which our Nation was founded.

Too many students who have an undetected problem at the third or fourth grade level are automatically promoted to the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth grade not being able to read and write. They obviously can't learn other subjects. And I just feel that there are many ways in which the Federal Government can work more closely and in harmony with the State, local governments and private institutions to give education a boost.

I haven't spent a half of 1 percent of my time since I've been President dealing with education issues. It rarely comes up in my weekly Cabinet meetings. When it does, it involves something concerning the Civil Rights Act or some legal aspect of education.

Twice, now, since I've been President, we've had all the State school superintendents come into Washington. The last time they met with me for an extended meeting at the White House, in the White House Mansion itself, to try to get some way where we could have a cutting down of paperwork requirements and a much more active and accurate way to channel available Federal funds into our education system.

I don't think we'll ever have the visibility for education, I don't ever think we'll have the personal involvement of the President and the Secretary at the Cabinet level in education to promote its good points, to correct its deficiencies, as long as we have the department of education buried underneath health and welfare. I just think it needs to be separate.

Thank you.

I might say that there has been already introduced in the Senate, in the Government Operations Committee under Senator Ribicoff, a bill that would establish a separate department, and we will not introduce a separate piece of legislation. We will add our support politically from the White House and administration to the legislation already being considered by the Congress.

PRESIDENT'S PARTICIPATION IN TOWN MEETINGS

Q. Good morning, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Good morning.

Q. My name is Susan Zaremski from Winnacunnet High School in Hampton, New Hampshire. And I was wondering, how seriously are you really going to take our questions and concerns said today?

THE PRESIDENT. I have only one profession that completely occupies my life, and that is to be a good President of the United States. And one of the constant fears that I have is that I will act in a way, as President, that's incompatible with and contrary to the concerns and hopes and dreams and aspirations of the American people.

This is the fourth or fifth townhall-type meeting that I've had. I have no idea ahead of time what questions will be asked me. There's no way that I can brief myself before I come in here, predicting what your questions will be. And I have no influence nor do I want to have any on what you ask me. But I presume that after an hour and a half of this kind, when I analyze what the questions are, that fairly well represents what your interests might be here in New Hampshire.

I had a similar meeting, as you know, last night in Maine. I've had other ones in Mississippi; another one in Massachusetts. And I listen very carefully. The tone of the questions and the response of the audience is of profound importance to me and has a great effect on me. So, I don't know of any better way to get the sense of our Nation than to listen to your questions and to observe your reactions.

There is no possible way that you could affect the future deliberations of a President any better than through this kind of forum. So, I would say that your effect on me has been and will be very profound.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

GOVERNOR MELDRIM THOMSON, JR.

Q. Good morning, Mr. President. I'm Joseph Danko from Merrimack Valley High School in Penacook, New Hampshire. Two questions: How do you feel about Governor Thomson's recent trip to South Africa? Do you agree with his statements dealing with equal rights?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, he has a right to go to South Africa.

You know, I told you I was going to be candid with you. There are very few things on which your Governor and I agree. [Laughter] And specifically, his comments during and after his trip to South Africa, in my opinion, are completely contrary to what this country stands for. But at the same time, one of the things that this country stands for is the right of free speech. And he has just as much of a right to express his opinion as do I.

TUITION TAX CREDITS

Q. Good morning, Mr. President. My name is Beth Loy, and I represent Timberlane High School in Plaistow, New Hampshire. The tax break of $250 for college students is such a ridiculously low figure compared to the total cost of about $4,000 for a college year. How was this figure arrived at?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't advocate a tax credit as a means to help finance college education for the middle-income families. On the contrary, what we have proposed, and what I hope the Congress will approve, is a combination of direct grants to students whose families have a moderate or low income, loans to students in the low-, moderate-, and middle-income group, and work-study programs, where the student can receive part-time employment to help finance college education.

We will increase throughout our country the number of students who can participate in these loans by 2 million, which is about, almost, a 50-percent increase at one time, if my own proposals are put forward. They are much more narrowly focused on the student who actually needs help, and they are much less costly to the Federal Government than giving a tax credit. So, I do not favor the tax credit proposal. I think it's ill-advised. I think the combination of the grants, loans, and student work programs are a much better approach. And I will try very hard to get the Congress to approve those this year.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Q. Mr. President, my name is Donna Schroeder, and I am representing the Presentation of Mary Academy in Hudson. My question for you this morning is what action would the United States take if we sign the treaties and, once the Panamanians have control of the canal, they close the canal to our use?

THE PRESIDENT. This will have to be the last question.

There is no possibility of that. The Panamanian people would be much more inclined to want to keep the canal open if the treaties are approved than if they are disapproved, regardless of what the Panamanian Government wants. Even though they have been dissatisfied with the terms of the present treaty, they recognize that keeping the canal open is an important economic consideration for them.

We want the canal to stay open, but it's crucial to the Panamanians. The treaties specifically say that the canal will be kept open and available for use to ships of all countries. And if a need or emergency should arise, our own ships, our warships, could go to the head of the line, ahead of any ships, and go through the canal expeditiously.

We retain the right to defend the canal during this century and forever. And if the Panamanians should close the canal, I would take whatever action is necessary to protect the canal and to keep it open.

Let me say in closing that this has been a very good experience for me, and I hope it's been beneficial to you as well. The national news media will send actually around the world the substance of your questions and the substance of my answers.

I've never claimed to know all the answers. I have very good partnership with John Durkin and with Tom McIntyre, with Members of the Congress and the Senate, and I believe I also have a good partnership with the people of America. And I hope that you will join me in being obviously and openly critical of the defects in our political system.

But I hope you'll be equally determined to point out to each other and to the world the fine aspects of our free enterprise system, the soundness of our Constitution and the principles on which our country was founded, and remind each other and the rest of the world that you and I still live in the greatest country on Earth.

Thank you very much.

Energy Emergency in Kentucky

*Statement by the President.
February 18, 1978*

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Kentucky, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I hereby determine that a regional energy emergency exists in the State of Kentucky of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate and sulfur dioxide control regulations under the Kentucky Air Quality Implementation Plan may be necessary, and that other means of responding to the energy emergency may be inadequate. This determination shall be effective for not more than thirty (30) days, provided that the State of Kentucky shall hold the public hearing required by Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act within 1 week of this determination. If, during the period of suspension, I find that a regional energy emergency no longer exists in Kentucky, I will direct that this determination of regional energy emergency be rescinded and that all suspension orders issued by the Governor be terminated effective on the day of that rescission. The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Kentucky and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to act with due care if he suspends air pollution regulations under the authority provided by this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health. In conducting hearings and making findings, I urge the Governor to carefully consider that suspensions which would allow a facility to burn available fuel which could not otherwise be utilized are generally appropriate. On the other hand, suspensions which permit facilities to turn off pollution control devices should be used sparingly and as a last resort, because such suspensions will accomplish only small energy savings while increasing risks to public health.

I also urge the Governor to implement fully necessary energy conservation measures so that the necessity for suspension of pollution control regulations can be minimized.

NOTE: The statement was released on February 19.

The Presidential determination of February 18 is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

Amendment to the National Forest Management Act of 1976

*Statement on Signing S. 1360 Into Law.
February 20, 1978*

I have today approved the enrolled bill S. 1360 because it provides the Secretary of Agriculture broad flexibility in determining bidding methods to be used in the sale of National Forest timber. The bill directs the Secretary to take such measures as he deems appropriate to:

- ensure open and fair competition,
- ensure that the Federal Government receives not less than the appraised value of such timber,
- consider the economic stability of communities or such other objectives as he deems necessary, and
- be consistent with the objectives of other Federal statutes.

I endorse this direction.

The administration had opposed legislation to amend the 1976 law in order to permit enough time to evaluate the effects of the revised regulation governing the sale of National Forest timber that went into effect on June 2, 1977.

I have approved the bill since it is clear that the Secretary retains full discretion to adopt bidding regulations for National Forest timber which he determines to be in the public interest. It is also clear that he may test alternative bidding methods or prescribe changes in bidding methods from time to time to meet overall public objectives.

NOTE: As enacted, S. 1360 is Public Law 95-233, approved February 20.

Wilmington, Delaware

Remarks at a Fundraising Dinner for Senator Joseph R. Biden, Jr. February 20, 1978

It's a real delight for me to come back to the first State in the Nation and to campaign and to express my appreciation to people who support the first United States Senator who had confidence in me. He's a man who's not afraid to take on a difficult task and even a hopeless task. He and Frank <sup>1</sup> came down to Atlanta, the first time I met Joe Biden, in 1974, to speak to a State Jaycee convention. And we had a chance to talk for several hours at the Governor's mansion.

I felt a little bit ill at ease. I thought that Joe should have been talking to my children instead of to me. [Laughter] He's about my oldest son's age. But I sat and listened to Joe for 2 or 3 hours that night, talking about his own campaign and the kind of people who helped him and the mechanism that he used in Delaware to win what apparently was a hopeless political battle. And he expressed to me then his deep confidence in the Delaware people and a sense that if he could reach them directly, even on a shoestring budget and without any substantial media advertising, that he felt that I could do the same on a nationwide basis.

I was so intrigued with Joe that I departed from my normal practice, which is to be polite and then withdraw, and I went to the Jaycee convention with him that night, and I listened to his speech. And he talked about the need for government to be competent. He talked about the need for government not to intrude itself into the free enterprise system. He talked about the need for tough business management of budgets, and he talked about the need to eliminate unnecessary paperwork. And he described to those Jaycees, who were quite conservative in Georgia, the essence of what our Nation was and could be.

That was at the time of greatest despair. It was a time of Watergate. It was a time when Vietnam was on the conscience and consciousness of every American. It was a time when the CIA revelations were just beginning, and it was a time when people had forgotten about lifting a banner high and arousing the spirit and the confidence and the dedication and the warmth and legitimate pride in what our Nation was when Delaware was the first State to start its evolution toward success.

I learned a lot from him then. And I didn't ask Joe Biden to do much more than to head up a national committee as an honorary title, which he did, and to help me in Delaware, which he did; for when I would go to Wisconsin and say, "What can I do in this city to explain my position," they would say, "Well, you don't have to explain your position. Joe Biden's already done it for you."

And when I would campaign through Pennsylvania in those tough days when Pennsylvania was the crucial primary, Joe Biden spent three times as many days and nights in Pennsylvania campaigning for me as I spent campaigning for myself.

Well, he's the kind of friend who is inspirational and staunch, and he's the kind of young man who represents the finest things in American life and in American politics, and he's the kind of young man who is independent almost to a fault. [Laughter] He makes up his own mind, and he makes up his mind according to what's best for Delaware, which in almost every single instance is what's best for our great country.

So, it is an honor for me to come here and congratulate you. This is the largest Democratic fundraising event in the history of Delaware, and I thank you for it.

I'd just like to say one more word, and that is that we are all in this campaign and we are all in the political arena together, whether we are in the White House or in the State senate. And we do face difficult problems—Mideast, the Horn of Africa, SALT, nonproliferation, the embarrassment of revelations which ought not to be part of our political system.

Sometimes we have too much unemployment, sometimes the inflation rate is higher than we would like. There's not always an equitable distribution of benefits in our country. But I think it's good for all of us to emphasize the positive aspects of American life.

Everyone in this room has been blessed with social prominence and with responsibility, the trust of our peers, perhaps even affluence, certainly a great deal of influence on the path of our State and our Nation in the months and years to come. People look to us for guidance and for inspiration, and I think it's incumbent on us not only to search out ways in which we might improve our country but also to emphasize the positive aspects of it in spite of temporary aberrations and in spite of the fact that we falter on occasion in making a steady, inexorable progress. We still live in the greatest nation on Earth, and I think we ought to emphasize that point as often as we can. Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 7:43 p.m. in the Gold Ballroom at the Hotel Dupont.

Wilmington, Delaware

Remarks at a State Democratic Committee Fundraising Reception. February 20, 1978

Senator Joe Biden and to Jill; Senator Wendell Ford, who's responsible this year for the election and reelection of Democratic Senators all over the country; for our fine new chairman of the Democratic National Party, John White, from Texas; Lieutenant Governor McGinnis and Attorney General Weir; Treasurer Carper; and good Democrats:

We've got a lot in common. In almost every instance that I can consider, we are united.

In 1974 Joe Biden came down to Atlanta with his brother Frank to spend the night with me. I was Governor then. I saw a lot in this young man, and I asked him for advice. I told him confidentially I was going to run for President. I asked him for his advice. He said, "Well, I can tell you how you can be elected, even though nobody knows you. You're a Southerner; you haven't had any experience; you don't know very much about national issues, as much as I know myself." [Laughter] "But," he said, "if you'll get my sister to be your national chairman, you'll win." [Laughter]

She had better sense than to take on a hopeless cause, so I had to take second choice. And I chose Joe Biden, and he campaigned for me in 1976 in 30 different States, and Joe Biden, I want to thank you for it.

Joe said we might lose our reputation by demonstrating that we are united, but I'd like to indicate to you a few things on which we are united.

How many of you think that the next United States Senator ought to be and will be Joe Biden? [Applause]

Joe Biden is on the United States Senate Budget Committee. He helped, this past year, get a $6 billion tax reduction for the American people. How many of you think we ought to have a $25 billion tax reduction in 1978? [Applause]

We've got tax laws that ought to be changed and made fair. They have too many loopholes in them, and the working families of our country have not had an adequate voice in Washington or in the Congress or the White House for a long time. But now the Democratic Party, working together on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue, want to have a fair and equitable tax system, along with a much lower tax burden. We want to give some tax breaks for middle-income families to let them keep more of their money to put their kids through college, to have a better education system. How many of you agree with that? [Applause]

Joe Biden, in spite of the fact that he has only been in the Senate for 6 years, has been honored as few Senators are by being put on the Foreign Relations Committee. This gives him a much broader scope and responsibility than just representing Delaware. But it can be a source of great pride to you, because Joe Biden has to listen to the confidential reports to the Congress. He believes and I believe that we can have a comprehensive peace in the Middle East. How many of you agree? [Applause]

He specializes in Europe, the home of our closest historical allies, where most of our ancestors came from. We've been trying to strengthen NATO to revive the spirit of people who live in Europe, and for the first time since NATO was formed, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, every single member is now a democracy. I think that's good progress. We're going to make more progress. What do you think about it? [Applause]

We have also a kind of a sense in this country of what's good and what's right. And I think it's fair to say that when I began my campaign in early 1975, when I talked with Joe Biden in the Governor's mansion in 1974, there was a sense of despair and alienation, disappointment, even embarrassment among American people.

We were fighting an unpopular war in Vietnam. We had been embarrassed by a Republican administration with the Watergate scandals. The intelligence community of our Nation, on which we depend for our security to a major degree, had had revelations about it alleging assassination and murder and illegalities.

And I believe that we have now corrected all those deficiencies, and people can once again be proud of our country, proud of our Government, proud of our Congress, proud of our administration. How many of you agree with that? [Applause]

I won't go down the list of things, but I would like to mention two or three: Joe Biden serves on a special committee, the Senate Intelligence Committee. It's a committee that receives our Nation's utmost secrets, and it has had at its breast these last 2 years the responsibility to correct the defects that existed within the CIA and to be sure that in the future, we had professional civil servants—and we have—who do a superb job—and they have and they do—who respect and preserve the constitutional rights of American citizens to our own privacy, who don't violate American law. And he has had a great responsibility for making sure that these defects in the CIA and intelligence community never reappear.

We are now preparing under the leadership of Joe Biden and just a few others for the first time a charter for the intelligence community. He believes, as I do, in a strong national defense and that the security of our Nation is the first responsibility of a President and the Congress. How many of you agree with Joe Biden about that? [Applause]

In my acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention, and in the inaugural speech 13 months ago, I used two words which have not been spoken enough in Washington or throughout our country in the last few years, and those two words were "human rights."

I felt then, and I feel now, that not only must we correct serious mistakes, constantly analyze where we are, constantly improve on the structure of our Government, but that our Nation ought to stand for something, stand for something that doesn't change, stand for something that was here when Delaware became the first State to adopt the Constitution as a basis for freedom and a basis for inspiration.

Our Nation has now rehoisted a banner that gives us legitimate pride, which puts on us a mandate for legitimate humility to make sure that we reexamine what we are, where we stand, the progress we are making, so that we can set an example for other countries.

This past week I greeted the Ambassador from Indonesia. He sat in the Oval Office, and we mentioned briefly human rights, because his country has been embarrassed in recent years. And he said, "Mr. President, I just want to let you know that we are proud that in Indonesia this past month we released from prison 10,000 people who had been incarcerated because of politics."

I believe in basic human rights with all my heart. And as long as I'm in the White House and Joe Biden's in the Senate, we'll always stand for human rights for you.

We've never had a national energy policy. How many of you think we ought to have a national energy policy? [Applause]

Our welfare system is in many ways a mess. How many of you think we need welfare reform? [Applause]

Our Federal bureaucracy is confused, it's overlapping, it's wasteful. And our superb civil servants can't often do as good a job as they hunger to do. How many of you think we ought to reorganize the Federal Government and make it efficient? [Applause]

When I came into office in January of 1977, a little more than a year ago, our unemployment rate was almost 8 percent. This past month it was 6.3 percent. It's on the way down.

The unemployment rate in Delaware has dropped 2 percent—here in your capital city, 2½ percent in the last year. And I believe that if we work together, we can keep the unemployment rate going down. How many of you believe that we ought to? [Applause] In your capital city and here it's gone down 2½ percent. [Laughter]

Well, let me just mention one other thing, and then I'd like to close. We are searching to find the answers for some very difficult questions. We're negotiating every day with the Soviet Union to try to limit nuclear weapons and then to reduce the arsenal of nuclear weapons with an ultimate goal of our country on a very well-balanced, verifiable basis, the elimination of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth. How many of you would like to see that? [Applause]

My background is in nuclear physics, nuclear engineering, and I've seen the possibility in the past of new nations from time to time——

[At this point, a woman in the audience began to faint. After ascertaining that she was being cared for, the President resumed speaking.]

I think a year ago, or 18 months ago, everybody figured that the nuclear genie was out of the bottle, that there was no way to prevent new nations, as India had done, from exploding atomic weapons. But now this past week, the House and the Senate, obviously with Joe Biden's strong support, has passed a bill that will help us very well to permit nuclear power to be used for peaceful purposes, but to prevent any atomic fuel from our country ever to go to a country overseas to make an atomic explosion. We believe in non-proliferation and now we've done something about it.

So, you can see that in a list of 10 or 15 things so far, we haven't found any differences among us.

The Democratic Party is united, and it's united on a basis of principles that seem sometimes to be in conflict, but which aren't. I believe in tough fiscal management. I believe in balanced budgets. I believe in government that's well-organized. I believe in a day's work for a day's pay. I believe that the best government is the one closest to the people. I don't think the Federal Government ought to intrude in the private affairs of American citizens.

I don't believe we ought to ever be satisfied with achievements, but that we ought to have the courage within our country constantly to assess our own failings and shortcomings, our own errors and mistakes, and correct them openly and willingly and eagerly.

I believe that government ought to have a heart. I believe we ought to be constantly concerned about those who are not as fortunate as we. I think we ought to search back 200 years ago and look into the hearts and minds of the founders of our country and try to understand what they had as a vision for the future and even to improve upon it.

I recognize that our country does have its fault, but I know along with you that we share a deep conviction that in spite of all our faults and all our mistakes and all of our fumbblings and sometimes divisions, that you and I still live in the greatest nation on Earth.

Thank you very much.

Meeting With Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen of Denmark

*White House Statement.
February 21, 1978*

President Carter met with Prime Minister Anker Jørgensen of Denmark today at the White House. The Prime Minister was accompanied by Foreign Minister K. B. Andersen and other high-ranking Danish officials. Prime Minister Jørgensen, who is also current President of the European Council, is paying an official visit to Washington at the President's invitation. He and Mrs. Jørgensen were the guests at a luncheon given by Vice President and Mrs. Mondale. Secretary Vance will hold a luncheon for the Prime Minister tomorrow. While in Washington, he will also meet with Secretaries Brown, Blumenthal, Schlesinger, and Marshall, with the Special Representative for Trade Negotiations, Robert Strauss, and with Members of Congress. The Prime Minister's talks with the President covered a broad range of economic and political topics in U.S. relations with the European Community, and major international issues of mutual interest.

The two leaders reviewed economic trends in their two countries, in the West generally, and in the world. They agreed that continued close cooperation among the industrial democracies is necessary to increase economic growth, resist protectionism, and work toward resolving global economic problems. The two leaders emphasized the importance of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations in encouraging freer trade to promote orderly growth in both developed and developing nations.

Prime Minister Jørgensen gave the President his assessment of developments affecting the European Community, including the direct elections to the European Parliament and the applications by Greece, Portugal, and Spain for Community membership. President Carter reaffirmed the U.S. commitment to European unity and support for the European Community, as underscored by his visit to EC headquarters in January.

The President and the Prime Minister reaffirmed the shared commitment of their nations to NATO and to the defense of Western Europe. The two expressed satisfaction at the progress the allies have made in implementing the measures agreed to at last May's NATO Summit, and they discussed the forthcoming NATO Summit, this May in Washington. They noted close U.S.-Danish cooperation in NATO programs, including joint production with other NATO countries of the F-16 aircraft.

The President and Prime Minister exchanged views on major issues in East-West relations. They noted the close coincidence in the positions of their two governments on the CSCE review conference in Belgrade, and the President praised the role of the EC-Nine within the broader NATO consultations. They stressed the continuing need in the future for similar frank and detailed reviews of the implementation of the entire Helsinki Final Act, including its important provisions regarding human rights and humanitarian matters. The two leaders exchanged views on current developments and prospects for progress in the Middle East, southern Africa, and Cyprus. The two leaders also agreed on the need to reduce arms sold by all weapons-producing nations. The President welcomed Denmark's participation in the International Fuel Cycle Evaluation.

United States Assay Office at New York

Nomination of Manuel A. Sanchez, Jr., To Be Superintendent. February 21, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Manuel A. Sanchez, Jr., of New York City, to be Superintendent of the United States Assay Office at New York. He would replace Nicholas Costanzo, who has resigned.

Sanchez was born December 28, 1935, in New York. He received a B.B.A. in 1961 and an M.A. in 1969 from City College of New York.

From 1963 to 1968, Sanchez taught English in Brooklyn. In 1968 and 1969, he was special assistant to the New York City Board of Education for research and evaluation. In 1970 and 1971, he was assistant to the Bronx Borough president.

In 1971 Sanchez was special assistant to the New York City school chancellor at the New York Board of Education. From 1972 to 1974, he was director of the Urban-Rural School Development program in School District Seven in the Bronx. In 1974 and 1975, he was administrator of the Citywide Umbrella Bureau for the New York Board of Education. Since 1975 he has been deputy community superintendent for the Board of Education for School District Nine in the Bronx.

Comprehensive Employment and Training Act Extension

Message to the Congress. February 22, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am submitting today legislation to extend an improved Comprehensive Employment and Training Act through 1982.

This legislation is an essential complement to the balanced economic program I presented to the Congress last month.

While our tax and budget proposals ensure that steady growth continues without inflation, the CETA legislation I am proposing today will make sure that more of our people share in the benefits of growth. With its training programs and direct job creation, this legislation is critical to reaching our employment goals.

In Fiscal Year 1979 we expect to spend $11.4 billion in this effort, providing jobs and training support for more than 4 million people under the CETA program.

This legislation will combine public and private efforts to attack the problem of structural unemployment, which affects groups, such as minorities and young people, who have difficulty finding work even when over-all economic prospects are good. Last year, for example, our employment situations improved markedly; 4.1 million more people held jobs at the end of 1977 than at the end of 1976, and the unemployment rate fell by 1.4 percent. But even while unemployment was falling to 4 percent among white males above the age of 20, it was rising—from 35 to 38 percent—among black teenagers.

The Comprehensive Employment and Training Act will enable us to concentrate on these groups that suffer structural problems, without putting inflationary pressures on the rest of the economy. Its major elements are:

—Public service jobs for the unemployed. In the last year, we have more than doubled the size of this program, increasing it from about 300,000 jobs to 725,000.

—The broad range of youth programs authorized by the Youth Employment and Demonstration Projects Act of 1977. Spending for youth programs has increased from about $660 million in Fiscal Year 1976 to about $2.3 billion in Fiscal Year 1979.

—The Administration's new Private Sector Initiative, which will provide opportunity for the private and public sectors to work together to provide jobs and training for the unemployed and disadvantaged.

—Other important related programs, such as the Jobs Corps, welfare reform demonstration projects, and the Federal government's job training efforts.

These CETA programs have already played a role in reducing the unemployment rate from 7.8 percent to 6.3 percent in the last 13 months.

The bill I am submitting today, which will reauthorize the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act for an additional four years, from 1979 to 1982, will sustain the current programs, establish the foundation for future growth, and improve the operation of the CETA system.

A countercyclical program under Title VI, will maintain the 725,000 public service employment slots that were part of my stimulus program through Fiscal 1979. We are rapidly approaching the 700,000 mark in that effort, and I fully expect that the 725,000 goal will be reached in the month of March.

Also, I am recommending to the Congress that we adopt a trigger formula, beginning in 1980, to insure that countercyclical public service employment is activated quickly when needed and is reduced as unemployment declines.

When the unemployment rate falls below four and three-quarters percent, the triggering formula will reduce the number of slots to 100,000, targeted on areas that still have high unemployment. For each half percentage point that unemployment exceeds that 4.75 percent level, 100,000 public service employment positions will be added in Title VI.

Recent evidence indicates the effectiveness of countercyclical public service employment. Just last week, the National Commission on Manpower Policy released a study done by the Brookings Institution showing that the substitution problem, which limits the usefulness of public service employment when Federal dollars are used to replace local funds, is not as serious as had previously been feared.

To reduce substitution, I am encouraging the use of a special project approach which, according to recent evidence, has been successful in meeting this problem.

I am also proposing strict limits on the use of these funds to support higher-wage public employment.

This new bill takes further steps to target jobs on those most in need and sharply limit substitution.

In order to target more effectively, I am recommending that funds given out under the CETA system be used only for the economically disadvantaged—defined as those whose family income is no greater than 70 percent of the Bureau of Labor Statistics' lower-income family budget standard. I am also recommending that young people whose parents claimed them as income tax deductions in the previous year include their parents' income in establishing their eligibility for the current year.

This year, I propose that we demonstrate the jobs component of my welfare reform proposal by creating 50,000 positions in selected cities. Beginning in Fiscal 1980, with the passage of the welfare reform bill, we will increase the structural unemployment program until it can accommodate the 1.4 million people I anticipate will be served in the welfare reform plan. That should ensure that, for every family containing children and parents who want to work, there will be a job. Most families containing an employable person will see their income rise substantially above the poverty line.

The purpose of the Public Service Employment program will remain what it has been—to provide useful jobs. For example:

—Major parks in urban centers, such as Boston, that were once abandoned to overgrowth and vandalism have been reclaimed for the enjoyment of the public.

—In North Carolina, elderly people are being cared for, in their homes, by public service employment workers, rather than being forced to leave home and spend their last years in expensive, sometimes-impersonal nursing homes.

—In Portland, Oregon, CETA workers install locks, window grates and other security devices in the homes of senior citizens and low-income families living in high-crime areas.

—In Memphis, workers are building ramps for the handicapped in five areas of the city used heavily by the handicapped and elderly.

—In Humboldt County, California, CETA workers help to staff day care centers serving low-income families.

—In Worthington, Minnesota, workers are providing home insulation and energy conservation assistance to low-income households in a four-county area.

As the economy improves, employment and training programs should shift their emphasis from creating jobs in the public sector to providing training and finding jobs in the private sector.

To help place CETA participants in private-sector jobs, to provide an opportunity for cooperation between the local CETA programs and the private sector, and to tap the goodwill and commitment of private-sector businessmen, large and small, as well as labor leaders, I am asking Congress for authority to establish a new Private Sector Employment Initiative, under a new Title VII. In the budget, I have set aside $400 million for this activity in 1979.

Private Industry Councils—made up of representatives of large and small businesses and union organizations—will be responsible for developing on-the-job training and other placement opportunities with private firms for young workers and other participants in the CETA system.

The CETA legislation that I am presenting today provides Congress with a plan for a rational, efficient and targeted structural and countercyclical employment program.

We need an employment and training system which is administratively clear, that helps those most in need, that creates needed jobs and provides maximum opportunity for cooperation between the public and private sectors. To reach the goal of full employment, and price stability which we have set in the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, we must make these programs work. The legislation I am sending to Congress today can provide a framework within which we can all work together to achieve that commitment.

Dinner for Retiring Members of Congress

*Remarks at the White House Dinner.
February 22, 1978*

I hope I didn't interrupt anyone's meal. I presume you're through by now.

First of all, I'd like to say that Rosalynn and I are deeply honored and very pleased to have all of you here this evening in a religious time of our year. Of all the folks in Washington, I know you gave up more for Lent than anyone else—[laughter]—your seat in the House and Senate. But the country's given up even more by being deprived of your service in the future.

Frank Moore figured out today that the cumulative experience represented among the Members of Congress here tonight is more than 400 years. And we still haven't been able to get an energy bill through. [Laughter]

I know that all of you now are thinking about what you'll do after you leave the Congress this next January. If you haven't chosen a second career yet, I wish that some of you would consider mining coal. [Laughter] It would be a lot of help to us here. We have made some progress today. And I hope that the miners and coal operators will get together perhaps without too much delay.

I have a few comments to make. I was a little bit hesitant to get up here. I noticed in the paper when Congressman Otis Pike was asked why he was leaving the Congress, he said he was tired of wasting his time listening to drivel. [Laughter] I hope that Congressman Pike will excuse me just for a few minutes this evening. [Laughter]

We have represented here tonight almost every committee of Congress. We have some of the most powerful and influential Members who have ever served in Washington, the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and others. And we have the two most senior Members of Congress who will be retiring at the end of this year, men who have been here since—for more than 40 years. In fact, we have three at my table, who have each served more than four decades.

We have the only two Members of Congress, I think, here tonight, who were born before this century. We've got a former Governor, Dewey Bartlett. We've got a former candidate for Vice President, who's a fine and wonderful gentleman.

We have also some men who have shown a great deal of courage. John Moss, whose service in the Congress I deeply admire, was one of the first men who ever brought to the forefront of our Nation's consciousness the right of American citizens to have access to Government records on them. And the Freedom of Information Act was caused by his long and tenacious battle for that fight against deprivation of privacy. Before many people began to worry about the Vietnam war, Charles Whalen was speaking out in a very courageous way. Shirley Pettis, after the tragic death of her husband, volunteered her services to our country. And Dewey Bartlett, who hasn't been feeling well lately, has courageously served his country as well.

We've got some famous people here tonight that I've admired for a long time who served on the House Judiciary Committee during the impeachment proceedings, at a time when our Nation's spirits were desperately low and there was a genuine doubt about the integrity of many public servants in Washington and there was also some concern about the competence of some of the Members of Congress. And to have the television cameras focused on these men and women who did such a superb job, both Democrats and Republicans, transformed our Nation's spirit and let us weather one of the most serious threats to the confidence in Government among the American people that we've ever experienced.

Three of those are retiring this year, Barbara Jordan—and, Barbara, we're going to miss you—and Jim Mann and Charlie Wiggins, all of whom were very famous, and rightly so.

I said over tonight at the banquet—I was feeling good when I came in here this evening—the vote on the B-1 and the vote on the Panama Canal treaties, I was in high spirits. But as I sat through the evening meal and looked at my own table and realized what I was going to be losing next year as President, a sober and sad feeling came over me.

It's going to be very difficult for me as President to get along next year without this group of superb leaders. And on behalf of the American people and as President of our country, I want to thank all of you for the tremendous service that you have already given to our Nation and let you know how much I appreciate what you've done for me in my first year as President.

Thank you very, very much.

You may have noticed from the dessert, the cherry pie, that today is George Washington's birthday. And we're eating in a room that honors George and Martha Washington.

He was the only President who didn't live in this house. He lived in Philadelphia and in New York when he served his two terms as President. He faced tremendous challenges, and of course, the times were quite different. In those early days, the President never shook hands with people. It was considered a proper thing for a person when they addressed a President to bow, and the President would bow in return.

I personally like the new handshaking days myself. I don't think I would have ever been elected to this office had I just bowed to people in factory shift lines. [Laughter] But George Washington obviously set an example for service that's stood us in good stead.

Tonight, we are commemorating public service, that's been demonstrated by all of you, in honoring George Washington with a fine program. We have, reading the part of George Washington—repeating words that he actually used during his lifetime about public service—an Academy Award winning actor, Cliff Robertson. And along with him, reading the words of Martha Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and perhaps some other more minor characters, Jill Eikenberry and Philip Anglim.

So, Cliff Robertson, I wish you all would come forward now, and Jill and Philip.

[At this point, the entertainment began. Following its conclusion, the President resumed speaking.]

I know all of you have appreciated what Jill and Philip and Cliff have done for us tonight. I know all of you had thoughts that went back through history, and you can see some very close compatibilities here with Washington's time and even our own modern day.

Presidents are still afflicted with office-seekers—[laughter]—and I think I will use a back garden and a cowbell so that I can escape on occasion. [Laughter]

I think all of you will recognize the truth in what Washington said about pouring legislation into the Senate saucer, where it slowly, slowly cools. [Laughter]

Of course, the most vivid comparison, I think, between Washington's life and what is occurring here tonight is the voluntary resignation from public office and superb service to our country of dedicated men and women.

On behalf of the people of our country, I thank all of you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:08 p.m. in the East Room at the White House.

Human Rights Treaties

Message to the Senate. February 23, 1978

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, subject to certain reservations, understandings and declarations, I transmit herewith four treaties pertaining to human rights. Three of these treaties were negotiated at the United Nations:

—The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, signed on behalf of the United States on September 28, 1966.

—The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, signed on behalf of the United States on October 5, 1977.

—The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, signed on behalf of the United States on October 5, 1977.

The fourth treaty was adopted by the Organization of American States in 1969, and is open for adoption only by members of that Organization: The American Convention on Human Rights, signed on behalf of the United States on June 1, 1977.

I also transmit, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State on the United Nations treaties and the Department's separate report on the American Convention.

While the United States is a leader in the realization and protection of human rights, it is one of the few large nations that has not become a party to the three United Nations human rights treaties. Our failure to become a party increasingly reflects upon our attainments, and prejudices United States participation in the development of the international law of human rights. The two human rights Covenants are based upon the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in whose conception, formulation and adoption the United States played a central role. The Racial Discrimination Convention deals with a problem which in the past has been identified with the United States; ratification of this treaty will attest to our enormous progress in this field in recent decades and our commitment to ending racial discrimination.

The United States participated actively and effectively in the negotiation of the American Convention on Human Rights. That Convention, like the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, treats in detail a wide range of civil and political rights. Freedom of speech and thought, participation in government, and others are included which Americans have always considered vital to a free, open and humane society. United States ratification of the Convention will give us a unique opportunity to express our support for the cause of human rights in the Americas.

The great majority of the substantive provisions of these four treaties are entirely consistent with the letter and spirit of the United States Constitution and laws. Wherever a provision is in conflict with United States law, a reservation, understanding or declaration has been recommended. The Department of Justice concurs in the judgment of the Department of State that, with the inclusion of these reservations, understandings and declarations, there are no constitutional or other legal obstacles to United States ratification. The reports of the Department of State on these four treaties describe their provisions and set forth the recommended reservations, understandings and declarations.

Should the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, I would then have the right to decide whether to make a declaration, pursuant to Article 14 of the Convention, recognizing the competence of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination to receive and consider communications from individuals. Such a declaration would be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification.

Should the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, I intend upon deposit of United States ratification to make a declaration, pursuant to Article 14 of the Covenant. By that declaration the United States would recognize the competence of the Human Rights Committee established by Article 28 to receive and consider "communications to the effect that a State Party claims that another State Party is not fulfilling its obligations under the Covenant."

Should the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification of the American Convention on Human Rights, I intend upon deposit of United States ratification to make a declaration pursuant to Article 45 of the Convention. By that declaration the United States would recognize the competence of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights established by Article 33 to receive and examine "communications in which a State Party alleges that another State Party has committed a violation of a human right set forth in this Convention."

By giving its advice and consent to ratification of these treaties, the Senate will confirm our country's traditional commitment to the promotion and protection of human rights at home and abroad. I recommend that the Senate give prompt consideration to the treaties and advice and consent to their ratification.

Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation

*Remarks at the Swearing In of Judge
William H. Webster. February 23, 1978*

Vice President Mondale and Chief Justice Burger, Senator Eastland, Congressman Rodino, Senators and Congressmen

who have come to visit with us, and amateur Georgia historian, Griffin Bell—[laughter]—Director Kelley, and our new Director, Judge Webster:

As President, and as one who has learned a great deal about our Nation the last 2 years, 3 years, especially, I'm deeply aware of the importance of the choice of directorship for the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

I can't think of any position in our Nation's Government service that can have a more direct influence on the attitude of American people toward their own Government and in strengthening the legitimate ties among people who are interested in local, State, and Federal governments, than the directorship of the FBI.

This is an agency which sets a standard for integrity and for competence, for dedication, for professionalism, for the preservation of the security of our lives and property, and for the protection of the basic rights of American people.

When the FBI does a good job, it makes us all legitimately proud and gives us a feeling of community of purpose and of security. Director Kelley has done a superb job in coming to this important position at a time when strong leadership, good management, and absolute integrity was badly needed. And he has not disappointed us in any of those respects. And Director Kelley, as President, I would like to express my deep, personal thanks to you for your tremendous contribution.

Tremendous progress has already been made, but we still have a need and an opportunity to make more changes and more progress. Investigative techniques, using modern technology and a closer working relationship among all law enforcement agencies and private citizens, can certainly be improved. A constant re-assessment of priorities, of assignment of your superb personnel in the FBI, can certainly still be modified and improved.

A reaffirmation of the commitment of the powers and authority of the FBI can be emphasized to protect human rights, the civil rights, the privacy of American citizens within the letter and the spirit of our Constitution and our laws.

It's obvious, too, that the FBI can, through its leadership role and through its broad range of knowledge and responsibility, even improve its relationship with other Federal agencies and, particularly, those that are responsible for law enforcement.

I think it's obvious that the new Director takes on one of the most difficult assignments in Government. He is superbly qualified. As a distinguished attorney, as a United States attorney, as a district judge, and as a circuit judge, he has learned the responsibilities of enforcement of the law, the interpretation of the law, in both a theoretical and a practical way.

Because of the enhanced stature of the directorship, Griffin Bell and I had an almost unlimited capability of choosing the very top person in our country, and we have been successful in doing this. I'm very proud that Judge Webster has been willing to assume this responsibility.

This has been done on the basis of non-partisanship, or bipartisanship. I think it's fair to say that Judge Webster is a human being. He's a Republican, which proves his fallibility. [Laughter] So he should feel completely at home with the rest of us. [Laughter] We serve in an often fallible way here in Washington.

I would like to assure the Chief Justice, at his request, that I will not make any more incursions into the Federal judiciary during my term of office for a Director of the FBI. [Laughter] Now I feel that he owes me one. [Laughter] I'll reserve the right to call on him in the future.

The last thing I would like to say is this: On behalf of myself, the Vice President, the members of the Cabinet, all those who serve with us, and, I think, in particular, me, I pledge to Judge Webster my absolute and total confidence, my deepest political and personal commitment to cooperate with him as full partners in preserving the standards which have, through the ages, made our Nation so great.

It's a partnership that I feel is of superb importance to our country. And I'm very proud to have a man like Judge Webster who has undertaken to even enhance the tremendous public record and the tremendous reputation of one of the finest organizations in Government and, certainly, the finest law enforcement agency in the world.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:52 p.m. in the auditorium of the J. Edgar Hoover F.B.I. Building. Prior to his remarks, Chief Justice of the United States Warren E. Burger administered the oath of office to Judge Webster.

Equal Employment Opportunity Enforcement

Remarks Announcing Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1978. February 23, 1978

We are assembled here today in the East Room of the White House on what is truly an historic occasion. It's a great honor for me to stand on the platform with these distinguished men and women—Members of the Congress, in particular, who have joined with me in a partnership, continuing past actions of officials of our Government to make our country a fairer and a more enjoyable and productive place to live.

We have with us officials of a wide range of organizations, some of which I would just like to mention so that you'll know how broad is the interest and support for the action that we will introduce this afternoon: the Urban League, the National Urban Coalition, the NAACP, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the National Organization of Women, the American GI Forum, the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Education Fund, the American Association of Retired Persons, the American Federation of Government Employees, the National Federation of Federal Employees, the National Association of Government Employees, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the Business Roundtable, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Governors' Conference; representatives from other groups like the United Automobile Workers; major corporations, NBC, General Motors. And we are particularly honored to have with us two women who represent leaders who were the great and courageous innovators in equality of opportunity and civil rights in our country, Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., on my left, and Mrs. Lynda Robb, the daughter of President Lyndon Johnson.

I welcome all of you to the White House to join with me in taking an important step toward a more competent Government and toward a more just society. We are here today to announce a comprehensive series of measures to consolidate and to streamline the enforcement of equal employment opportunity laws in our country.

I believe that this is the single most important action to improve civil rights in the last decade. Many of you in this room have participated in the struggle to make human rights a richer and a fuller reality in our country. You have led and represented different groups, fought different obstacles, but your commitments have been and are today the same. You've seen the evils of discrimination in all its forms, and you have dedicated your own lives to the elimination of those evils.

I've often said during the campaign in Georgia and in Mississippi that the best thing that has happened to our country in my lifetime, and particularly in the South, was the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It transformed the consciousness of our country, and it gave us a legal basis on which to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment.

When I announced my own candidacy for the Presidency, I repeated the words of my inaugural address in January of 1971 as Governor of Georgia: The time for racial discrimination is over. Our people have already made this major and difficult decision, but we cannot underestimate the challenges of hundreds of minor decisions yet to be made.

Everyone here is ready to meet the challenge of fulfilling this equal rights commitment, whether we are from business or from labor, from the ranks of movements which struggle, sometimes at the threat of one's life, to write that commitment into law, representatives of women and of minorities, of senior citizens and others.

In 1940, President Roosevelt issued the first Executive order to forbid discrimination in employment in the Federal Government. And since that time, the Congress, the courts, and the executive branch have taken historic steps to extend equal employment opportunity and its protection throughout the private, as well as the public sector.

But each new prohibition against discrimination unfortunately has brought with it a further dispersal of Federal equal employment opportunity responsibility and management. There are today nearly 40 different Federal statutes and orders with widely applicable nondiscrimination requirements. These are enforced by 18 different departments and agencies in Washington. That is a formula not for guaranteeing equal justice, but for confusion, for division of resources, for needless paperwork, for regulatory duplication, and for delay.

The program that I am announcing today will replace this chaotic picture with a coherent and sensible structure. It constitutes an important step forward toward consolidation of equal employment opportunity enforcement. Specifically, it will establish the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the EEOC, as the principal Federal agency in fair employment enforcement. It will transfer from the Department of Labor to EEOC major statutes which forbid discrimination on the basis of sex and of age.

It will transfer from the Civil Service Commission to the EEOC responsibility for enforcing equal employment opportunity protection for Federal employees. And it will consolidate in the Department of Labor responsibility which is now spread among 11 different agencies for ensuring that Federal contractors comply with equal employment standards. And it will also reinforce the responsibility of the Department of Justice to assure compliance with equal employment laws by State and local governments.

This is the first reorganization plan that I am sending to Congress in 1978 under the authority granted to me by law last year. This law is a powerful instrument which Congress and the President, working together, can use to make Government work better.

On this particular reorganization plan, as on others approved and those still being developed, we have been fortunate in having the close cooperation and the expertise of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, under Senator Abe Ribicoff, and also the House Government Operations Committee, under the leadership of Congressman Jack Brooks. We look forward to working very closely with them and their able staffs through the statutory process of congressional deliberation and evaluation of these proposals.

I think you can all tell from the evidence exhibited by the electronics media that we have a very busy group of people assembled with us today.<sup>1</sup> [Laughter] I hope that they will be equally busy ensuring that the Congress approves these reorganization plans.

I have two documents to sign. They are fairly brief, about eight pages each, double-spaced, and they describe in clear terms the structural changes as I've outlined to you. As you know, under the reorganization legislation that Congress passed last year, I present the plan to Congress and unless it is vetoed by Congress with a 30-day [60-day] period of working days, the plans automatically go into effect.

This plan has some controversial elements in it. It's been carefully negotiated among the EEOC, the Labor Department, the Civil Service Commission, the congressional committees, their staffs, and the interested groups who are so deeply dedicated to equal employment in our country.

And it's with a great deal of pleasure and anticipation of complete success that I now sign the reorganization plans which will be presented to the Congress tomorrow.

[At this point, the President signed the documents.]

Thank you very much. In the future, in order to enhance my own stature in a crowd, I'm going to have my secretary

call me during the middle of a ceremony. [Laughter]

One thing I'd like to add is—I didn't see him when I came in because of the group on the stage—but it would be inappropriate not to recognize the fact that Senator Ted Kennedy is here. And I will assume that he represents his great brother, who was the foremost leader in the enhancement of civil rights in our country.

Ted, we're glad to have you with us.

Equal Employment Opportunity Enforcement

Message to the Congress Transmitting Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1978.

February 23, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am submitting to you today Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1978. This Plan makes the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the principal Federal agency in fair employment enforcement. Together with actions I shall take by Executive Order, it consolidates Federal equal employment opportunity activities and lays, for the first time, the foundation of a unified, coherent Federal structure to combat job discrimination in all its forms.

In 1940 President Roosevelt issued the first Executive Order forbidding discrimination in employment by the Federal government. Since that time the Congress, the courts and the Executive Branch—spurred by the courage and sacrifice of many people and organizations—have taken historic steps to extend equal employment opportunity protection throughout the private as well as public sector. But each new prohibition against discrimination unfortunately has brought with it a further dispersal of Federal equal employment opportunity responsibility. This fragmentation of authority among a number of Federal agencies has meant confusion and ineffective enforcement for employees, regulatory duplication and needless expense for employers.

Fair employment is too vital for haphazard enforcement. My Administration will aggressively enforce our civil rights laws. Although discrimination in any area has severe consequences, limiting economic opportunity affects access to education, housing and health care. I, therefore, ask you to join with me to reorganize administration of the civil rights laws and to begin that effort by reorganizing the enforcement of those laws which ensure an equal opportunity to a job.

Eighteen government units now exercise important responsibilities under statutes, Executive Orders and regulations relating to equal employment opportunity:

- The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) enforces Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which bans employment discrimination based on race, national origin, sex or religion. The EEOC acts on individual complaints and also initiates private sector cases involving a "pattern or practice" of discrimination.

- The Department of Labor and 11 other agencies enforce Executive Order 11246. This prohibits discrimination in employment on the basis of race, national origin, sex, or religion and requires affirmative action by government contractors. While the Department now coordinates enforcement of this "contract compliance" program, it is actually administered by eleven other departments and agencies. The Department also administers those statutes requiring contractors to take affirmative action to employ handicapped people, disabled veterans and Vietnam veterans.

In addition, the Labor Department enforces the Equal Pay Act of 1963, which prohibits employers from paying unequal wages based on sex, and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, which forbids age discrimination against persons between the ages of 40 and 65.

- The Department of Justice litigates Title VII cases involving public sector employers—State and local governments. The Department also represents the Federal government in lawsuits against Federal contractors and grant recipients who are in violation of Federal nondiscrimination prohibitions.

- The Civil Service Commission (CSC) enforces Title VII and all other nondiscrimination and affirmative action requirements for Federal employment. The CSC rules on complaints filed by individuals and monitors affirmative action plans submitted annually by other Federal agencies.

- The Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council includes representatives from EEOC, Labor, Justice, CSC and the Civil Rights Commission. It is charged with coordinating the Federal equal employment opportunity enforcement effort and with eliminating overlap and inconsistent standards.

- In addition to these major government units, other agencies enforce various equal employment opportunity requirements which apply to specific grant programs. The Department of Treasury, for example, administers the anti-discrimination prohibitions applicable to recipients of revenue sharing funds.

These programs have had only limited success. Some of the past deficiencies include:

- inconsistent standards of compliance;
- duplicative, inconsistent paperwork requirements and investigative efforts;
- conflicts within agencies between their program responsibilities and their responsibility to enforce the civil rights laws;
- confusion on the part of workers about how and where to seek redress;
- lack of accountability.

I am proposing today a series of steps to bring coherence to the equal employment enforcement effort. These steps, to be accomplished by the Reorganization Plan and Executive Orders, constitute an important step toward consolidation of equal employment opportunity enforcement. They will be implemented over the next two years, so that the agencies involved may continue their internal reform.

Its experience and broad scope make the EEOC suitable for the role of principal Federal agency in fair employment enforcement. Located in the Executive Branch and responsible to the President, the EEOC has developed considerable expertise in the field of employment discrimination since Congress created it by the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Commission has played a pioneer role in defining both employment discrimination and its appropriate remedies.

While it has had management problems in past administrations, the EEOC's new leadership is making substantial progress in correcting them. In the last seven months the Commission has redesigned its internal structures and adopted proven management techniques. Early experience with these procedures indicates a high degree of success in reducing and expediting new cases. At my direction, the Office of Management and Budget is actively assisting the EEOC to ensure that these reforms continue.

The Reorganization Plan I am submitting will accomplish the following:

- On July 1, 1978, abolish the Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council (42 U.S.C. 2000e-14) and transfer its duties to the EEOC (no positions or funds shifted).

- On October 1, 1978, shift enforcement of equal employment opportunity for Federal employees from the CSC to the EEOC (100 positions and $6.5 million shifted).

- On July 1, 1979, shift responsibility for enforcing both the Equal Pay Act and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act from the Labor Department to the EEOC (198 positions and $5.3 million shifted for Equal Pay; 119 positions and $3.5 million for Age Discrimination).

- Clarify the Attorney General's authority to initiate "pattern or practice" suits under Title VII in the public sector.

In addition, I will issue an Executive Order on October 1, 1978, to consolidate the contract compliance program—now the responsibility of Labor and eleven "compliance agencies"—into the Labor Department (1,517 positions and $33.1 million shifted).

These proposed transfers and consolidations reduce from fifteen to three the number of Federal agencies having important equal employment opportunity responsibilities under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and Federal contract compliance provisions.

Each element of my Plan is important to the success of the entire proposal.

By abolishing the Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council and transferring its responsibilities to the EEOC, this plan places the Commission at the center of equal employment opportunity enforcement. With these new responsibilities, the EEOC can give coherence and direction to the government's efforts by developing strong uniform enforcement standards to apply throughout the government: standardized data collection procedures, joint training programs, programs to ensure the sharing of enforcement related data among agencies, and methods and priorities for complaint and compliance reviews. Such direction has been absent in the Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council.

It should be stressed, however, that affected agencies will be consulted before EEOC takes any action. When the Plan has been approved, I intend to issue an Executive Order which will provide for consultation, as well as a procedure for reviewing major disputed issues within the Executive Office of the President. The Attorney General's responsibility to advise the Executive Branch on legal issues will also be preserved.

Transfer of the Civil Service Commission's equal employment opportunity responsibilities to EEOC is needed to ensure that: (1) Federal employees have the same rights and remedies as those in the private sector and in State and local government; (2) Federal agencies meet the same standards as are required of other employers; and (3) potential conflicts between an agency's equal employment opportunity and personnel management functions are minimized. The Federal government must not fall below the standard of performance it expects of private employers.

The Civil Service Commission has in the past been lethargic in enforcing fair employment requirements within the Federal government. While the Chairman and other Commissioners I have appointed have already demonstrated their personal commitment to expanding equal employment opportunity, responsibility for ensuring fair employment for Federal employees should rest ultimately with the EEOC.

We must ensure that the transfer in no way undermines the important objectives of the comprehensive civil service reorganization which will be submitted to Congress in the near future. When the two plans take effect, I will direct the EEOC and the CSC to coordinate their procedures to prevent any duplication and overlap.

The Equal Pay Act, now administered by the Labor Department, prohibits employers from paying unequal wages based on sex. Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, which is enforced by EEOC, contains a broader ban on sex discrimination. The transfer of Equal Pay responsibility from the Labor Department to the EEOC will minimize overlap and centralize enforcement of statutory prohibitions against sex discrimination in employment.

The transfer will strengthen efforts to combat sex discrimination. Such efforts would be enhanced still further by passage of the legislation pending before you, which I support, that would prohibit employers from excluding women disabled by pregnancy from participating in disability programs.

There is now virtually complete overlap in the employers, labor organizations, and employment agencies covered by Title VII and by the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. This overlap is burdensome to employers and confusing to victims of discrimination. The proposed transfer of the age discrimination program from the Labor Department to the EEOC will eliminate the duplication.

The Plan I am proposing will not affect the Attorney General's responsibility to enforce Title VII against State or local governments or to represent the Federal government in suits against Federal contractors and grant recipients. In 1972, the Congress determined that the Attorney General should be involved in suits against State and local governments. This proposal reinforces that judgment and clarifies the Attorney General's authority to initiate litigation against State or local governments engaged in a "pattern or practice" of discrimination. This in no way diminishes the EEOC's existing authority to investigate complaints filed against State or local governments and, where appropriate, to refer them to the Attorney General. The Justice Department and the EEOC will cooperate so that the Department sues on valid referrals, as well as on its own "pattern or practice" cases.

A critical element of my proposals will be accomplished by Executive Order rather than by the Reorganization Plan. This involves consolidation in the Labor Department of the responsibility to ensure that Federal contractors comply with Executive Order 11246. Consolidation will achieve the following: promote consistent standards, procedures, and reporting requirements; remove contractors from the jurisdiction of multiple agencies; prevent an agency's equal employment objectives from being outweighed by its procurement and construction objectives; and produce more effective law enforcement through unification of planning, training and sanctions. By 1981, after I have had an opportunity to review the manner in which both the EEOC and the Labor Department are exercising their new responsibilities, I will determine whether further action is appropriate.

Finally, the responsibility for enforcing grant-related equal employment provisions will remain with the agencies administering the grant programs. With the EEOC acting as coordinator of Federal equal employment programs, we will be able to bring overlap and duplication to a minimum. We will be able, for example, to see that a university's employment practices are not subject to duplicative investigations under both Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 and the contract compliance program. Because of the similarities between the Executive Order program and those statutes requiring Federal contractors to take affirmative action to employ handicapped individuals and disabled and Vietnam veterans, I have determined that enforcement of these statutes should remain in the Labor Department.

Each of the changes set forth in the Reorganization Plan accompanying this message is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes set forth in Section 901(a) of Title 5 of the United States Code. I have taken care to determine that all functions abolished by the Plan are done only under the statutory authority provided by Section 903(b) of Title 5 of the United States Code.

I do not anticipate that the reorganizations contained in this Plan will result in any significant change in expenditures. They will result in a more efficient and manageable enforcement program.

The Plan I am submitting is moderate and measured. It gives the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission—an agency dedicated solely to this purpose—the primary Federal responsibility in the area of job discrimination, but it is designed to give this agency sufficient time to absorb its new responsibilities. This reorganization will produce consistent agency standards, as well as increased accountability. Combined with the intense commitment of those charged with these responsibilities, it will become possible for us to accelerate this nation's progress in ensuring equal job opportunities for all our people.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 1 OF 1978

Prepared by the President and transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, February 23, 1978, pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 9 of Title 5 of the United States Code.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

SECTION 1. Transfer of Equal Pay Enforcement Functions.

All functions related to enforcing or administering Section 6 (d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended, (29 U.S.C. 206 (d)) are hereby transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Such functions include, but shall not be limited to, the functions relating to equal pay administration and enforcement now vested in the Secretary of Labor, the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, and the Civil Service Commission pursuant to Sections 4 (d) (1); 4 (f); 9; 11 (a), (b) and (c); 16 (b) and (c) and 17 of the Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended, (29 U.S.C. 204(d)(1); 204 (f); 209; 211 (a), (b) and (c); 216 (b) and (c) and 217) and Section 10(b)(1) of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, as amended, (29 U.S.C. 259).

SECTION 2. Transfer of Age Discrimination Enforcement Functions.

All functions vested in the Secretary of Labor or in the Civil Service Commission pursuant to Sections 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, as amended, (29 U.S.C. 621, 623, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, and 633a) are hereby transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. All functions related to age discrimination administration and enforcement pursuant to Sections 6 and 16 of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, as amended, (29 U.S.C. 625 and 634) are hereby transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

SECTION 3. Transfer of Equal Opportunity in Federal Employment Enforcement Functions.

(a) All equal opportunity in Federal employment enforcement and related functions vested in the Civil Service Commission pursuant to Section 717 (b) and (c) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, (42 U.S.C. 2000e-16 (b) and (c)), are hereby transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

(b) The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission may delegate to the Civil Service Commission or its successor the function of making a preliminary determination on the issue of discrimination whenever, as a part of a complaint or appeal before the Civil Service Commission on other grounds, a Federal employee alleges a violation of Section 717 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, (42 U.S.C. 2000e-16) provided that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission retains the function of making the final determination concerning such issue of discrimination.

SECTION 4. Transfer of Federal Employment of Handicapped Individuals Enforcement Functions.

All Federal employment of handicapped individuals enforcement functions and related functions vested in the Civil Service Commission pursuant to Section 501 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (29 U.S.C. 791) are hereby transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The function of being co-chairman of the Interagency Committee on Handicapped Employees now vested in the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission pursuant to Section 501 is hereby transferred to the Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

SECTION 5. *Transfer of Public Sector 707 Functions.

Any function of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission concerning initiation of litigation with respect to State or local government, or political subdivisions under Section 707 of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, (42 U.S.C. 2000e-6) and all necessary functions related thereto, including investigation, findings, notice and an opportunity to resolve the matter without contested litigation, are hereby transferred to the Attorney General, to be exercised by him in accordance with procedures consistent with said Title VII. The Attorney General is authorized to delegate any function under Section 707 of said Title VII to any officer or employee of the Department of Justice.

SECTION 6. *Transfer of Functions and Abolition of the Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council.

All functions of the Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council, which was established pursuant to Section 715 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, (42 U.S.C. 2000e-14), are hereby transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council is hereby abolished.

SECTION 7. *Savings Provision.

Administrative proceedings including administrative appeals from the acts of an executive agency (as defined by Section 105 of Title 5 of the United States Code) commenced or being conducted by or against such executive agency will not abate by reason of the taking effect of this Plan. Consistent with the provisions of this Plan, all such proceedings shall continue before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission otherwise unaffected by the transfers provided by this Plan. Consistent with the provisions of this Plan, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall accept appeals from those executive agency actions which occurred prior to the effective date of this Plan in accordance with law and regulations in effect on such effective date. Nothing herein shall affect any right of any person to judicial review under applicable law.

SECTION 8. *Incidental Transfers.

So much of the personnel, property, records and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations and other funds employed, used, held, available, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred under this Plan, as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the appropriate department, agency, or component at such time or times as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide, except that no such unexpended balances transferred shall be used for purposes other than those for which the appropriation was originally made. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for terminating the affairs of the Council abolished herein and for such further measures and dispositions as such Director deems necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Reorganization Plan.

SECTION 9. *Effective Date.

This Reorganization Plan shall become effective at such time or times, on or before October 1, 1979, as the President shall specify, but not sooner than the earliest time allowable under Section 906 of Title 5 of the United States Code.

Budget Deferrals

Message to the Congress. February 23, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report a new Department of Commerce deferral of Maritime Administration funds totaling $122 million in budget authority and a new deferral of $0.4 million in outlays for the Antirecession financial assistance fund in the Department of the Treasury.

In addition, I am reporting routine revisions to two previously transmitted deferrals. A Department of the Interior deferral is increased by $2 million in budget authority, and a Department of the Treasury deferral is increased by $4.1 million in outlays.

The details of each deferral are contained in the attached reports.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,

February 23, 1978.

NOTE: The attachments detailing the deferrals are printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 1, 1978.

President's Committee on Mental Retardation

*Appointment of Seven Members.
February 23, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of seven persons as members of the President's Committee on Mental Retardation for terms expiring May 11, 1980. They are:

ROBERT G. JORDAN, JR., M.D., director of the University of Tennessee Child Development Center;

ANA NAVARRO, M.D., director of the crippled children and mental retardation program of the Family Health Service Division, Assistant Secretariat for Ambulatory Care, of the Puerto Rico Department of Health;

ANDERSON W. POLLARD, community liaison officer for the child psychiatry and mental retardation program at the Neuropsychiatric Institute at UCLA;

LUDWIG ROTHBEIN, member of the Denver Commission for the Disabled and of the Denver Association for Retarded Citizens;

EUNICE KENNEDY SHRIVER, executive vice president of the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr., Foundation;

FLORENCE K. SIMONS, administrative assistant at Paul Stafford Associates in Washington and a researcher on the family;

SAMUEL WHITMAN, associate dean of government and community relations and assistant professor of community health at Case Western Reserve University.

Geological Survey

Nomination of H. William Menard To Be Director. February 23, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate H. William Menard, of La Jolla, Calif., to be Director of the Geological Survey. He would replace Vincent E. McKelvey, resigned.

Menard was born December 10, 1920, in Fresno, Calif. He received a B.S. in 1942 and an M.S. in 1947 from California Institute of Technology, and a Ph. D. in geology in 1949 from Harvard University. He served in the U.S. Navy during World War II.

Menard was a marine geologist with the Navy Electronics Laboratory from 1949 to 1955, and since 1955 has been a professor of geology at Scripps Institution of Oceanography. He has also been an independent geological consultant, doing underwater mapping and making deep sea oceanographic expeditions. He has been a technical adviser to a number of Government agencies and is the author of numerous articles and four books.

United States Mint at Philadelphia

Nomination of Shallie M. Bey, Jr., To Be Superintendent. February 23, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Shallie M. Bey, Jr., of Lindenwold, N.J., to be Superintendent of the U.S. Mint at Philadelphia. He would replace Nicholas G. Theodore, who has resigned.

Bey was born March 26, 1949, in Gary, Ind. He received a B.S.E.E. from Purdue University in 1971 and an M.B.A. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1977.

From 1971 to 1973, Bey was an engineer with the Sun Oil Co. in Toledo, Ohio. From 1973 to 1977, he was with the Alliance Enterprise Corp. in Philadelphia, a venture capital investment company and Sun Co. subsidiary, where he served as vice president and director in 1973 and 1974 and president and director from 1974 to 1977.

Since 1977 Bey has been planning coordinator for the Sun Co. in Radnor, Pa., where he is responsible for coordinating the planning and operations for six operating subsidiaries.

Board of Foreign Scholarships

Appointment of Five Members. February 23, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of five persons as members of the Board of Foreign Scholarships. They are:

For terms expiring September 22, 1980

BARTLE BULL, president and publisher of Firehouse Magazine and a director of the New York Magazine Co.;

MONROE D. DONSKER, professor of mathematics at New York University (reappointment);

TOMAS RIVERA, vice president for administration of the University of Texas at San Antonio;

ELBERT B. SMITH, professor of history at the University of Maryland.

For a term expiring September 22, 1978

JEWEL PLUMMER COBB, dean of the college and professor of biological science at Douglass College, Rutgers University.

Great Lakes Basin Commission

Appointment of Leila L. Botts as Chairman. February 23, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Leila L. Botts, of Ann Arbor, Mich., as Chairman of the Great Lakes Basin Commission. She replaces Frederick Rouse, who has resigned.

Botts, 49, is a native of Oklahoma and holds a B.A. from Oklahoma State University. During the 1950's and 1960's she was a freelance writer and did community and conservation volunteer work in Chicago. She became executive director of the Lake Michigan Federation when it was organized in 1970 as a regional coalition to promote citizen action on environmental issues. Since 1976 she has been Region V Assistant for Congressional and Intergovernmental Relations for the Environmental Protection Agency.

Committee for Purchase from the Blind and Other Severely Handicapped

Appointment of Five Members. February 23, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of five persons as members of the Committee for Purchase from the Blind and Other Severely Handicapped. They are:

EDMUND ALVAREZ, Director of the Office of Operations of the Department of Agriculture;

ROBERT P. GRAHAM, Commissioner of the Federal Supply Service, General Services Administration;

REAR ADM. EUGENE A. GRINSTEAD, Commander, Naval Supply Systems Command and Chief of Supply Corps for the U.S. Navy;

MAJ. GEN. DEWEY K. K. LOWE, Director of Procurement Policy for the Deputy Chief of Staff, Systems and Logistics, U.S. Air Force;

BRIG. GEN. ERNEST A. VULEY, JR., Director of Materiel Management, U.S. Army Materiel Development and Readiness Command.

Endangered American Wilderness Act of 1978

*Remarks on Signing H.R. 3454 Into Law.
February 24, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, I want to thank the Members of Congress and the Cabinet who are assembled here for the signing of a very important piece of legislation.

In my environmental message to the Congress in 1977 last May, I urged prompt expansion of the National Wilderness Preservation System, among the most deserving areas that could be lost forever for the American people.

Today I am signing H.R. 3454, the Endangered American Wilderness Act of 1978. This act will add about 1.3 million acres in 10 Western States to the wilderness areas of our country, expanding 4 existing wilderness areas and adding 13 new areas at this time. This represents the largest single addition to the wilderness areas of our country since the original enactment of the wilderness act in 1964, and it brings the total acreage in this system now to 15.7 million acres.

This bill is critical in preserving areas that are a vital part of our national heritage and that will be enjoyed by our American people in this generation and in generations and centuries to come.

In passing this bill the Congress has adequately addressed, for the time being, the need to protect endangered areas in the continental United States, the 48 lower States. But we still have an opportunity to act on legislation that will preserve crucial wilderness areas in Alaska before some of the most spectacular scenery in the world and the most productive wildlife habitats in the world are lost forever.

My administration has made proposals for Alaskan lands that reconcile needs for development and conservation, working very closely with Members of the Congress, especially those behind me this morning. And I hope that the entire Congress and the administration can press forward together to complete action on these Alaskan lands this year.

I want to express especially my appreciation to Congressman Udall, to Senator Church, to Senator Jackson, to Congressman Roncalio, Congressman Weaver, and also to Secretary Bergland, who helped to make this bill possible. It's a great step forward for our country, and it will be appreciated by Americans many years in the future.

Thank you very much, gentlemen. I'm very proud of the things you have done.

[At this point, the President signed the bill.]

Mo, if you and Frank and the others would like to make a brief statement, it would be appreciated.

REPRESENTATIVE UDALL. Well, I don't think I need to sit down. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. This chair is not like that ladder I loaned you during the campaign.

REPRESENTATIVE UDALL. He was very generous with that ladder. [Laughter]

You know, like football teams, you have good years and bad years, and in some areas you're stronger than in others.

We're going to get an energy bill with the help of Scoop Jackson and you, Mr. President. We're going to do some other things. But in the resource and conservation area, this President and this Congress working together are going to do some things that history will remember.

We've done strip mining after 10 years. We've got endangered wilderness today. We've got Chattahoochee on the road now, this place in Georgia where we're having one of these great urban national parks. The President probably knows where it is. We've got redwoods coming along. And we're going to wrap it all up with Alaska.

That's the greatest resource conservation decision we made in my lifetime. And I was particularly pleased to hear the President give it a plug this morning. We're going to get it out of committee on our side in just a couple of weeks, and we hope the Senate will come along, too.

Thank you.

SENATOR CHURCH. Mr. President, I think Mo has just about said it all. As we've tried to do right by the Lower 48, we're going to try to do right by Alaska as well. I think this is one of the most important pieces of conservation legislation to be enacted in this session of the Congress.

I just want to congratulate you and your administration for the support you've given it and for the action you've taken in signing it into law today.

THE PRESIDENT. The original act was sponsored and supported strongly by two Senators who died recently, Senator Metcalf and Senator Humphrey. But I know that you and Mo and others here, and Scoop, were instrumental in the passage of that original legislation, which was a landmark in progress in our country.

Scoop?

SENATOR JACKSON. Mr. President, I'd merely like to observe that you and your Cabinet officials and your staff have been superb in cooperation with the Congress. I think that's kind of welcome news, from what I've been reading in the press. [Laughter] It's been that way across the board. But I think this is an outstanding example of that teamwork. And we're very proud of your help and your support.

THE PRESIDENT. That is mutual. Thanks, Scoop. Anybody else?

Well, I want to thank all of you. This is a wonderful occasion for us. Bob Bergland and Cecil Andrus have both been after me to go out and visit some of these areas, and I look forward to doing that, hopefully, this year.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:38 a.m. at the signing ceremony in the Cabinet Room at the White House.

As enacted, H.R. 3454 is Public Law 95-237, approved February 24.

Energy Emergency in Pennsylvania

*Statement by the President.
February 24, 1978*

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I hereby determine that a regional energy emergency exists in the State of Pennsylvania of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate and sulfur dioxide control regulations under the Pennsylvania Air Quality Implementation Plan may be necessary, and that other means of responding to the energy emergency may be inadequate. This determination shall be effective for not more than thirty (30) days, provided that the State of Pennsylvania shall hold the public hearing required by Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act within 1 week of this determination. If, during the period of suspension, I find that a regional energy emergency no longer exists in Pennsylvania, I will direct that this determination of regional energy emergency be rescinded and that all suspension orders issued by the Governor be terminated effective on the day of that rescission. The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Pennsylvania and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to act with due care if he suspends air pollution regulations under the authority provided by this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health. In conducting hearings and making findings, I urge the Governor to consider carefully that suspensions which would allow a facility to burn available fuel which could not otherwise be utilized generally are appropriate. On the other hand, suspensions which permit facilities to turn off pollution control devices should be used sparingly and as a last resort, because such suspensions will accomplish only small energy savings while increasing risks to public health.

I also urge the Governor to implement fully necessary energy conservation measures so that the necessity for suspension of pollution control regulations can be minimized.

NOTE: The Presidential determination is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

Federal Service Impasses Panel

*Appointment of Seven Members.
February 24, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of seven persons as members of the Federal Service Impasses Panel. They are:

IRVING BERNSTEIN, professor of political science and research associate at UCLA;

HOWARD G. GAMSER, Washington attorney and arbitrator and adjunct professor of labor law at Georgetown University (also appointed Chairman of the Panel);

JAMES E. JONES, JR., professor of law and industrial relations and director of the Center for Equal Employment and Affirmative Action at the University of Wisconsin's Industrial Relations Research Institute;

JEAN T. MCKELVEY, professor at Cornell's School of Industrial and Labor Relations;

CHARLES J. MORRIS, labor arbitrator, professor at the School of Law, Southern Methodist University, and presently visiting professor at the School of Industrial and Labor Relations at Cornell;

Science and Technology Policy Functions

Executive Order 12039. February 24, 1978

RELATING TO THE TRANSFER OF CERTAIN SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY POLICY FUNCTIONS

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including Section 7 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101 (October 21, 1977)), Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and Section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950 (31 U.S.C. 581c), and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for the transfer of certain science and technology functions, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. (a) The transfer, provided by Section 5A of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101) of certain functions under the National Science and Technology Policy, Organization, and Priorities Act of 1976, hereinafter referred to as the Act (90 Stat. 459, 42 U.S.C. 6601 et seq.), from the Office of Science and Technology Policy and its Director to the Director of the National Science Foundation is hereby effective.

(b) The abolition of the Intergovernmental Science, Engineering, and Technology Advisory Panel, the President's Committee on Science and Technology, and the Federal Coordinating Council for Science, Engineering and Technology (established in accordance with Titles II, III, and IV of the Act) and the transfer of their functions (Sections 205(b)(1), 303 (a) and (b)(1), and 401 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. 6614(b)(1), 6633(a) and (b)(1), and 6651(e)) to the President of the United States of America, provided by Section 5A of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977, are hereby effective.

SEC. 2. (a) The intergovernmental science, engineering, and technology functions under Section 205(b)(1) of the Act (42 U.S.C. 6614(b)(1)), which were transferred to the President (see Section 1(b) of this Order), are delegated to the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy; Except that, the responsibility for fostering any policies to facilitate the transfer and utilization of research and development results is delegated to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

(b) The functions vested by subsection (a) of this Section in the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall be performed in accord with the Director's responsibilities under the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968 (82 Stat. 1098, 42 U.S.C. 4201 et seq.). The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall advise the Director of the Office of Management and Budget with respect to the needs of State, regional, and local governments which may be assisted by the utilization of science, engineering, and technology research and development results.

(c) The functions vested by subsection (a) of this Section in the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall be performed in coordination with the Director of the Office of Management and Budget and with others as designated by the President.

(d) To advise the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy on the performance of those functions delegated to him by subsection (a) of this Section, he shall establish, in accord with the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I), an Intergovernmental Science, Engineering, and Technology Advisory Panel. The Panel members shall include representatives of such Executive agencies and such officials of State and local governments as the Director may designate.

SEC. 3. The Federal science, engineering, and technology functions under Section 303(a) and (b)(1) of the Act (42 U.S.C. 6633(a) and (b)(1)), which were transferred to the President (see Section 1(b) of this Order), are delegated to the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy: Except that, those functions concerned with reorganization, including Federal-State liaison, are delegated to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, who shall be provided advice and assistance thereon by the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy.

SEC. 4. The science, engineering, and technology and related activities functions under Section 401(e) of the Act (42 U.S.C. 6651(e)), which were transferred to the President (see Section 1(b) of this Order), are delegated to the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy.

SEC. 5. There is hereby established the Federal Coordinating Council for Science, Engineering, and Technology. The Council shall be composed of the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, who shall be Chairman, and representatives of such other Executive agencies designated by the Chairman. The head of an agency so designated shall designate an appropriate individual to serve on the Council. The Council shall advise and assist the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy in the performance of those functions delegated under Section 4 of this Order.

SEC. 6. The records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations, available or to be made available, which relate to the functions transferred, reassigned, or redelegated by this Order are hereby transferred to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, or the Director of the National Science Foundation, as appropriate.

SEC. 7. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall make such determinations, issue such orders, and take all actions necessary or appropriate to effectuate the transfers or reassignments provided by this Order, including the transfer of funds, records, property, and personnel.

SEC. 8. This Order shall be effective on February 26, 1978.

Environmental Evaluation Functions

Executive Order 12040. February 24, 1978

RELATING TO THE TRANSFER OF CERTAIN ENVIRONMENTAL EVALUATION FUNC- TIONS

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including Section 7 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101 (October 21, 1977)), and as President of the United States of America, in order to effectuate the transfer of certain environmental quality functions, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. The transfer, provided by Section 5E of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), of those functions relating to the evaluation provided for by Section 11 of the Federal Non-nuclear Energy Research and Development Act of 1974 (88 Stat. 1878, 42 U.S.C. 5910), from the Council on Environmental Quality and the Office of Environmental Quality to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall be effective February 26, 1978.

SEC. 2. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall make such determinations, issue such orders, and take all actions necessary or appropriate to effectuate the transfer of functions provided in this Order, including the transfer of funds, personnel and positions, property, records, and other items related to the functions transferred.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

Remarks Announcing a Negotiated Settlement. February 24, 1978

I've just talked on the telephone with the representatives of the Bituminous Coal Operators and also the United Mine Workers. And I'm glad to announce that the United Mine Workers and the coal operators have agreed to a negotiated settlement of their contract dispute.

This is the outcome toward which all of us have been working so hard, especially Secretary of Labor Ray Marshall. We've been devoted to this; it's one on which our country should feel both gratitude and pride. It was because we believed in the free process of collective bargaining that I have been so determined to give that process every chance to work. It has worked. And the settlement it has produced is better for everyone involved—for the mineworkers, the mine-owners, and the public—than would have been the drastic steps that I was prepared to take this evening if the negotiating process had failed.

Although a settlement has been reached, it will not be final until it is studied and democratically ratified by the members of the United Mine Workers. Before I close, I would like to speak directly to them.

The work you do in the mines is sometimes dangerous and always difficult. No one can visit a coal mine, even for a short time, as I have, without coming away with a vivid sense of respect and appreciation for the job you do. Yours is a historic struggle. Whenever there has been progress in the mines, whenever there have been improvements in pay or in safety conditions or in health conditions, it's been because you fought for it. Your dedication to justice in the mines has been matched only by your dedication to your country whenever it needed you, whether in war or in peacetime. The agreement that has been reached today is no different. You struggled for it, and it is a significant achievement.

The choice is now yours to make. But I hope that you will follow the lead of your bargaining council and ratify the negotiated settlement. This agreement serves the national interest, as well as your own interests and those of your families. If it is not approved without delay, time will have run out for all of us, and I will have to take the drastic and unsatisfactory legal action which I would have announced tonight.

The miners and the operators share with the public one overriding interest, which is to resolve the long-term problems of your industry.

I will now appoint a Presidential commission, which has already been discussed with you, to work with union and management to find answers to the basic questions of health, safety, and stable productivity. In the meantime, I offer my congratulations and my sincere thanks to those who have made the collective bargaining process work.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 7:03 p.m. in the Briefing Room at the White House. His remarks were broadcast live on radio and television.

Reception for Friends From New Hampshire

*Remarks at the White House Reception.
February 24, 1978*

My whole family is coming in. We've been very grateful to interrupt the receiving line. Nobody will complain, I'm sure, because we have reached a long-sought agreement on the coal contract, and we hope that within the next 10 days or 2 weeks—[applause]. All afternoon I've been writing two speeches: a long one if we failed—and we had television time already arranged for 9 o'clock this evening—and a short one if we succeeded. And I preferred the short speech.

I just spoke to Lucille Kelley and Rosalynn, and I told Lucille that "Second only to you, I've spent more nights with her than I have any other woman in the world." [Laughter]

You can't imagine how close we feel to you. Although it's been exactly 2 years since we heard the tremendous news of the New Hampshire primary election returns, you've remained constantly in our hearts.

I went to New Hampshire as a lonely candidate with practically no friends. I was later followed by all the members of my family and then by hundreds of members of the Peanut Brigade, some of whom are here tonight. And you took us in, and we felt that we were part of you. It was a lot like Georgia, with the small communities, close-knit families, deep religious convictions, a belief in our Nation and what it stands for, a willingness to work hard, sometimes poverty, but always encouragement.

At first we had a hard time knowing what to call you. Some folks said "New Hampshiremen," but we knew the women would get mad. Some folks said "New Hampshireites." Some said "Granite Staters." Somebody in Georgia said, "Just call them Republicans." [Laughter] We proved that was wrong. And so finally I and all my family, the Peanut Brigaders, found a word to call you, and that word was "friends." And we thank you for it.

There's a uniqueness about New Hampshire. It's different from every other place in this country, but in many ways, New Hampshire is kind of like the United States in microcosm. You're a miniature picture of what our country is. And in the intense person-to-person campaigning on the streets, in the stores, in shops, factory shift lines, in your homes, later in larger meetings, we became acquainted with the problems of our Nation, with the hopes and dreams and ideals of American people, with issues which we had not previously debated, and with your own ideas.

And it would be hard for you to realize—who come from New Hampshire—how much those early days of a political campaign shape the future campaign itself and the attitudes that I brought into the White House, representing you.

There's a special place in this White House for you, and we've been looking forward with great anticipation to this anniversary of your gift to me. And I want to tell you that I will always do the best I can to make you proud.

I was glad to come back to Nashua this past weekend to be with my friend, Tom McIntyre, with John Durkin, with many of you, and to receive the tough questions from the high school students. [Laughter]

Future candidates will find a well-trained new generation to cross-examine when we come into your State. And I want to tell you that we would like to say this is your home. We're glad to have you here and hope you have a good time.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 7:10 p.m. in the East Room at the White House.

Generalized System of Preferences for Developing Countries

Executive Order 12041. February 25, 1978

AMENDING THE GENERALIZED SYSTEM OF PREFERENCES

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and statutes of the United States of America, including Title V and Section 604 of the Trade Act of 1974 (88 Stat. 2066, 19 U.S.C. 2461 et seq.; 88 Stat. 2073, 19 U.S.C. 2483), and as President of the United States of America, in order to modify, as provided by Section 504(c) of the Trade Act of 1974 (88 Stat. 2070, 19 U.S.C. 2464(c)), the limitations on preferential treatment for eligible articles from countries designated as beneficiary developing countries, and to adjust the original designation of eligible articles taking into account information and advice received in fulfillment of Section 503(a) and 131-134 of the Trade Act of 1974, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. In order to subdivide existing items for purposes of the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), the Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS) are modified as provided in Annex I, attached hereto and made a part hereof.

SEC. 2. Annex II of Executive Order No. 11888 of November 24, 1975, as amended, listing articles that are eligible for benefits of the GSP when imported from any designated beneficiary developing country, is further amended as provided in Annex II, attached hereto and made a part hereof.

SEC. 3. Annex III of Executive Order No. 11888, as amended, listing articles that are eligible for benefits of the GSP when imported from all designated beneficiary countries except those specified in General Headnote 3(c)(iii) of the TSUS, is amended by substituting therefor the new Annex III, attached hereto and made a part hereof.

SEC. 4. General Headnote 3(c)(iii) of the TSUS, listing articles that are eligible for benefits of the GSP except when imported from the beneficiary countries listed opposite those articles, is amended by substituting therefor the new Annex IV, attached hereto and made a part hereof.

SEC. 5. The amendments made by this Order shall be effective with respect to articles that are both: (1) imported on or after January 1, 1976, and (2) entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption on or after March 1, 1978.

Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations

Appointment of Abraham D. Beame as Chairman. February 27, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Abraham D. Beame as Chairman of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

Beame, 71, was mayor of New York City from 1974 to 1978. He began his career in city government in 1946, serving as assistant budget director for New York City. In 1952 he was promoted to budget director. In 1962 Beame was elected comptroller of New York, and he continued in this post until 1965, when he won the Democratic mayoral nomination. He did not win the election that year, and during the next 4 years of private life, he was a consultant in the area of finance. In 1969 he was reelected as comptroller, and in 1973 he was elected mayor.

The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations was established in 1959 to bring together representatives of Federal, State, and local governments for consideration of common problems. It has 26 members, of whom 20 are appointed by the President (3 private citizens, 3 executive branch officials, 4 Governors, 3 representatives of State legislatures, 4 mayors, and 3 county officials), 3 by the President of the Senate, and 3 by the Speaker of the House.

Council on Wage and Price Stability

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. February 27, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with Section 5 of the Council on Wage and Price Stability Act, as amended, I hereby transmit to the Congress the twelfth quarterly report of the Council on Wage and Price Stability. This report contains a description of the Council's activities during the third quarter of 1977 in monitoring both prices and wages in the private sector and various Federal Government activities that may lead to higher costs and prices without creating commensurate benefits. It discusses Council reports, analyses, and filings before Federal regulatory agencies.

In August 1977 I asked the Council to undertake an in-depth study of the Nation's steel industry. The study was released in October and served as an important information base in the Administration's development of its reference price system for imports of foreign steel.

Also in the third quarter, at the request of Secretary of HUD Patricia Roberts Harris, the Council accelerated its study of lumber prices and the lumber products industry.

The Council on Wage and Price Stability will continue to play an important role in supplementing fiscal and monetary policies by calling public attention to wage and price developments or actions by the Government that could be of concern to American consumers.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
February 27, 1978.

Elementary and Secondary Education

Remarks Announcing the Administration's Proposals to the Congress. February 28, 1978

Good morning, everybody. My first public job was as a member of the Sumter County School Board, and I've never lost my early conviction that the noblest task of government is education. In this task, the Federal Government must be a strong and reliable partner for the State and local governments.

There are three major elements in my education proposals to Congress for this year.

First, I've asked Congress to work with me in creating a Cabinet-level department of education, as was promised during the campaign. Education is far too important a matter to be scattered piecemeal among various Government departments and agencies, which are often busy with sometimes dominant concerns. We must pull our education programs together if we are to assure them of the full attention that they deserve.

Secondly, I recently proposed a plan to Congress that would make financial help available each year to 2 million more college students than are now eligible. College costs have gone up 77 percent in the last 10 years, a burden on many low- and middle-income families that we must help to ease.

No able student should be denied a college education because a family cannot afford it. My proposals now being considered by Congress will bring us closer to making this a reality.

Today, as the third element in this year's educational program, I'm sending Congress my major legislative proposals on elementary and secondary education. Altogether, we are seeking for next year an increase over this year's spending of 26 percent and a total increase of 46 percent—$4 billion increase in these 2 fiscal years.

These much needed, additional funds for elementary and secondary education are the largest proposed by any President since the creation of the program by President Johnson and the Congress more than 10 years ago.

Most of these changes will let us channel Federal funds more efficiently, effectively, and directly to those so often short-changed in our educational system because of social problems or because of poverty.

Today's proposals also will focus our Nation's resources in helping our children master the basic skills, often in recent years neglected—reading, writing, and arithmetic—which remain critical to their ability to function in a complex society.

We must do a better job of teaching these basic skills to all our children. We cannot fail to make the best use of our primary weapon against ignorance and lack of opportunity—our schools. As we improve our elementary and secondary school system, all Americans will benefit.

Now the Vice President has a statement, and Secretary Califano. We have a group of key congressional leaders. Joe Califano will explain that some who were going to be here this morning, who support the program very strongly, are working hard in the House and Senate on the first two elements that I described to you. And I'd like to introduce now, the Vice President.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:32 a.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House. Following the President's remarks, Vice President Walter F. Mondale spoke and then introduced Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Joseph A. Califano, Jr., who held a news conference on the proposals.

Elementary and Secondary Education

Message to the Congress. February 28, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am submitting today my proposals to strengthen our major elementary and secondary education programs. These are one part of a concerted effort to reestablish education in the forefront of our domestic priorities. The other parts are major increases in the Federal education budget, establishment of a Cabinet-level Department of Education, and our proposal for a significant expansion of eligibility for college student assistance.

The proposals which I am now submitting for elementary and secondary education seek to enhance the primary role of the states and local communities in educating our Nation's children and reaffirm the need for a strong and supportive Federal commitment to education. They will:

- strengthen our commitment to basic skills education in Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act—the compensatory education program; and add a new provision to concentrate a major share of increased Title I funding on those school systems most in need;
- create a new program to encourage state implementation of their own compensatory education programs;
- provide additional flexibility in the Emergency School Aid Act, designed to assist in desegregation, so that funds can be retargeted from areas where they are no longer needed to areas of greater need;
- create a new research and demonstration effort in the area of basic skills, and enhance our efforts to link schools with employers and other community resources;
- implement a phased, gradual but substantial reform of the Impact Aid Program;
- strengthen the bilingual education program with emphasis on teaching English as a primary and overriding goal but permitting flexibility in use of first language and culturally sensitive approaches to help achieve this goal;
- strengthen participation of private schools in existing grant programs.

We can be justly proud of the accomplishments of our system of education. Education has promoted understanding among a diverse people; it has been the springboard to advancement for generations of our citizens; and it has produced the skills and knowledge required for this country to have the most advanced economy in the world.

Yet our schools face many important challenges. We must do a better job of teaching the basic skills of reading, writing and mathematics. We must remain committed to full and equal educational opportunity for all children. We must help students achieve educational excellence. We must responsibly reduce the financial barriers that limit access to higher education. And we must give education a more prominent and visible role in the Federal government.

We will face these challenges and overcome them. No asset is of greater value to our Nation and no commitment is so characteristic of the American people as our strong commitment to educate all our children.

EDUCATION BUDGET

The Administration's budget proposals for the coming year show the priority we give to education. Our FY 1979 budget contains $12.9 billion in appropriations for the Education Division of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

That represents an increase of 24 percent above the FY 1978 level and a total increase of 46 percent and $4 billion in the last two fiscal years.

I have requested appropriations of $6.9 billion for elementary and secondary education, an increase of fifteen percent over FY 1978. This increase is the largest since the creation of the program and exceeds the FY 1977 budget by $1.7 billion. Along with these increases goes a forty percent increase in student assistance programs for higher education and a new effort to expand the reach of these programs to moderate income families hard-pressed by escalating tuition costs. Funding for these student assistance programs will rise from $3.8 billion in FY 1978 to $5.2 billion in FY 1979.

This budget reflects the judgment, widely shared by the Congress, that improving the education of our children is a wise investment in our future.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

I have instructed the Office of Management and Budget and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to work with Congress on legislation needed to establish a Department of Education which will:

- let us focus on Federal educational policy, at the highest levels of our government;
- permit closer coordination of Federal education programs and other related activities;
- reduce Federal regulations and reporting requirements and cut duplication;
- assist school districts, teachers, and parents to make better use of local resources and ingenuity.

A separate Cabinet-level department will enable the Federal government to be a true partner with State, local, and private education institutions in sustaining and improving the quality of our education system.

COLLEGE STUDENT ASSISTANCE

I recently proposed a major expansion of the programs providing financial assistance to students in higher education. Average college costs have increased by seventy-seven percent in the last ten years. At average costs of $4,500 per year in private higher education and $2,500 in public universities low and middle income families are finding it difficult to send their children to college. No able student should be denied a college education because his or her family cannot afford tuition, room and board.

My proposals will increase the number of students receiving assistance from three million to more than five million at a cost of $1.46 billion. The proposals would:

- expand the Basic Educational Opportunity Grants program to serve students from families with incomes up to $25,000 and increase the maximum grant to $1,800;
- make interest-subsidized Guaranteed Student Loans available to families with incomes up to $45,000;
- provide part-time jobs to college students through an expanded College Work-Study Program.

This coordinated program is the best way to meet the needs of our students and their families. I strongly oppose the enactment of a tuition tax credit.

A college tuition tax credit would cost too much, would provide benefits to those without need, would provide less benefit to genuinely hard-pressed families than the proposals we have advanced, and would fragment educational policy within the executive and legislative branches of the Federal government.

A choice must be made. We cannot afford—and I will not accept—both a tuition tax credit and the increased student aid I have proposed. I strongly urge the Congress to act responsibly on the Administration's proposals.

ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The legislation I am submitting today involves the major elementary and secondary education programs. Since the Administration of Lyndon Johnson the primary role of these Federal programs has been to support improvements in educational quality for all children and improve the educational opportunities and achievements of the disadvantaged, the handicapped, those with limited English language skills, Native Americans and other minorities. I propose to continue and strengthen the use of Federal resources to meet special needs, and Federal leadership in research and innovation.

These programs must focus on the mastery of the basic skills necessary to function in our highly complex society. Every child should obtain the basic skills of reading, writing and mathematics early in his or her educational career. This should be the fundamental goal for our entire education system, and I hope that Federal leadership will help us meet that goal at every level of our school system.

SPECIAL PROGRAMS FOR DISADVANTAGED CHILDREN

I propose to improve Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act which provides supplemental educational services to economically disadvantaged children.

1. Concentration of Resources

Recent evaluations show that Title I is beginning to raise the achievement levels of low-income students. I propose to build upon this success by incorporating in the reauthorization of the Act a separate authority to increase help for school districts with high concentrations of poor children. The amendments I propose will target additional Title I funds to school districts with large numbers of poor children (5,000 or more) or large proportions of poor children (20 percent or more), for use in programs with a strong emphasis on basic skills. I have requested $400 million in the 1979 budget for this proposal, which would aid 3,500 school districts and could increase the number of Title I eligible children served to 6.5 million.

This targeting of additional funds on areas of greatest need will be of special benefit to urban school systems with concentrations of low-income children. It is an important part of our efforts to help meet the needs of our cities. Yet the problems of educational disadvantage are not unique to cities; therefore, while 67% of the funds will flow to center-city school systems, 33% will flow to rural and suburban school systems which have similar needs.

2. State Programs for Disadvantaged Children

Strong State efforts are clearly necessary to fully meet the needs of disadvantaged children. Currently, however, fewer than twenty States have special programs to aid disadvantaged students. To encourage the creation of compensatory education programs at the State level, I recommend that a share of future increases in the Title I program be allocated, on the basis of one Federal dollar for every two State dollars, to States with qualified compensatory education programs of their own. In fiscal year 1980 twenty percent of any increases would be devoted to this matching program. In future years an increasing percentage would be made available.

I hope this Federal incentive program will encourage a response at the State level which will give greater opportunities to millions of children.

EMERGENCY SCHOOL AID ACT

We must move aggressively to end the last vestiges of racial and ethnic mistrust and disharmony in our schools and in our society as a whole. Great progress toward that goal has been made, particularly in the South, but much remains to be done.

The Emergency School Aid Act has helped numerous local school districts respond to the problems of racial isolation and improve education for all their children. I recommend amendments to that legislation which would:

- encourage voluntary local initiatives to overcome the adverse effects of minority group isolation;
- offer flexibility to meet the needs of desegregating districts;
- and encourage multi-year planning and implementation of desegregation.

To give us more flexibility in meeting changing needs, I propose to increase the share of discretionary funds from 22 percent to 42 percent. This will permit allocation of resources to areas of greatest need. At the same time I am recommending a new system of multi-year grants which will sharply reduce paperwork and will help local school systems plan for the future.

BASIC SKILLS

The Federal government can play an important role in funding research and demonstration projects which will show us how to improve the quality and effectiveness of our educational system. Student achievement can be improved through innovation, and a concentration on basic skills. I propose several improvements in this area:

- the creation of a new Basic Skills and Educational Quality title in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act which would encourage state and local demonstration efforts to improve basic skills in reading, writing and mathematics, including increased use of achievement testing and the participation by parents in teaching their children;

- the creation of a new Special Projects title in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act to consolidate educational quality developmental programs and provide greater flexibility; and strengthen our efforts, through the Community Schools program, to link the school with employers and other resources in the surrounding community;
- changes in the Adult Education Act to put more emphasis on competency in basic skills and on obtaining high school credentials, and to increase sponsorship of adult education programs by business, labor and other community organizations.

IMPACT AID

Reform of Impact Aid is a challenge which must be faced. The purpose of the program is to compensate school districts for the cost of educating children when local revenues are reduced by tax-exempt federally-owned land and when local school enrollments are increased by children whose parents live and/or work on that land. Yet Impact Aid, as currently structured, has strayed far from that purpose.

The legislation I propose makes realistic and responsible reforms:

- elimination of payments for children whose parents work on Federal property outside the country in which the school district is located;
- a two-year cap on payments which are based on public housing at the

- 1978 level followed by a phase out of the payments;
- an “absorption” provision which will reduce funding for lightly impacted districts by eliminating payments for children of Federal employees below three percent of non-federal enrollment.

To ease the adjustment to these changes I recommend a gradually declining “hold-harmless” provision under which no district will receive less than seventy-five percent of its previous year’s payments over the next three years. I also propose that advance funding be made so that districts can be notified early of their allocations.

These proposals will save $76 million in FY 1979 and $336 million in FY 1982. I believe they are a realistic way to start bringing the Impact Aid program into line with the actual Federal burden on local school districts.

BILINGUAL EDUCATION

Three million children today lack equal access to education in our schools because of their limited English-speaking ability. The Bilingual Education Act is designed to help local school systems develop and implement programs to help these children. The proposals I am submitting today will improve the bilingual education program by:

- emphasizing the overriding goal of achieving proficiency in English;
- permitting the flexible use of instructional materials and teaching techniques appropriate and sensitive to the language, background and needs of the child;
- making parents more involved;
- requiring that individual programs be of sufficient scope and duration to have a substantial educational impact;

- allowing English speaking children to take part in bilingual education programs;
- providing more money for teacher training and emphasizing the use of bilingual teachers; and
- increasing research in new teaching techniques.

Because the Bilingual Education Program is a demonstration program, every effort must be made to ensure that funds are used to help local school districts to establish and maintain programs of their own. To ensure that Federal demonstration funds benefit as many children as possible, I am proposing that program grants ordinarily be limited to five years. Districts will be required to show how they will ensure that educational progress is maintained following the phase-out of grant monies.

In addition, I am proposing that the Office of Bilingual Education be made responsible for coordinating bilingual education aspects of other programs administered by the Office of Education.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS

Private schools—particularly parochial schools—are an important part of our diverse educational system. Federal education programs have long required benefits to go to eligible students in both public and private schools. But this requirement has not been effective in practice. I am committed to doing all that the Constitution allows to ensure students in private schools benefit from Federal programs.

I propose the following changes to improve services to private school students:

- States will be required to develop plans for ensuring the equitable participation of private school students in all Federal educational programs.

—The Title I program will be changed to require that economically disadvantaged children in private schools receive comparable funds to those received by public school students, with similar needs.

—Where a school district fails to provide appropriate Federal educational benefits under any program to eligible private school children, authority will be used to by-pass the district and use another agency to provide constitutionally permissible services.

Private school children must receive fair treatment under Federal education programs. However I cannot support a tax credit for private elementary and secondary school tuition. First, there is grave doubt that such a tax credit program can meet Constitutional requirements concerning separation of church and State. Second, the Federal government provides funding primarily to help meet the needs of public school children who are disadvantaged, or handicapped, or bilingual, or who have some other form of special need. We do not provide general support for public schools and it would be unfair to extend such support, through a general tax credit, to private schools.

I will continue to do all I can, within Constitutional limits, to provide for full and equitable participation of private schools and their students in Federal education efforts.

WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL EQUITY ACT

In order to assist in the elimination of sexual discrimination in education I propose to make the Women's Educational Equity Act an independent authority and expand its role in assisting local school districts.

CONCLUSION

The proposals I have outlined today—to strengthen our basic education laws, substantially increase the education budget and undertake major organizational reform aimed at creating a Cabinet-level Department of Education—set forth a far-reaching agenda for education. These proposals are important not only for what they offer our children today, but for what they offer to all of us in the future: a country that is stronger, more united and better equipped to meet the challenges that lie before us.

United States-Italy Agreement on Social Security

Message to the Congress Transmitting the Agreement. February 28, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with section 233(e) (1) of the Social Security Act as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1977 (P.L. 95-216; 42 U.S.C. 1305 note), I transmit herewith the Agreement between the United States of America and the Italian Republic on the Matter of Social Security, signed May 23, 1973, the Administrative Protocol for the Agreement, signed November 22, 1977 (together with a procès-verbal setting forth certain interpretative understandings) and an exchange of notes of January 17-20, 1978 clarifying the interpretation of Article 1, paragraph K, of the Agreement.

The Agreement fulfills a long-standing commitment made by the two Governments in the 1951 Supplementary Agreement to their 1948 Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation. This totalization agreement would be the first such agreement undertaken by the United States, but is in the tradition of a number of earlier treaties between the United States and Italy. The first United States treaty to deal with any aspect of social security was concluded with Italy in 1913, and the 1948 treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation with Italy was the first of the post World War II era to contain broad social security provisions. This totalization agreement can be expected to be even more advantageous to Americans who have worked in Italy, either as U.S. citizens or before their immigration to this country, than any of the earlier treaties or agreements.

I also transmit for the information of the Congress a comprehensive report prepared by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare which explains the provisions of the Agreement and provides the actuarial data on the number of persons affected by the agreements and the effect on social security financing as required by the same provision of the Social Security Amendments of 1977.

The Department of State and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare join in commending this Agreement, Protocol and Exchange of Notes.

Council on Environmental Quality

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. February 28, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In 1977, we took together a number of important measures to protect and improve our environment. Most notable were the "mid-course correction" amendments that strengthened the basic goals of our air and water pollution control laws; a strong stripmining bill; and our selection, with Canada, of the least damaging route for a natural gas pipeline from Alaska to the lower 48 states.

The Administration began reviews of traditional policies on our use and development of natural resources, especially water and non-fuel minerals; put into effect new policies to reduce oil spills and regulate development of oil and gas on the Outer Continental Shelf; proposed expansions of wilderness and park areas; started work on a coherent Federal strategy for the control of toxic substances; and advocated measures to curb nuclear proliferation. On some of these matters we submitted legislative proposals to Congress.

We share a record of solid accomplishment in the environmental area, and we have set out worthwhile plans for the future.

In June, 1977, the Council on Environmental Quality convened a series of meetings at my direction. The purpose was to develop recommendations for improving National Environmental Policy Act procedures, including the familiar "environmental impact statement". CEQ solicited testimony from corporations, state governments, labor unions, environmental groups, other Federal agencies, and the public.

Virtually every witness criticized some aspect of the Government's procedures for translating environmental policy into practical action. But, remarkably, not a single witness called for the repeal or serious weakening of the National Environmental Policy Act. On the contrary, all agreed that the goals of NEPA were sound, and that its procedures—while needing improvement—should be retained.

Such unanimity on the value of NEPA indicates to me how far we have come in those few years since we first began to see the damage we were doing to our surroundings. Not long ago, environmental awareness was frequently seen as an emotional excess and an economic disaster. But now, concern for the integrity of our natural systems has become an accepted criterion for judging our actions.

We have not yet learned, of course, to balance all our environmental objectives against the other social goals that must concern us. But it is now clear that the American people believe our needs for food, for shelter, and for the necessities as well as the amenities of civilization, can be met without continuing the degradation of our planet. It is clear that they wish, as Congress stated in the National Environmental Policy Act, "to create and maintain conditions under which man and nature can exist in productive harmony, and fulfill the social, economic, and other requirements of present and future generations of Americans."

In less than a year, this Administration and this Congress have substantially advanced the American search for "productive harmony" with our earth. I pledge to continue this search with you.

National Governors' Conference

Remarks at a White House Reception for Governors Attending the Mid-Winter Conference. February 28, 1978

This is an evening for hospitality and friendship, for dancing and conversation, and not for speeches. And I wanted to say on behalf of myself and Rosalynn and Fritz and Joan [Mondale], the members of our Cabinet and staff, that we're delighted to have all of you come to the White House to be our guests here. It's your home as well as ours.

This is a home that's been occupied by every President since George Washington, and there's been great history made and great entertainment, and great leaders have occupied this beautiful room here on the east side of the White House.

When I was in the State senate, I always felt that I could go to the Governor of my State and get all the answers to my problems. When I got to be Governor, I felt that I could come and see the President and I could get all the answers to my problems. And now that I'm President, I feel like I can go back to the Governors. [Laughter]

I think your Mid-Winter Conference has been superb. I've had reports from my own staff, Jack Watson, and also our Cabinet members, some of whom are here tonight. I think it's been a hard-working, dedicated group, and the partnership that exists between us, as Fritz pointed out to you today, is one that's very valuable to us here in Washington.

So, I'd like for you tonight just to get to know us better, the new Governors of you; sympathize with me, the ones that were Governors when I was. And I give my condolences to the ones who are visiting the White House for the last time as Governors.

But I would like to say now that we have a wonderful store ahead of us of superb entertainment. This past Sunday afternoon we had a historical performance on this platform by Vladimir Horowitz, perhaps the greatest, certainly one of the greatest pianists who ever lived. And tonight we have wonderful entertainment in store for us again. Our country has produced great musicians, and one of the most beautiful and talented of those is Beverly Sills.

This is a night for dancing and for waltzing. She's going to sing some selections from "The Merry Widow," and she'll be accompanied by a great baritone, Allan Titus. So, Beverly, if you and Allan would come forward, we are very eager to hear from you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:35 p.m. in the East Room at the White House.

Black Lung Benefits Reform Act of 1977

*Remarks on Signing H.R. 4544 Into Law.
March 1, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. I think the attendance here this morning at this signing ceremony indicates the extreme importance of this legislation. Coal mining has always been a difficult and a dangerous trade, and among its most tragic risks has been black lung disease.

Three weeks ago, I signed a bill that provided for a new trust fund to be supported by an excise tax on coal to pay for black lung benefits. Today, I'm quite pleased to sign House bill 4544, the Black Lung Benefits Act of 1977, to strengthen the administration of that program.

These two bills, in conjunction with the Mine Safety and Health Amendments Act of 1977, which was signed last year, amount to a comprehensive Federal effort to reduce the human and social costs to our growing dependence on coal.

Coal miners have a right to working conditions as free as possible from dangerous coal dust. The black lung program recognizes that miners and their families also deserve compensation under a fair system when they contract this terrible disease and die or are disabled as a result of their work in the mines.

In the past, miners disabled by black lung disease too often have been denied the benefits they deserve. This bill will remedy many defects in the program. It simplifies and streamlines the process of filing for benefits and expands the eligibility to include respiratory and pulmonary impairment other than just to the lungs.

It eliminates unfair rules and time limits that have prevented disabled miners and their survivors from receiving benefits. The Labor Department will now be allowed to set fair standards of eligibility, based on the latest medical developments. Together, these amendments will ensure that more miners and their families will receive the benefits that they deserve.

The Congress and my administration have worked closely to develop these bills because of our great concern about the tragic effects of black lung disease. Many Members of the Congress have worked for this bill and the companion revenue bill already passed.

I want especially to thank Congressman Perkins in the House and Jennings Randolph in the Senate, who have visited me frequently about this legislation since I've been in office, and also, of course, Congressmen Thompson and Ullman, Senators Byrd, Williams, Long, and Dee Huddleston, and many others on the committees for the passage of these good reforms.

We could not restore life or health to the victims of this disease, but we can at least help to lift the financial burdens that these disabled miners and their families must bear. This bill accomplishes that goal.

As we've come to recognize, increased coal production is vital to our success in meeting future energy needs. But increased coal production must not be accomplished at the expense of greater suffering for coal miners and their families. This bill is another demonstration that the Federal Government will do all it can to give miners the support and the fair treatment that they deserve.

On behalf of the people of our country and particularly those States where coal mining is a major industry, I want to express my deep thanks to the Members of the Congress, to the members of the Cabinet, and to other interested persons who have made this comprehensive legislation—three major bills in the last 6 or 8 months—possible to alleviate the affliction that has for so long been suffered by the brave and courageous and dedicated and sometimes long-suffering coal miners of our country.

[At this point, the President signed the bill.]

Senator Randolph, would you like to say a word?

SENATOR RANDOLPH. Mr. President, there is a commitment not only of your administration but of the Congress and, especially, I think, of the American people to do justice in connection with what has now become law. It's been a long battle, really, to aid the miners and their survivors. We began in 1969, and that was the first bill.

Senator Williams, Senator Byrd, Senator Javits, Senator Stafford, many, many in the Senate remember those days. We did that, Mr. President—and I must not speak too long—we did it one year before we passed the occupational health and safety legislation, because it was believed in the House and in the Senate that this had a priority, this type of work done by the miners.

Then, as you know, and others who are gathered here—and I express appreciation to all of them—we had the amendments of 1972, where we had relied on the X-ray, practically without any other proof, and we brought in pulmonary and respiratory ailments as possible proof of black lung. And then in 1977, we continued with legislation that, I think, is the finalization of this effort.

And as you and all who are here know, we have moved from the Federal payments of the Government, now, to the tonnages which will be produced by the miners—50 cents a ton on deep mining, 25 cents a ton on surface mining. And so, I'm sure Arnold Miller will recognize the need for productivity of coal, because this is the manner in which the money will come in with which the black lung payments will be made.

This final thought: We believe there are approximately 170,000 to 190,000 pending and denied cases that will be reviewed and, hopefully, acted on as quickly as possible.

I think this is a good day for America, Mr. President. It's a day not just of compassion, but it's a day of the realization of the responsibility of people to help those who deserve help. And I take this moment—and I'll be forgiven—I want to say that Anice Floyd stands here at the left, never missing a day in working on these matters. And I want to thank her, because she represents, really, thousands and thousands of people.

I never am a partisan in the sense of being, you know, a partisan that goes too far. [Laughter] But I want to say in the final days of the enactment of this legislation—Bob, and you know it—on the Hill, Senator Javits deserves very, very much credit. He helped us in a very difficult time, when in the conference it looked as if we might not make it.

And although we had some rather rough words—and I hope Carl Perkins somehow will know what I've said about him—that no one labored more diligently than Carl Perkins, certainly, who understands the problems of coal and coal mining, than did this Representative in the Congress.

Now, if I've spoken too long, it's only to express appreciation to all the Members of the Congress who worked since '69, including now, '78, on this vital legislation, and to express the belief that when you, Mr. President, with your close attention to these later bills, which really summarize what has been done—and these are very vital because of the changeover that takes place—that justice has been done, and these men, their survivors will live with more dignity and with comfort and, yes, with faith in America.

THE PRESIDENT. Congressman Perkins is not here, and I'm very sorry that he can't be, because he's devoted a major part of his effort to this legislation, as has been so generously recognized by Senator Randolph. But Frank Thompson is here. Frank, perhaps you'd like to say a word.

REPRESENTATIVE THOMPSON. Mr. President, I'd like to express my deep appreciation to you for your interest and the cooperation that we had from your administration on this, to my colleagues in the other body, to my House Members. It fell upon me to introduce the substitute at my distinguished friend and chairman's request, Carl Perkins.

And happily, the substitute carried healthily, as did the conference report. This is a great day of joy for me and for my distinguished New Jersey colleague, Senator Williams, chairman of the Senate committee. We don't have much coal mining in New Jersey, Mr. President, but we sure use a lot of it, and we need it.

Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, almost all of the Members of Congress here could make a very heartfelt statement about this legislation. The bills that have been passed in other years, 1969 and before, only set up temporary programs. And one thing that hasn't been mentioned is that this now makes these programs permanent.

There's no future threat, I don't believe, that the coal miners would be deprived of this fair and just right to expect compensation for their suffering.

I want to express again my thanks to all of you. It's always difficult to know whom to call on to speak and whom to ignore. But I think in my choice this morning, you've heard the eloquence and the deep feelings of both the House and Senate expressed.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:33 a.m. at the signing ceremony in the State Dining Room at the White House.

As enacted, H.R. 4544 is Public Law 95-239, approved March 1.

Department of State and International Communication Agency

Nomination of Alice Stone Ilchman To Be an Assistant Secretary of State and an Associate Director of the Agency. March 1, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Alice Stone Ilchman, of Wellesley, Mass., to be an Assistant Secretary of State. She would replace Joseph Duffey, and her area of responsibility would be educational and cultural affairs. The President also announced that he will nominate Ilchman to be an Associate Director of the International Communication Agency.

Ilchman was born April 18, 1935, in Cincinnati, Ohio. She received a B.A. from Mount Holyoke College in 1957, an M.P.A. from Maxwell School of Citizenship, Syracuse University, in 1958, and a Ph. D. from London School of Economics in 1965.

From 1961 to 1964, Ilchman was a faculty member at Berkshire Community College in Pittsfield, Mass. From 1966 to 1968 and in 1969–70, she was program director at the Center for South and Southeast Asia Studies at the University of California at Berkeley and a lecturer and political scientist at Berkeley. In 1968–69 she was director of Berkeley's Professional Studies Program in India.

From 1971 to 1973, Ilchman was a lecturer in the division of policy planning and administration of the School of Education at Berkeley. Since 1973 she has been dean of the college and professor of economics and education at Wellesley College.

Federal Civil Service Reform

Remarks Announcing the Administration's Proposals to the Congress. March 2, 1978

President Aukofer and distinguished guests and friends:

This is the third time I've visited here, and I was thinking on the way over about the first two occasions. The last time I was here I was Governor of Georgia, and I came up to make a preliminary announcement of my candidacy for President. I went back to Atlanta that night and made the actual announcement. I think the headline was, "National Press Club Invites Unknown Governor To Speak." [Laughter]

The first time I came I was also Governor of Georgia, and actually the news story was that I was trying to get an appointment with John Ehrlichman's assistant. And I might report I was unsuccessful in doing so. [Laughter]

Today, in order to leave as much time for questions as possible, I'd like to make a brief but a very important statement about one of the most important aspects of government. I came to Washington with a promise and the obligation to rebuild the faith of the American people in our government. We want a government that can be trusted, not feared; that will be efficient, not mired in its own redtape; a government that will respond to the needs of the American people, and not be preoccupied with needs of its own.

Taxpayers who work hard for their money want to see it spent wisely. We all want a government that's worthy of confidence and respect. That is what reorganization is all about.

We have no illusions that this task will be easy. Our Government and its bureaucracy have evolved over many generations, and the work of reform cannot be completed in a single year or a single administration of a President.

But we have begun. We have already adopted zero-based budgeting in all the agencies of Government. We've cut the burden of paperwork on the public and reduced excessive Government regulation, replacing it with free market competition. At OSHA and in other Federal agencies, we are discarding obsolete regulations and rewriting rules in plain and understandable English. We've cut significantly the number of employees in the Executive Office of the President and abolished hundreds of unneeded advisory committees.

But all that is not enough. The single most important step that we can take is a thoroughgoing reform of the civil service system. Civil service reform will be the centerpiece of Government reorganization during my term of office.

I've seen at first hand the frustration among those who work within the bureaucracy. No one is more concerned at the inability of Government to deliver on its promises than the worker who is trying to do a good job.

Most civil service employees perform with spirit and integrity. Nevertheless, there is still a widespread criticism of Federal Government performance. The public suspects that there are too many Government workers, that they are underworked, overpaid, and insulated from the consequences of incompetence.

Such sweeping criticisms are unfair to dedicated Federal workers who are conscientiously trying to do their best. But we have to recognize that the only way to restore public confidence in the vast majority who do work well is to deal effectively and firmly with those who do not.

The two complaints most often heard against the present system are that Federal employees have too little protection against political abuse and too much protection against legitimate assessment of performance and skills. These charges sound contradictory, but both of them happen to be true. And the system that perpetuates them needs to be changed.

For the past 7 months, a task force of more than 100 career civil servants has analyzed the civil service, explored its weaknesses and strengths, and suggested how it can be improved. Their judgments are reflected in the message that I will send to the Congress today. Some of the leading congressional reorganizers are here with me, and I would say in gratitude to them that there's been an unprecedented, close working relationship between the Congress, its staff members, and the White House, the Office of Management and Budget, and others.

Today, I'd like to outline these proposals and explain the reasoning behind them. They represent the most sweeping reform of the civil service system since it was created nearly 100 years ago.

The simple concept of a merit system has grown into a tangled web of complicated rules and regulations. Managers are weakened in their ability to reward the best and most talented people and to fire those few who are unwilling to work.

The sad fact is that it is easier to promote and to transfer incompetent employees than it is to get rid of them. It may take as long as 3 years merely to fire someone for a just cause, and at the same time the protection of legitimate rights is costly and time-consuming for the employee.

You cannot run a farm that way, you cannot run a factory that way, and you cannot run a government that way.

We've lost sight of the original purpose, which was to reward merit. More than 99 percent of all Federal employees get a so-called merit rating. And last year, out of about 2 million employees, only 226 people lost their jobs for incompetence or inefficiency. That's about one one-hundredth of 1 percent.

So, my first proposition is this: There is not enough merit in the merit system. There is inadequate motivation because we have too few rewards for excellence and too few penalties for unsatisfactory work.

We must encourage better performance in ways that are used widely and effectively already throughout private industry in our country.

Top Federal employees are ready and willing to respond to the risks and rewards of competitive life, and public service will be healthier when they have that chance.

We must strike a new balance that preserves the merit principle while giving managers the incentive and the authority in hiring and to manage.

We propose to do this first by creating a Senior Executive Service, whose 9,200 members will be available to serve wherever in Government they are most needed. Participation in this effort will be voluntary. They will be eligible for annual bonuses for superior performance and can be moved from the Senior Executive Service back to their previous civil service status for poor performance.

I'll also ask the Congress to authorize the use of incentive pay for the 72,000 Federal managers and supervisors in grades GS-13 through GS-15, which is a far more attractive and sensible acknowledgement of merit than the silver water carafes and the thicker carpets that pass for recognition today. They will no longer receive automatic step increases in pay without regard for performance.

Another proposal which will improve managerial excellence is a speedier and a fairer disciplinary system which will create a climate in which managers may discharge nonperforming employees, using due process, of course, with reasonable assurance that their judgment, if valid, will prevail. At the same time, employees will receive a more rapid hearing for their own grievances.

The procedures that exist to protect employee rights are absolutely essential. But employee appeals must now go through the Civil Service Commission, which has a built-in conflict of interest by serving simultaneously as rulemaker, prosecutor, judge, and employee advocate.

So, my second proposition is: Employees still have too little protection for their rights. I propose to divide the present Civil Service Commission into two bodies—an Office of Personnel Management to improve the productivity and performance of Federal workers, and a Merit Protection Board to stand watch against merit abuses and to resolve the appeals which are brought by employees.

I will also propose an Office of Special Counsel to investigate merit violations and to protect the so-called whistleblowers who expose gross management errors and abuses.

And finally, I propose the creation of a Federal Labor Relations Authority to remedy unfair labor practices within the Government, much as the National Labor Relations Board does now in private industry. In addition, we will continue to work with Congress and the Federal employees to develop legislation which, while recognizing the special requirements of the Federal Government, will improve Federal labor practices.

One other serious defect remains; that's the network of rules governing hiring, staffing, and tenure. We should give each agency more control over its own hiring rather than the Civil Service Commission, which now takes as long as 6 or 8 months merely to fill important positions.

Current rules which often impede the hiring of qualified women, minorities, and the handicapped, by giving veterans a lifetime advantage under civil service laws, must be changed. (They provide an advantage)<sup>1</sup> far beyond the benefits that are provided under other veterans programs, which are designed legitimately to ease the readjustment from military back to civilian life.

Therefore, we propose to reduce the preferential advantage given to nondisabled veterans to a 10-year period and to end this preference altogether for senior military officers who retire with pension benefits after a full military career. At the same time, we will strengthen provisions to ensure that disabled veterans and those who served during and since Vietnam are fully protected under the civil service laws.

Let me be straightforward about the implications of all this. Our proposals will mean less job security only for incompetent Federal employees, but conscientious civil servants will benefit from a change that recognizes and rewards good performance.

Our proposals deal with the major changes that must now be made. By enacting them, we will make employment in the civil service more challenging, more profitable, more productive, and a more gratifying career. But the greatest beneficiaries will be the American people, who can expect to see a more competent and efficient and responsive government—one that is worthy of the people it was created to serve.

Thank you very much.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF MARCH 2, 1978

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMY

FRANK AUKOFE. Oddly enough, we have questions that don't relate to what your speech was about, Mr. President.

The first question, which has been in the news much lately is—this comes from James Cary of the Copley News Service—what are you going to do about the deteriorating dollar and the basic cause of its collapse, soaring foreign oil imports? And a related question, by Joseph Slevin of the Slevin Economic Report, saying that European financial officials say the U.S. should defend the dollar more vigorously.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, Frank. I spent a lot of time studying about the American dollar, its value in international monetary markets, the causes for the recent deterioration as it relates to other major currencies. I can say with complete assurance that the basic principles of monetary values are not being adequately assessed on the current international monetary markets. There are three that I would like to mention specifically.

First of all, the attractiveness of investment in our own country compared to other nations is rapidly increasing. One of the reasons is the higher interest rates that can be paid on investments in our country.

Another one is the rapidly increasing consumption of oil that occurred during 1977. This caused us a great deal of concern. In 1978, we will not have that circumstance. Present trends and future projections show that at the worst we'll have a leveling off of imports of foreign oil, one of the major causes of legitimate deterioration in the quality of the dollar.

And the other point is the degree with which American economic recovery or growth compares to potential purchases of our own goods. In this last year, our own rate of growth was about 3 percent greater than the average of our major trading partners. That difference will be substantially less in 1978. We will still have adequate growth, but our major trading partners will have better growth than they had last year.

So, these three basic causes in 1977 for some lowering in the dollar's value will be much better in 1978. We do move aggressively and adequately to prevent disorderly market circumstances when that need is obvious to us. We'll continue to do that. But my own belief is that these basic principles that assess the legitimate value of the dollar have not been adequately observed recently. My guess is that in the future over a longer period of time, what I've just told you will be observed, and the dollar will remain in good shape.

THE COAL STRIKE; ADMINISTRATION'S PERFORMANCE

Q. We have a number of questions on coal. This one from Richard Strout of the Christian Science Monitor. Do you feel that the administration waited too long before intervening in the coal strike?

THE PRESIDENT. No. [Laughter]

Q. On another subject—[laughter—recent public opinion polls—this from Judy Woodruff of NBC—show a continuing decline in the rating people give you for your job performance as President. How concerned are you that your administration is perhaps developing a reputation for fumbling and ineptitude because of incidents like the Marston firing or for a failure to exert leadership because of the stalemate on the energy bill?

THE PRESIDENT. I might say that we have had to deal, and have decided to deal, with some longstanding, very difficult, controversial issues that in some instances had not been adequately addressed by my predecessors. I say that without criticism.

But obviously we needed a comprehensive energy policy years ago. No one has ever proposed it to the Congress from the White House until last April 20. This needs to be acted upon immediately by the Congress. The House completed its action last August. We still have not been able to break a deadlock in the Senate energy committees. Hard work is going on on that right now. It's one of the contributing causes to the lowered value of the dollar overseas. I think if we can get a resolution of the natural gas issue alone in the conference committees, immediately there would be a restoration of confidence in our Nation's will to act on a difficult question and our competence to deal with those complicated issues.

Obviously, we have addressed other measures that are difficult as well. We've had remarkable success, I think, in the last year in holding down the increase in inflation, in reducing substantially the unemployment rate, in having a carefully predicted increase in our gross national product. We've got a good record on budget preparation, cooperation with the House and the Senate, and we have learned in this last year.

There is some criticism that we acted too late in the coal strike and too early by others. My own deep commitment is that whenever the collective bargaining system can function, government ought to let it function. And I think, had we precipitously imposed our will in the coal strike deliberations, that effort would have been counterproductive. I don't know what the miners will do this weekend. I hope they'll vote affirmatively on the negotiated settlement. But I think it was not an exhibition of irresoluteness on our part. It was a carefully balanced judgment about what we should do.

We have addressed some questions on the Middle East that in the past had too long been ignored, trying to bring about a comprehensive settlement there. This is a very difficult, complicated issue over which we don't have control. We have encouraged direct negotiations with Israel and the major Arab countries. We've been successful in seeing that occur because of the action by foreign leaders, between Begin and Sadat, something that was hoped for for generations, or at least for decades. We've seen a recognition of Israel's right to exist by Egypt, and progress has been made; obviously, not yet have we been successful.

So, I think that the polls show that my own personal popularity is very high. The assessment of how successful our administration has been is disappointing, but it's a partnership between us and Congress, between us and the nations in the Middle East, between us and the coal miners and the coal operators. And government doesn't have the unilateral, autocratic control over some of these very difficult issues.

So, I'm concerned that there has not been a resolution of all of these major confrontations and disputes. But we're making good progress, and I'm not disappointed at the progress that we have made. I'm certainly not disappointed at our willingness to tackle issues that have historically been difficult to resolve.

NEW YORK CITY

Q. You mentioned your predecessors; this question relates to one of them. It's from Paul Healy of the New York News.

Mr. President, 2 years ago President Ford said from this podium that there would be no emergency Federal financial aid to New York City, prompting the famous Daily News headline, "Ford to City: 'Drop Dead.'" Yet President Ford later supported a loan program to the city that seems more generous than the one outlined on Capitol Hill today by Secretary Blumenthal. What is your response to this?

THE PRESIDENT. In the first place, as you know, the Congress moved well to prevent bankruptcy of the New York City government. We've had very close personal consultations with the mayor and other city officials, the banks, the unions, the Governor, and the congressional delegation here in Washington.

Yesterday afternoon I talked to the mayor, Mayor Koch, to the Governor, Governor Carey, and to Senator Moynihan, yesterday and this morning to Secretary of Treasury Mike Blumenthal. I think the proposal that has been put forward is basically adequate. It's obviously not everything that the New York City officials would want.

We believe in sharing the responsibility between the Federal Government—with the guaranteed loans—and those other entities that I described, local lending institutions, the unions' trust fund, the city government, and the State government.

This does provide a long-range guarantee of loans. It's not month by month or even year by year. Secretary Blumenthal recommended a 15-year period during which we would guarantee up to $2 billion in loans. I think it's a very reasonable and also very adequate proposal, and it's one that we are not presenting to the Congress idly. We intend to fight for it. And I know that there's a great deal of concern in the Congress that this might be a proposal that's too generous. I think it's adequate, not overly generous, and one that's worthy of our support. And it will get our support.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Later this month you'll be meeting with Prime Minister Menahem Begin from Israel. Dick Ryan of the Detroit News asks: What do you hope to achieve during your meetings with the Prime Minister?

THE PRESIDENT. This will be my third meeting with Prime Minister Begin since he's been the leader of Israel. In addition, I communicate with him fairly frequently by personal letter, by diplomatic message, and on occasion by telephone. And both our own Secretary of State and other officials and his secretary of state and other officials come here frequently. Defense Minister Weizman will be here shortly to consult with me and with the Secretary of Defense, Secretary of State, and others.

We are looking for some common ground on which the Egyptians, the Israelis, the Jordanians, the residents of the West Bank and other areas can agree.

This is a difficult and sensitive question. As you know, the Gaza Strip has had an affiliation in the past with Egypt, the West Bank with Jordan, both now occupied by Israel. And we hope to search out at the top level of government some resolution of the differences on specifics relating to the Sinai and also on a statement of principles relating to the occupied territories of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, hoping at that time that Egypt and the Jordanians and the Palestinian Arabs who live in the West Bank, Gaza Strip would be satisfied to conclude perhaps some agreements and to proceed with further negotiations leading to an ultimate resolution of the issue, based on United Nations Resolution 242.

One of the crucial elements of any progress in the Middle East is a cleaving to the commitment that U.N. 242 is a basis for continued negotiations and a solution. The abandonment of that would put us back many months or years. So, this is what I hope to accomplish with Prime Minister Begin, to frankly discuss with him my previous agreements and discussions with President Sadat, to encourage direct negotiations to be resumed, and to search out common ground, based on advice given to me by Secretary of State Vance and also by Mr. Atherton, on the latest possible language changes that might be necessary to let Egypt and Israel agree. So, this is what I hope to accomplish, and I believe the personal discussions will be good.

I would much prefer that the personal discussions be carried on between Sadat and Begin. But in the absence of that possibility at this moment, we hope to restore it and act as an intermediary.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM

Q. There are several questions here related to the civil service reorganization. This is a combined question from Mary McGrory of the Washington Star and Mark Goodin of the Houston Post.

The first part is, what sort of protection will the Office of Special Counsel provide for whistleblowers? And the other part is that Frank Snepp, the ex-CIA agent, is the most famous whistleblower of all, writing a book exposing incompetence and treachery. After a report to the Inspector General produced no results, you're prosecuting him. How does this encourage whistleblowing?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I'd like to respond to those completely unbiased questions. [Laughter] I don't look on Frank Snepp as one of the greatest whistleblowers of all times. He signed voluntarily a contract, later confirmed this agreement with the Director of the CIA, that before his book was published that it would be examined to assure there were no revelations of secret material. And I have not read the book; don't know the substance of it. I don't believe that he has revealed anything that would lead to an improvement in our security apparatus or the protection of Americans' civil rights.

But the Attorney General has decided that when a contract is signed that it ought to be honored. If everyone who came into the CIA or other highly secret organizations in Government felt free to resign because of a dispute or to retire at the end of satisfactory service and then write a book revealing our Nation's utmost secrets, it would be very devastating to our Nation's ability to protect ourselves in peace or war and to negotiate on a confidential and successful basis with other government leaders.

So, I believe that this is important as a distinction to be drawn. The Special Counsel will be there, independent from me, to protect through the courts, if necessary, those who are legitimate whistleblowers and who do point out violations of ethics, or those who through serious error hurt our country. And this is a function that's not presently extant. I think it will be a step in the right direction, and there will be presentation after investigation to both the public and, if necessary, to the mechanism by which employees' rights are protected and, on an appeal basis, to the courts themselves.

SOVIET INVOLVEMENT IN THE HORN OF AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, this is from Warren Rogers of the Trib of New York. With the Soviets active now in the Horn of Africa, and with other strains in U.S.-Soviet relations, what hope do you have for early resumption of SALT talks?

THE PRESIDENT. The SALT talks have never been discontinued or delayed. They are ongoing now, and the Soviet involvement in the Horn has not interrupted that process. We do not initiate any Government policy that has a linkage between the Soviet involvement in Ethiopia-Somalia dispute on the one hand and SALT or the comprehensive test ban negotiations on the other.

Obviously any negotiation, if concluded successfully at the executive level, would have to be ratified by the Congress, who would be heavily influenced by opinion of the American people. And the fact that the Soviets have over-armed to the teeth, the Somalians who then use Soviet weapons to invade Ethiopia and now are over-arming Ethiopia and directing their military effort has caused a threat to peace in the Horn area of Africa.

We have added our own importunities for a peaceful resolution and our own caution comments to the Soviets. They have assured me directly through Foreign Minister Gromyko that the Ethiopians would not cross the Somalia border. We have sent a delegation to meet with President Mengistu, who assured me personally that they would not cross the Somalia border.

We have three hopes there that we trust and certainly hope that the Soviets will honor.

One is a Somalian withdrawal from the territories which they occupy in eastern Ethiopia, in the Ogaden area; secondly, a removal from Ethiopia of Cuban and Soviet troops; third, a lessening of the tensions that exist between those countries and an honoring of the sometimes arbitrarily drawn international boundaries in Africa.

And we would hope that the OAU, the Organization of African Unity, would become more successful in their efforts to resolve this dispute in a peaceful way. But at this time, Somalia is the invading nation. We have refused to send any weapons into that area or permit third countries who bought weapons from us to transfer them into that area, and I think our policy is completely accurate.

The Soviets' violating of these principles would be a cause of concern to me, would lessen the confidence of the American people in the word and peaceful intentions of the Soviet Union, would make it more difficult to ratify a SALT agreement or comprehensive test ban agreement if concluded, and therefore, the two are linked because of actions by the Soviets. We don't initiate the linkage.

U.S.-BRITISH AIR SERVICES AGREEMENT

Q. Mr. President, we have several questions related to the Braniff Airways low-cost service between Dallas and London, one from Ross Mark of the Daily Express of London, and another from Roy Bode of the Dallas Times-Herald.

First of all, have you received a recommendation from the CAB for retaliatory action, and do you plan to take such action against the British carrier? And secondly, do you believe that the British Government is abiding by its commitments in the Bermuda II airline agreements?

THE PRESIDENT. I have not received a recommendation from the CAB at this moment. When the recommendation gets to me, I, by law, will have to act and will act immediately.

I don't know enough about the issue, the details of the British Government ruling, to know whether or not they have violated the agreement that was concluded this past year. My guess is, knowing the British, that they have not violated the agreement specifically. But, as you know, an agreement can't be that detailed to anticipate every individual ruling that will be concluded by the CAB on our side or its equivalent agency on the British side. I don't know much about the issue yet.

But if there is a violation, we would express our concern directly to Prime Minister Callaghan. And when the CAB gives me a report and a recommendation, the chances are that I would honor it.

We have had notable success in 1977 in increasing competition, particularly in international routes of air carriers. We have encouraged the additional competition of American airlines in this area, as well. We hope to get the Congress to act on substantial deregulation in the airline industry within our country. I believe that we've made notable success already, and we have withstood a tremendous pressure from the British to have more Government protection, which would be contrary to competition in the agreement that we reached last year.

SOCIAL SECURITY FUNDS

Q. At the risk of showing favoritism, I'll ask a question from Jack Cole of the Milwaukee Journal. Would you support legislation to reduce social security payroll taxes by transferring the hospital care and disability portions of the program to funding by general Treasury funds?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think that 1978 is the time to further modify in any substantial way the social security law which was just passed this past year. Our own recommendation to Congress in 1977 did involve some transfer of funds and some use of general funds from the Treasury if the unemployment rate and/or the inflation rate caused excessive drains on the reserve funds. I think the Congress was very courageous and acted properly in increasing social security payments into the funds to maintain the integrity of the system itself.

Had they not acted, we would be in a crisis stage right now. We are convinced that the recommendations that I have made to the Congress to lower income taxes will compensate in almost every instance for the increase in social security tax payments that were passed by a previous administration, and also increased this past year.

So, I don't think 1978 is the proper time to change it. I think that the principles of partial use of general funds under certain circumstances is a sound one that we did advocate, and transfer of moneys from one fund to another is a principle which we would also espouse when the time comes, if it does, for additional changes in the social security law. That's what we recommended last year.

HAMILTON JORDAN

Q. Mr. President, we thank you very much for appearing here today, and I have one final question for you for which I'll take full responsibility.

In view of the 33-page, so-called Jordan report, is there any truth to the rumor that you're planning a White House conference on etiquette in singles bars? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. This is a matter that had not previously come to my attention until just before this press conference. [Laughter] I've known Hamilton Jordan a long time, and I have discounted the story because they said he was drinking amaretto and cream. [Laughter] The White House conference is certainly worthy of consideration. My own personal advice would be that perhaps in the future Hamilton might substitute peaches for the amaretto. [Laughter]

Federal Civil Service Reform

Message to the Congress. March 2, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting to the Congress today a comprehensive program to reform the Federal Civil Service system. My proposals are intended to increase the government's efficiency by placing new emphasis on the quality of performance of Federal workers. At the same time, my recommendations will ensure that employees and the public are protected against political abuse of the system.

Nearly a century has passed since enactment of the first Civil Service Act—the Pendleton Act of 1883. That Act established the United States Civil Service Commission and the merit system it administers. These institutions have served our Nation well in fostering development of a Federal workforce which is basically honest, competent, and dedicated to constitutional ideals and the public interest.

But the system has serious defects. It has become a bureaucratic maze which neglects merit, tolerates poor performance, permits abuse of legitimate employee rights, and mires every personnel action in red tape, delay and confusion.

Civil Service reform will be the centerpiece of government reorganization during my term in office.

I have seen at first hand the frustration among those who work within the bureaucracy. No one is more concerned at the inability of government to deliver on its promises than the worker who is trying to do a good job.

Most Civil Service employees perform with spirit and integrity. Nevertheless, there is still widespread criticism of Federal government performance. The public suspects that there are too many government workers, that they are underworked, overpaid, and insulated from the consequences of incompetence.

Such sweeping criticisms are unfair to dedicated Federal workers who are conscientiously trying to do their best, but we have to recognize that the only way to restore public confidence in the vast majority who work well is to deal effectively and firmly with the few who do not.

For the past 7 months, a task force of more than 100 career civil servants has analyzed the Civil Service, explored its weaknesses and strengths and suggested how it can be improved.

The objectives of the Civil Service reform proposals I am transmitting today are:

- To strengthen the protection of legitimate employee rights;
- To provide incentives and opportunities for managers to improve the efficiency and responsiveness of the Federal Government;
- To reduce the red tape and costly delay in the present personnel system;
- To promote equal employment opportunity;
- To improve labor-management relations.

My specific proposals are these:

1. Replacing the Civil Service Commission with an Office of Personnel Management and a Merit Protection Board

Originally established to conduct Civil Service examinations, the Civil Service Commission has, over the years, assumed additional and inherently conflicting responsibilities. It serves simultaneously both as the protector of employee rights and as the promoter of efficient personnel management policy. It is a manager, rule-maker, prosecutor and judge. Consequently, none of these jobs are being done as effectively as they should be.

Acting under my existing reorganization authority, I propose to correct the inherent conflict of interest within the Civil Service Commission by abolishing the Commission and replacing it with a Merit Protection Board and Office of Personnel Management.

The Office of Personnel Management will be the center for personnel administration (including examination, training, and administration of pay and benefits); it will not have any prosecutorial or adjudicative powers against individuals. Its Director will be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The Director will be the government's management spokesman on Federal employee labor relations and will coordinate Federal personnel matters, except for Presidential appointments.

The Merit Protection Board will be the adjudicatory arm of the new personnel system. It will be headed by a bipartisan board of three members, appointed for 7 years, serving non-renewable overlapping terms, and removable only for cause. This structure will guarantee independent and impartial protection to employees. I also propose to create a Special Counsel to the Board, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, who will investigate and prosecute political abuses and merit system violations. This will help safeguard the rights of Federal employees who "blow the whistle" on violations of laws or regulations by other employees, including their supervisors.

In addition, these proposals will write into law for the first time the fundamental principles of the merit system and enumerate prohibited personnel practices.

2. A Senior Executive Service

A critical factor in determining whether Federal programs succeed or fail is the ability of the senior managers who run them. Throughout the Executive Branch, these 9200 top administrators carry responsibilities that are often more challenging than comparable work in private industry. But under the Civil Service system, they lack the incentives for first-rate performance that managers in private industry have. The Civil Service system treats top managers just like the 2.1 million employees whose activities they direct. They are equally insulated from the risks of poor performance, and equally deprived of tangible rewards for excellence.

To help solve these problems I am proposing legislation to create a Senior Executive Service affecting managers in grades GS-16 through non-Presidentially appointed Executive Level IV or its equivalent. It would allow:

- Transfer of executives among senior positions on the basis of government need;
- Authority for agency heads to adjust salaries within a range set by law with the result that top managers would no longer receive automatic pay increases based on longevity;
- Annual performance reviews, with inadequate performance resulting in removal from the Senior Executive Service (back to GS-15) without any right of appeal to the Merit Protection Board.

Agency heads would be authorized to distribute bonuses for superior performance to not more than 50 per cent of the senior executives each year. These would be allocated according to criteria prescribed by the Office of Personnel Management, and should average less than five per cent of base salary per year. They would not constitute an increase in salary but rather a one-time payment. The Office of Personnel Management also would be empowered to award an additional stipend directly to a select group of senior executives, approximately five per cent of the total of the Senior Executive Service, who have especially distinguished themselves in their work. The total of base salary, bonus, and honorary stipend should in no case exceed 95 per cent of the salary level for an Executive Level II position.

No one now serving in the "supergrade" managerial positions would be required to join the Senior Executive Service. But all would have the opportunity to join. And the current percentage of non-career supergrade managers—approximately 10 per cent—would be written into law for the first time, so that the Office of Personnel Management would not retain the existing authority of the Civil Service Commission to expand the proportion of political appointees.

This new Senior Executive Service will provide a highly qualified corps of top managers with strong incentives and opportunities to improve the management of the Federal government.

3. Incentive Pay for Lower Level Federal Managers and Supervisors

The current Federal pay system provides virtually automatic "step" pay increases as well as further increases to keep Federal salaries comparable to those in private business. This may be appropriate for most Federal employees, but performance—not merely endurance—should determine the compensation of Federal managers and supervisors. I am proposing legislation to let the Office of Personnel Management establish an incentive pay system for government managers, starting with those in grades GS-13 through GS-15. Approximately 72,000 managers and supervisors would be affected by such a system which could later be extended by Congress to other managers and supervisors.

These managers and supervisors would no longer receive automatic "step" increases in pay and would receive only 50 per cent of their annual comparability pay increase. They would, however, be eligible for "performance" pay increases of up to 12 per cent of their existing salary. Such a change would not increase payroll costs, and it should be insulated against improprieties through the use of strong audit and performance reviews by the Office of Personnel Management.

4. A Fairer and Speedier Disciplinary System

The simple concept of a "merit system" has grown into a tangled web of complicated rules and regulations.

Managers are weakened in their ability to reward the best and most talented people—and to fire those few who are unwilling to work.

The sad fact is that it is easier to promote and transfer incompetent employees than to get rid of them.

It may take as long as three years merely to fire someone for just cause, and at the same time the protection of legitimate rights is a costly and time-consuming process for the employee.

A speedier and fairer disciplinary system will create a climate in which managers may discharge non-performing employees—using due process—with reasonable assurance that their judgment, if valid, will prevail.

At the same time, employees will receive a more rapid hearing for their grievances.

The procedures that exist to protect employee rights are absolutely essential.

But employee appeals must now go through the Civil Service Commission, which has a built-in conflict of interest by serving simultaneously as rule-maker, prosecutor, judge, and employee advocate.

The legislation I am proposing today would give all competitive employees a statutory right of appeal. It would spell out fair and sensible standards for the Merit Protection Board to apply in hearing appeals. Employees would be provided with attorneys' fees if they prevail and the agency's action were found to have been wholly without basis. Both employees and managers would have, for the first time, subpoena power to ensure witness participation and document submission. The subpoena power would expedite the appeals process, as would new provisions for prehearing discovery. One of the three existing appeal levels would be eliminated.

These changes would provide both employees and managers with speedier and fairer judgments on the appeal of disciplinary actions.

5. Improved Labor-Management Relations

In 1962, President John F. Kennedy issued Executive Order 10988, establishing a labor-management relations program in the Executive Branch. The Executive Order has demonstrated its value through five Administrations. However, I believe that the time has come to increase its effectiveness by abolishing the Federal Labor Relations Council created by Executive Order 10988 and transferring its functions, along with related functions of the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor Relations, to a newly established Federal Labor Relations Authority. The Authority will be composed of three full-time members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I have also directed members of my Administration to develop, as part of Civil Service reform, a Labor-Management Relations legislative proposal by working with the appropriate Congressional Committees, Federal employees and their representatives. The goal of this legislation will be to make Executive Branch labor relations more comparable to those of private business, while recognizing the special requirements of the Federal government and the paramount public interest in the effective conduct of the public's business. This will facilitate Civil Service reform of the managerial and supervisory elements of the Executive Branch, free of union involvement, and, at the same time, improve the collective bargaining process as an integral part of the personnel system for Federal workers.

It will permit the establishment through collective bargaining of grievance and arbitration systems, the cost of which will be borne largely by the parties to the dispute. Such procedures will largely displace the multiple appeals systems which now exist and which are unanimously perceived as too costly, too cumbersome and ineffective.

6. Decentralized Personnel Decisionmaking

Examining candidates for jobs in the career service is now done almost exclusively by the Civil Service Commission, which now may take as long as six or eight months to fill important agency positions.

In addition, many routine personnel management actions must be submitted to the Civil Service Commission for prior approval. Much red tape and delay are generated by these requirements; the public benefits little, if at all. My legislative proposals would authorize the Office of Personnel Management to delegate personnel authority to departments and agencies.

The risk of abuse would be minimized by performance agreements between agencies and the Office of Personnel Management, by requirements for reporting, and by follow-up evaluations.

7. Changes in the Veterans Preference Law

Granting preference in Federal employment to veterans of military service has long been an important and worthwhile national policy. It will remain our policy because of the debt we owe those who have served our nation. It is especially essential for disabled veterans, and there should be no change in current law which would adversely affect them. But the Veterans Preference Act of 1944 also conferred a lifetime benefit upon the non-disabled veteran, far beyond anything provided by other veterans readjustment laws like the GI Bill, the benefits of which are limited to 10 years following discharge from the service. Current law also severely limits agency ability to consider qualified applicants by forbidding consideration of all except the three highest-scoring applicants—the so-called “rule of three.” As a result of the 5-point lifetime preference and the “rule of three”, women, minorities and other qualified non-veteran candidates often face insuperable obstacles in their quest for Federal jobs.

Similarly, where a manager believes a program would benefit from fewer employees, the veterans preference provides an absolute lifetime benefit to veterans. In any Reduction in Force, all veterans may “bump” all non-veterans, even those with far greater seniority. Thus women and minorities who have recently acquired middle management positions are more likely to lose their jobs in any cutback.

Therefore I propose:

- Limiting the 5-point veterans preference to the 10 year period following their discharge from the service, beginning 2 years after legislation is enacted;
- Expanding the number of applicants who may be considered by a hiring agency from three to seven, unless the Office of Personnel Management should determine that another number or category ranking is more appropriate;
- Eliminating the veterans preference for retired military officers of field grade rank or above and limiting its availability for other military personnel who have retired after at least 20 years in service to 3 years following their retirement;
- Restricting the absolute preference now accorded veterans in Reductions in Force to their first 3 years of Federal employment, after which time they would be granted 5 extra years of seniority for purposes of determining their rights when Reduction in Force occurs.

These changes would focus the veterans preference more sharply to help disabled veterans and veterans of the Viet Nam conflict. I have already proposed a 2-year extension of the Veterans Readjustment Appointment Authority to give these veterans easier entry into the Federal workforce; I support amendments to waive the educational limitation for disabled veterans and to expand Federal job openings for certain veterans in grades GS-5 to GS-7 under this authority. I propose that veterans with 50% or higher disability be eligible for non-competitive appointments.

These changes are intended to let the Federal Government meet the needs of the American people more effectively. At the same time, they would make the Federal work place a better environment for Federal employees. I ask the Congress to act promptly on Civil Service Reform and the Reorganization Plan which I will shortly submit.

Meeting With Kenyan Delegation

White House Statement. March 2, 1978

President Carter and a group of his senior advisers had discussions this morning with the Kenyan delegation headed by Vice President Daniel arap Moi. They discussed the situation in the Horn of Africa and Kenyan-U.S. relations. President Carter reaffirmed the U.S. Government's longstanding policy of close support for Kenya and assured the Kenyans that the United States will continue to supply Kenya with economic and military assistance. Both countries share a deep concern for the conflicts which have developed in the Horn of Africa. Measures which could be taken to bring the conflict to an end were discussed, and it was found that Kenyan and American perceptions of the fundamental problems of the area are very similar.

United Nations

*Letter to the Speaker of the House and the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Transmitting a Report.
March 2, 1978*

Dear Mr. Speaker: (Dear Mr. Chairman:)

In accordance with Section 503 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1978, I am pleased to submit to the Congress a report on recommendations for reform of the United Nations. Also enclosed is a detailed analysis of various reform proposals provided to me by the Secretary of State.

I assumed the Presidency with a commitment to strengthen this essential instrument of world peace and U.S. diplomacy. I now reaffirm that the United States will make the fullest possible use of the United Nations to assist in solving the many political, economic, legal, and humanitarian problems that press upon the international community.

At the same time, I am aware of the need to maintain constant attention to reform of the UN. This report contains a number of positive proposals for reform that this Administration intends to pursue.

I welcome this opportunity to communicate with you on these issues, and I appreciate the Congress permitting a one-month delay in submission of this report. I value highly the work of the Congress in support of U.S. participation in the United Nations, and look forward to a continuation of that cooperative endeavor.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

NOTE: This is the text of identical letters addressed to Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives, and John J. Sparkman, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

On the same day, the White House issued the following statement on the report:

The President today sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a report entitled "Reform and Restructuring of the United Nations System." In the report, the President called the United Nations an "essential instrument of world peace and U.S. diplomacy" but proposed a number of concrete steps for the U.S. Government to pursue in order to make the U.N. system more effective in the future.

Although the President sends annual reports to Congress on U.S. activities in the United Nations, this is the first report concerning reform of the U.N. organization itself and, accordingly, contains the administration's recommendations for realistically strengthening the U.N. organization in a number of areas. The report generally indicates the administration's commitment to giving a higher priority to resolving issues within the U.N. framework and its belief that reforms in a number of areas are urgently needed. A basic premise of the report is that under present circumstances, reform by amending the U.N. Charter is improbable, and it is, therefore, more productive to seek institutional and administrative reforms within the present charter framework.

The President's report (accompanied by a longer analysis by the Secretary of State) is organized around seven areas of concern to the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on Strengthening the Role of the Organization. These are:

1. Peace, security, and strengthening international law;
2. Decisionmaking processes in the United Nations;
3. Human rights;
4. Financing the United Nations;
5. Achieving greater efficiency in the United Nations system;
6. Improving United States participation in the work of the organizations and programs of the United Nations system;
7. The Secretariat of the United Nations system.

Among the major recommendations in the President's report are the following:

—to press for strengthening of human rights procedures in the U.N.

—to assist, upon request from the Secretary General, with airlift of troops and equipment required for establishing a U.N. Peacekeeping Force authorized by the Security Council.

—to offer factual information from aircraft reconnaissance technology to the Security Council, when the parties to a dispute agree and under Security Council authorization.

—to explore the possibility of establishing a Special Peacekeeping Fund on the order of $100 million to help cover initial costs of operations authorized by the Security Council.

—to work for better coordination of the U.N. Technical Assistance activities by making the U.N. Development Program (UNDP) the major channel for U.S. voluntary contributions and helping to strengthen the UNDP's programming and coordinating role.

—to hold periodic meetings of the Security Council at the Foreign Minister level as part of a general effort to strengthen the role of the Security Council in the peaceful settlement of disputes.

—to foster greater use of the International Court of Justice by a variety of means, including reevaluating existing disputes to see whether they are appropriate to submit to the Court.

—to give substantially greater weight in our national policy to decisions arrived at by consensus in United Nations bodies.

—to support recent General Assembly plans to restructure and reform the economic and social functions of the U.N.

—to explore new ways of meeting the U.N. financial deficit and explore the possibility of supplementing U.N. finances from sources other than contributions of member governments.

On the subject of weighted voting, the President's report states, "There is no prospect for the adoption of a generally applicable weighted-voting system in the General Assembly." The report suggests that instead of trying to work for weighted voting, "it would be better to employ our efforts toward defining voluntary, but common standards to curtail the use of the veto in the Security Council and reduce the necessity of invoking it."

The report notes that, "If we are to develop adequate machinery for management of the world's common problems, a central concern of our foreign policy in the remaining years of this century must be the building of a more effective U.N. system. To this end, this administration is committed to working for a stronger and more effective United Nations."

In the context of consultations with Congress, the United States will proceed to discuss these proposals with other members of the United Nations and with Secretary General Waldheim and to seek their support.

The presentation of this report was pursuant to Section 503 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1978 (Public Law 95-105).

Small Business Administration

Nomination of Milton D. Stewart To Be Chief Counsel for Advocacy. March 2, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Milton D. Stewart, of Staten Island, N.Y., to be the Chief Counsel for Advocacy at the Small Business Administration.

Stewart was born March 5, 1922, in New York City. He holds an A.B. from New York University, an M.S. from Columbia University, and a J.D. from George Washington University.

In 1946 Stewart was a staff economist for the U.S. Senate Small Business Committee, and in 1946 and 1947, he was Director of Research for the President's Committee on Civil Rights. In 1947 and 1948, he was a research associate and lecturer at Columbia University and associate professor at the New School for Social Research.

In 1948 and 1949, Stewart was an administrative assistant for the U.S. House of Representatives. He was with the U.S. Bureau of the Budget from 1950 to 1952, and in 1950 he was detailed to serve as Executive Assistant Administrator of the Small Defense Plants Administration. From 1953 to 1955, he was an assistant to partner with Brown Brothers, Harriman & Co.

Stewart served as special counsel to the Governor of New York from 1955 to 1958, and as chief of the legal department for the New York State Thruway Authority from 1959 to 1961. From 1961 to 1974, he was founding director and vice chairman, then president of a major venture capital small business investment company.

Stewart is currently an attorney and president of the National Small Business Association. He is also chairman of the Research Council for Small Business and the Professions, and chairman of the board of Terra California.

United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency

Letter to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. March 2, 1978

Dear Mr. Speaker: (Dear Mr. President:)

I transmit herewith for consideration of the Congress proposed legislation to extend the appropriation authorization for the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, together with a letter from the Acting Director of the Agency in support of this legislation.

Stopping the arms race, both the nuclear arms race and the spread of increasingly more advanced technology in non-nuclear arms, may well be the single most important task we must accomplish to ensure national security and the survival of mankind. The U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency plays a very important part in accomplishing this goal.

Through the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks, in which it has the leading role, the Agency is engaged in preventing a nuclear arms race with the Soviet Union. And at the Comprehensive Test Ban Talks, the Agency is working to control the spread of nuclear weapons through measures that will inhibit their further development. The Agency is also involved in researching techniques for preventing the unintended spread of nuclear weapon materials through the nuclear fuel cycle and in controlling the transfer of conventional weapons and advanced technology.

Additionally, the Agency engages in research which supports on-going arms control negotiations and explores possibilities for further progress and new initiatives in arms control.

Current authorization and appropriations for the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency expire September 30, 1978. I am transmitting the attached draft bill in order that the Congress may begin its consideration of future authorizing legislation for the Agency. I urge the early enactment of this legislation.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

United States Ambassador at Large

Nomination of Alfred L. Atherton, Jr.
March 3, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Alfred L. Atherton, Jr., of Palm Beach Gardens, Fla., to be Ambassador at Large.

Atherton was born November 22, 1921, in Pittsburgh, Pa. He received a B.S. in 1944 and an M.A. in 1947 from Harvard University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943 to 1945.

Atherton joined the Foreign Service in 1947 and served in Stuttgart, Bonn, Damascus, and Aleppo. From 1959 to 1961, he was at the State Department, serving as Iraq-Jordan desk officer, then officer in charge for Cyprus in the Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs. In 1961 and 1962, he took advanced economic studies at the University of California at Berkeley.

Atherton was economic officer in Calcutta from 1962 to 1965, and Deputy Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs in 1965 and 1966. In 1966 and 1967, he was country director for Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria, and from 1967 to 1970, he was country director for Israel and Arab-Israel Affairs.

From 1970 to 1974, Atherton was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs. Since 1974 he has been Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs.

Department of State

Nomination of Harold H. Saunders To Be an Assistant Secretary. March 3, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Harold H. Saunders, of Falls Church, Va., to be Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs. He would replace Alfred Atherton, who is being nominated to be Ambassador at Large.

Saunders was born December 27, 1930, in Philadelphia, Pa. He received an A.B. from Princeton University in 1952 and a Ph. D. from Yale University in 1956. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1956 to 1959.

From 1959 to 1961, Saunders was a lecturer at George Washington University and an analyst for the Central Intelligence Agency. From 1961 to 1974, he was a member of the National Security Council senior staff, and from 1963 to 1965, he lectured at George Washington University again.

In 1974 and 1975, Saunders was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs. Since 1975 he has been Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research at the State Department.

Permanent Joint Board on Defense—United States and Canada

Appointment of Thomas E. Morgan as Chairman of the U.S. Section. March 3, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Thomas E. Morgan as Chairman of the U.S. Section of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense—United States and Canada. Morgan, of Fredericktown, Pa., replaces Charles S. Gubser, resigned.

Morgan was born October 13, 1906, in Ellsworth, Pa. He received an M.D. from Wayne University in 1934.

Morgan practiced medicine and surgery in Fredericktown from 1934 to 1973. In 1944 he was elected to the 79th Congress, and he was reelected to each succeeding Congress until his retirement in January 1977.

Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe

White House Statement on the Belgrade Review Conference. March 3, 1978

The President today congratulated Justice Goldberg and the U.S. Delegation to the Belgrade Review Conference of CSCE on their successful work during the past few months. The President is particularly gratified that the delegation has worked in close harmony with the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, chaired by Representative Fascell, cochaired by Senator Claiborne Pell, and including both congressional and administration members.

The United States has achieved its basic goals at the Belgrade Conference, which will conclude its work next week:

- we conducted a full and frank review of the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act in all of its aspects. This included detailed discussion of human rights, including specific country-performance and individual cases. Human rights has now been firmly inscribed as a legitimate and proper concern on the agenda of international discussion;
- we maintained unity among the NATO allied states;
- we have worked with other nations to ensure that the process of security and cooperation in Europe, begun at Helsinki, will continue at Madrid in 2 years time;
- we took all of these steps in a spirit of seeking to enlarge the possibilities for cooperation among all the 35 states represented at Belgrade, and we will agree to the final document only to permit this process to continue.

Following the achievement of these basic goals at CSCE, we also presented, with our allies, a number of specific new proposals, designed to make more effective the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. Regrettably, the Soviet Union was not prepared to engage in a serious discussion of new proposals leading to agreement among the 35 states taking part. Nor, under the consensus procedure followed at Belgrade, was the Soviet Union prepared to agree to a final document that would take note of the full review of implementation—including human rights—that was the centerpiece of the conference.

We regret that the Soviet Union failed to permit the conference to proceed to its proper conclusion. We intend to press the Soviet Union to fulfill its commitment to respect human rights, to fulfill the Helsinki process, and to adhere to the final Helsinki Act itself. The Soviet refusal, under the consensus procedure, to accept a full final document in no way detracts from the success of the conference in conducting a full review of implementation, especially in the area of human rights. What has been done cannot be ignored, whether or not the Soviet Union is prepared to see it recognized in a formal document.

We will continue to build on the success that the Belgrade conference as a whole represents. During the period between now and the Madrid meeting, we will continue our efforts to promote implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. We will work closely with our allies, and with the European community, in that process. And at Madrid, we will renew the process of review, seeking always to raise the international standard of behavior, in all aspects of the Helsinki Final Act and particularly in the area of human rights.

Food Aid Convention

Announcement of Increase in United States Contribution. March 3, 1978

President Carter has doubled the U.S. food aid commitment to developing nations.

The President has authorized U.S. officials, now in Geneva negotiating a new Food Aid Convention (FAC) agreement, to guarantee that the United States will deliver up to half of a global food target of 10 million metric tons of grains annually. The World Food Conference set the target in 1974.

Under the new U.S. pledge, developing countries are guaranteed a specific quantity of food aid, even in years when supplies are scarce.

Approval of the sharp increase in U.S. food aid guarantees was recommended to the President by Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland.

The new pledge—almost two-and-one-half times greater than the existing United States Food Aid Convention commitment which expires on June 30, 1978—will be met under the current level of Public Law 480 shipments. The United States commitment had been 1.89 million tons annually since 1967.

United States negotiators will today pledge 4.47 million tons of grain annually to the Food Aid Convention. If other FAC donor countries collectively contribute more than the minimum American pledge, then the United States will increase its contribution on a matching ton-for-ton basis. The United States will also propose special FAC provisions designed to increase food assistance to meet extraordinary situations in developing countries.

In authorizing the increased U.S. contribution, which will be announced in Geneva today, President Carter said he has taken the step in an effort to solve three major problems affecting food aid programs.

“First, the world level of food aid falls short of the needs of developing countries,” the President said. “The international community has agreed that a minimum level of 10 million tons of grain is needed each year. However, this target has not been achieved in recent years. The fight against world hunger through food aid programs cannot be left to the small number of food exporting and traditional donor countries.

“Second, food aid levels have fluctuated without much regard for the needs of developing countries. During 1974, for example, when grain prices were very high and supplies scarce, food aid to developing countries was reduced by 40 percent just when their need was the greatest.

"Third, the Food Aid Convention has not met the problem of additional emergency needs of the poorer countries. When their crops fail, they need more than the minimum tonnage committed to help them meet their basic food requirements."

The Food Aid Convention, first established in 1967, committed signatory nations to providing developing countries with a minimum annual tonnage of grain on a bilateral basis. In the 1967 FAC, 11 member countries pledged 4.26 million tons of wheat, coarse grains, or a cash equivalent, with the U.S. pledging 1.89 million tons. A new Food Aid Convention was negotiated in 1971. Nine countries agreed to contribute 4.226 million tons of wheat and coarse grain. However, the U.S. commitment remained at 1.89 million tons. The 1971 FAC was extended three times.

NOTE: The White House press release also included a fact sheet on the Food Aid Convention.

Interview With the President

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session With a Group of College Editors and News Directors. March 3, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Since Midge<sup>1</sup> has had some of her other speaking engagements canceled, she has been looking for a way to spend her time.

It's a great pleasure to have you here. You don't often have a chance to have a photographers' convention. [Laughter]

I'd like to spend the brief time I have with you answering questions that you might have to present to me, but I would like to say that we are grateful for your coming. You represent an element of leadership, both present and future, that's very valuable to our country. And I know that your interest in both higher education and government is exemplified by your presence here.

So, without further ado, I'd like to just have your questions.

SALT NEGOTIATIONS

Q. Mr. President, it has been suggested from a report that Soviet officials at SALT negotiations in Geneva are suggesting that Russia might introduce cruise missiles in Cuba if the U.S. deploys such missiles with NATO forces in Western Europe. Do you have any comments on that as far as if this is going to be true?

THE PRESIDENT. I have had no suggestions that the Soviets might introduce missiles that were capable of attacking our country in Cuba if the SALT negotiations are successful or unsuccessful. I had a meeting yesterday, on the SALT negotiations in detail, with our chief negotiators.

We are making good and steady progress. We now are down to about 12 highly technical issues, 3 or 4 of which are quite significant in their nature and will be difficult. My own belief is that—both in reaching a SALT II agreement—which will last until 1985, a protocol which will last until 1980 or, perhaps, the first of 1981—and setting down the principles of a so-called SALT III agreement, which will bring about much more drastic reductions in commitments to nuclear weapons, plus, for the first time, discussions on a comprehensive test ban to prevent the explosions of nuclear materials either for peaceful nuclear devices, so-called, or for military purposes—we are making good progress in all those respects.

The time required has been much greater than we had anticipated, but my guess is that the negotiators will resolve most of these issues in Geneva. And they will probably require a direct meeting or communication between myself and President Brezhnev before we can reach a final agreement. But I don't anticipate any threats from the Soviet Union through Cuba as a result of success or failure.

SELECTION OF FEDERAL ATTORNEYS AND JUDGES

Q. During your campaign, one point that you emphasized was to restore people's faith in government.

Representative Philip Crane has introduced a House resolution to set into motion an impartial House investigation of the Marston matter. Would you favor such a resolution so that people's faith can be restored?

THE PRESIDENT. Well—[laughter]—it's difficult for me to comment objectively on Congressman Crane and all the—

Q. The resolution.

THE PRESIDENT. I understand. Well, at this point, the Senate is conducting an assessment of the appointment of Deputy Attorney General Civiletti. And in that process, the Republican members of the Senate Judiciary Committee are going into the Marston matter. There's nothing about the Marston matter at all that causes me any regret, except the extraordinary publicity that's been brought to it. I don't see, in retrospect, after careful examination of the issue, that anything improper was done.

There's never been an instance since I've been in office when an appointment was made to a U.S. attorney position or district judge or circuit judge other than strictly on the basis of merit. That was my commitment to the American people, and I have not violated it.

We've not yet made an appointment to replace Mr. Marston. Historically in this country, the Senate has been deeply involved in the decision about who would be Federal judges and U.S. attorneys. When I came into office, after 8 years of Republican administration, there had not been a single Democrat appointed to a U.S. attorney's position in 8 years. Only four U.S. attorneys were left over from previous Democratic administrations. They were in very strongly controlled States where the Democratic Senators were quite influential with the Nixon administration.

We have done it quite differently. We've established assessment commissions to give me recommendations for U.S. judges on a circuit basis. We've asked the Senators to set up similar merit selection commissions on a State basis for district judges—18, I think, have done theirs already—and in every instance, we've consulted with the highly qualified lawyers and others in the area, judges, to choose U.S. attorneys.

So, I would not hesitate to recommend any presentation of the facts about the Marston case.

FEDERAL RESERVE CHAIRMAN MILLER

Q. Mr. President, former Presidential economic adviser Paul McCracken, who is now on the lecture circuit, has claimed that your administration has no clearcut policy for fighting inflation. Do you feel this is a fair statement? And, also, what confidences do you place in newly appointed head of the Fed, G. William Miller, with regards to fighting inflation?

THE PRESIDENT. I have complete confidence in G. William Miller, who is a fine man. He's completely knowledgeable about international trade. He's a superb businessman. He's highly committed to improving our economy, to giving equality of opportunity in areas where people have been deprived in the past. He has an excellent understanding of economics in every respect, and as you know, he has received overwhelming support already in the Congress after investigation of him.

So, I have complete confidence in him. I think he's capable of balancing the same two basic factors that I have to balance on a daily basis—inflation, on the one hand, and restoration of job opportunities, on the other.

This past year we were highly successful in both areas. I've only been in office 1 year. I inherited an unemployment rate of, I think, 8.1 percent. At the end of the year the unemployment rate, this in January, was 6.3 percent, a remarkable reduction.

At the same time, for the last 6 months of 1977, the inflation rate had dropped to about 4 percent,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  percent, whereas I inherited an inflation rate approaching 10 percent. So, we've made good progress.

INFLATION

Q. Do you have any specific policies that you will submit to Congress for fighting inflation?

THE PRESIDENT. In every respect—you know, we have in every decision I make involving economics, whether it's a jobs bill or a level of budget authorizations or a decision on Executive administration, in every one of those items we have to carefully consider the impact of inflation. On our importing of oil, we're trying to cut down on that with a comprehensive energy package.

We've asked the labor and business to voluntarily constrain themselves on increasing wages and prices, so that their new negotiations for wage settlements beginning this year and their increases in prices would be below what they were the last 2 years.

We've had an underlying inflation rate of 6 to  $6\frac{1}{2}$  percent, which is still prevailing. But we have set a goal for ourselves to reduce this substantially below 5 percent. And that's compatible with the other elements of our economic package, to increase the GNP 4 or 5 percent per year and to cut the unemployment rate down as well.

So, those three things—to have a stimulus to keep our economy growing to put our people back to work, to limit Government expenditures as a percentage of total GNP and total income of the people of our country, and to hold down inflation—are very tightly knit and coherent Government policy on economics.

VALUE OF THE DOLLAR

Q. Recently the dollar hit a record low in international monetary markets, reflecting the continued lack of confidence throughout the world in our currency. How do you account for this lack of confidence, and what action is your administration taking to alleviate the plight?

THE PRESIDENT. I pointed out yesterday at the National Press Club that the basic elements of economic theory have pretty well been ignored in the last 2 or 3 weeks. We have been trying to get Germany, Japan, and other very strong nations who are prosperous and who are growing to meet us on an economic stimulus effort.

The fact is that the OPEC nations export about $60 billion worth of products more than they import. In other words, they have got a $60 billion positive trade balance. The trade balance all over the world has got to be zero. You've got to have a total amount of exports in all cases equal to the total amount of imports.

So, the rest of the nations have to absorb about a $60 billion deficit. We are absorbing our portion of it, more than our portion now. The Germans and the Japanese, on the other hand, have insisted on having a positive trade balance of their own, which aggravates the situation that I have just described to you. Because of that, there has been some inevitable adjustments downward in the value of the dollar as it relates to the yen, the deutsche mark, and some other major trade currencies used.

We have three basic principles or factors that will be affecting the value of the dollar in 1978. In each instance, there's a substantial improvement in prospect this year compared to last year. We will not be increasing the quantity of oil we import during 1978. We were rapidly increasing oil imports during 1977. That's one factor.

The second one is that last year we had a growth rate in our economy of about 3 percent higher than the average of our major trading partners, which meant that as our economy grows and prospers and our people are at work, we are able to buy their goods easier than they can buy our goods. We are more prosperous. We can purchase things. They are less prosperous. They have to sell things. That 3 percent difference is going to be reduced substantially this year. We'll still have a pretty strong growth rate, not quite as strong as last year. They'll have a better growth rate.

And the third thing is that because of varying factors, an attempt to control inflation by the Federal Reserve and other factors, that the interest paid on investments in our country this year will be higher than last year, which means that other nations who own currencies will have a tendency to invest them in the United States, more this year than last year. So, there will be an inevitable correction, I think, of the value of the dollar.

What we would do is try to intercede in the market only to compensate for disorderly marketing circumstances. We don't say that the dollar should be equal to 2.02 deutsche marks and try to hold that, you know, no matter what the world situation does. There's got to be some fluidity, some natural adjustment in the value of the dollar.

We're trying to stabilize it as best we can against disorderly marketing. And those three factors that I've described to you will bring about restoration of the acknowledgement of the true value of the dollar this year compared to last year.

TAX CREDITS FOR COLLEGE TUITION

Q. Mr. President, several weeks ago you went on record as being opposed to the tuition tax credit, and you have also come out in favor of increased Government loans to students. And you said that the tuition tax credit, I believe, and both the increased Government grants would be inefficient and wasteful. Could you elaborate more on that, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I will not accept, to the limit of my ability as President, both the tuition tax credit, which is very expensive and not focused well and is really a boon to the very affluent families, on the one hand, plus the proposal that we made. There's a narrowly focused, I think a very well focused, proposal that we put forward to increase direct grants to students when they come from low- and middle-income families, to authorize an increase in loans to students and families at low, middle income, and a little bit higher level of income, and work-study programs for students.

This will increase the number of students eligible for loans, grants, and work-study from about 3 million this year to 5 million when our program is put into effect. The cost of this will be less than one-half of the so-called income tax credits. It will also give aid to families that are most in need, to families that have a fairly good income, say, $20,000, or have two young people in school, and so forth.

So, I will not accept the two programs. Obviously, the one I favor is the one we've put forward. I think that the income tax credit, as a way to resolve the problem of student financing, is ill-advised.

CONTACT WITH THE PUBLIC

Q. Mr. President, my question is two-fold. There is in the office of Governor Jim Hunt in North Carolina an Office of Citizen Affairs which permits voluntarism and offers a citizen helpline to attempt to cut through the bureaucracy. We feel that this office is a most important office, and we wonder, at the Federal level, what promotion and support we are receiving, particularly in your administration.

My second question is, when are you coming to North Carolina? [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. I'm coming to North Carolina on the 17th of March. This is being announced today. I'll be in Winston-Salem, and I'll be making what I consider to be a major speech on the national defense, and also visiting friends of mine, Steve Neal, Bob Morgan, Jim Hunt, and others.

I met with Jim Hunt and Bob Morgan earlier this week to go into some of their relationships between North Carolina and the Federal Government. One of those, obviously, is the question of the school desegregation lawsuit involving the university system in North Carolina.

As you know, the HEW Department is under orders of a Federal judge to resolve that problem. And my own hope is, and my own expectation, by the way, is that this can be resolved satisfactorily on a mutual basis between Bill Friday, Joe Califano, and others.

So, we have a good relationship, I think, with people in the State directly, with Midge Costanza and her office, by delegations who wouldn't ordinarily have a voice and who have not in the past had a voice. I think my own travels around the country, to North Carolina this month and to other States as well—on a very frequent basis so that I can keep directly in touch with students and others—the regular relationships that we have with Governors, unprecedented, I might say, congressional delegations.

So, we've got a good and very active and constant relationship with people to make sure we get an input. This is one of the dangers of being President, is to be overly isolated. But I've had now a chance to have townhall-type meetings on a frequent basis. Within the last 2 weeks, I have had two of them, one in Maine and one in New Hampshire. The latter one I had about 1,500 people present. I think we had five students from every high school in New Hampshire, and teacher-counselors. And they had a week or so to prepare questions for me.

I had an hour-and-a-half session on nationwide television to answer their questions about issues. So, I try to stay in close contact through those means.

VIETNAM VETERANS

Q. Do you feel that your pardon of Vietnam era selective service resisters has been a success; and, secondly, is there any possibility of extending that pardon to include military deserters?

THE PRESIDENT. It's only partially successful because of the constraints placed on that program by Congress. I felt that we needed a much more comprehensive system of pardoning Vietnam veterans and also restoring their rights after the pardon is issued.

We're proceeding as best we can with that program under the constraints that Congress put on the administration. And I believe that this is something that should have been done.

We have also proposed, through the normal or existing legislative authority within the Defense Department, to expedite the consideration of both the Vietnam war protestors and also deserters.

This is a matter that's already authorized by law. We've tried to make sure that there was a distinction drawn between different levels of seriousness of desertion. If someone deserted on the field of battle and therefore endangered the lives of fellow warriors, this is a very serious matter. And we tried to draw a distinction there between other categories of desertion.

But I don't think it's been adequate yet. We're doing the best we can under the prevailing law that's been in existence for a long time within the Defense Department, and we've pursued the Vietnam consideration to the utmost of my ability.

PROJECT SEAFARER

Q. Mr. President, while campaigning in Michigan, you made a campaign promise that Project Seafarer would not be located in Michigan against the wishes of the citizens. Apparently that's changed. I'd like to know if you feel that you have broken a promise and, if so, how you'll justify this to the people of Michigan.

THE PRESIDENT. I haven't broken a promise, and it hasn't changed. So far as I know, no work is being done on Project Seafarer. I would like to say that I, as Commander in Chief of the military forces and as an ex-submariner myself, am deeply concerned about this problem. We need to have a way to communicate with our submerged submarines. And we have tried to modify any sort of environmental damage to Wisconsin or to Michigan in order to make the project acceptable to the people there.

And my own hope is that the Secretary of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the congressional delegation, perhaps myself personally, in reassessing how we can substitute something for Project Seafarer, can make it acceptable to the people in the area that's required.

If our Nation should be endangered in a time of war, the loss of services of a substantial portion of our submarine fleet, because of unwarranted opposition, would certainly be a serious thing for our country. But I've not broken that promise or any others and don't intend to.

ABORTION

Q. Mr. Carter, you stated that you were personally opposed to abortion and the government funding of abortions. How do you reconcile this with your support of the ratification of the ERA?

THE PRESIDENT. I strongly favor the ratification of ERA. And on this particular point, I have got the full support of Midge Costanza.

I think that the government should find every possible alternative to abortion. I don't think that abortion should be encouraged by the government under any circumstances. And I think that government payments for abortions should be limited to instances where the woman's life is threatened or where the pregnancy is a result of rape or incest.

This has been my position throughout the campaign. It was my position when I was Governor. It was part of the Georgia law which was stricken down by the Supreme Court. It's also, I think, the position of the Secretary of HEW. And it's also the position of Congress.

I don't see the two to be interrelated at all. I believe that to provide government funding for abortion is, in effect, a means of encouraging abortion as one extension of contraceptive procedures. I think a good education program, the making available of contraceptive devices for those who believe in their use, and encouragement of the facility with which unwanted children perhaps can be adopted, is a much better alternative.

I just am personally and politically opposed to anything that encourages abortions if there is a reasonable alternative to them.

SELECTION OF U.S. ATTORNEYS AND JUDGES

Q. Back to the question of judgeships. The House version of the omnibus judgeship bill contained a merit selection amendment requiring establishment of merit selection guidelines and procedures.

Your administration has failed to support this. Will you reconcile your campaign promise and support this?

THE PRESIDENT. I'm in favor of anything that's possible, either done by administrative act, voluntary action on the part of the U.S. Senators, or congressional action that would guarantee merit selection of every person appointed to a position of responsibility in the judiciary. That includes U.S. attorneys, district judges, and circuit judges.

The problem arises because for the last 150 years, Members of the U.S. Senate have always felt and still feel that a major portion of the selection of district Federal judges in their own States ought to be a joint responsibility between themselves and the President.

Within the framework of my own authority, I have acted already. And I would favor an extension of that authority through congressional action, as you've requested—as you've asked.

Let me say that there are some things that I can do, and I've done them.

I have hand-written a letter to all the Democratic Senators—when I first came into office—asking them to set up merit selection commissions. Already, 18 have done this, an unprecedented thing for Senators to do.

Secondly, we have made every appointment, whether recommended by a U.S. Senator or chosen by me, strictly on the basis of merit. There has never been even an allegation that an appointee that I've sent to the Senate, anywhere in the judiciary, was made other than on the basis of merit.

On the circuit judgeships, in every single instance in the United States, we now are making those on the basis of five or more top names selected by a superb blue ribbon panel to me, and then I make the selection from those five or six names on the basis of merit.

The same with the U.S. attorneys. We've still got 25 or 30 Republican U.S. attorneys. Habitually, under all previous administrations, so far as I know, the first day that the President came into office from a different party, all the U.S. attorneys resigned automatically.

We've tried to do away with that, you know, and move toward merit selection. I'm deeply committed to this, and, to repeat myself, anything that the Congress can do, I can do, or the Senators voluntarily can do, all of those combined is what I favor to ensure merit selection.

CAMPAIGN PLANS

Q. Mr. President, this year is election year, and Republicans are hoping to pick up some seats in the House. How much of your time do you plan to spend perhaps helping Democrats seeking House seats campaign?

THE PRESIDENT. I'll probably spend a good bit of time on that. I've made visits already this year to four States—to New Hampshire, Maine, Rhode Island, and Delaware.

I will participate in five major fund-raising efforts around the country. I've already participated in one in Atlanta, and we have others scheduled in Texas, California, New York, and Chicago.

I would guess that on occasion, without interfering with my other duties, I will go out to campaign in different parts of the country along with Democratic candidates. I won't get involved in primaries.

I think it's up to the people in those States to choose the Democratic nominee that they prefer. And I obviously can't campaign for all Democratic candidates. But where I feel that their own positions in the Congress are reasonably compatible with my own—I certainly don't expect subservience or want it, I don't expect complete compatibility or want it—I would campaign.

At the same time, in those trips, I'll make other worthwhile efforts to sense, to personally encounter what the American people believe and want, and to learn about our country.

For instance, on the visit to Winston-Salem, I'll be with Democratic candidates, perhaps for Governor, for the Congress. I'll go from there to spend a number of hours on an atomic aircraft carrier, seeing how it functions and what its role might be.

I'll be coming back into Savannah that evening for a major speech. And when I'm in Winston-Salem, I'll make a speech on national defense. So, these trips will be a combination of the two. But I'll spend more time this year, in 1978, than I did last year.

Maybe one more question and I'll have to close.

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

Q. I realize this might be a tricky question, but I'd like to pose it and I'd like you to answer it.

THE PRESIDENT. It's not a question but you want me to answer it? [Laughter] All right.

Q. As of today, do you feel confident that you will be reelected in 1980? The reason I ask this is because of recent newspaper editorials and columns which speculate that you may be a one-term President.

THE PRESIDENT. I think that speculation has been extant, you know, for almost every President—certainly since Eisenhower. And as a matter of fact, no President has served two terms since Eisenhower because of either tragedy or reluctance to run or because of defeat in the campaign. I don't have any way to project yet whether I will or will not run in 1980 or whether I would or would not be elected.

The fact of the matter is that in the public opinion polls my rating is still, you know, like 70, 75 percent, and the analysis of how good a job this administration has done is much lower, down around 50 percent. It depends on which poll you read. The measure of how effective an administration is has a lot to do with other people—how well the Congress responds to my request for major legislation, like on energy or the Panama Canal treaties; how well our foreign affairs efforts are successful, for instance, the Middle East peace settlement or a SALT agreement.

So, there are some things over which we have control, where I can make a unilateral decision and that's the final word; but, in almost every instance, the President's authority and power is very severely limited.

Now, there have been conjectures in the press about whether I acted properly or improperly, effectively or ineffectively in the coal strike. This is not a matter that a President can impose. You know, there's no way that I can impose a settlement on the miners and operators that they will honor. But we did the best we could to bring about a settlement between those two groups.

So, I have mixed emotions about it. I wish that I was favorably assessed by every news reporter and by every poll. But I've tried to be frank with you. My personal rating is high; the performance of my administration causes me some concern in the polls. But it's because of some of the difficulties of issues we've tackled and the lack of cooperation of people who don't see things the same way I do.

Let me say this—I've got to go, I've another appointment at 12—but let me say this: I don't believe I've met with a group at any time in the last 13 months that had such a wide range of questions, and questions that are more profound in their importance. This is typical of young people your age.

You have a lot of responsibility on you as do I. Your position in society is one of great privilege. The fact that you're here today shows that you've been fortunate, not just endowed with talent and intelligence but also you come probably from a good, solid family background or have had benefits from government in getting scholarships that others couldn't get. And you have an advantage and a certain flexibility of thought and analysis and perspective and a lack of heavy responsibility on your shoulders that constrains your independence of thought and also mobility.

That won't always be the case. In a few years you'll be employed in a major corporation or have your own business assignment or be teaching school or be working in a bank. And when that time comes, perhaps surprisingly to you, your freedom of expression and freedom of action and freedom of analysis will be severely restricted, because there will be an inclination on your part to conform to what the local school board or the principal of the school wants or what the president of the bank thinks or what your customers at a filling station might want you to believe.

And I really hope, as the President of the greatest country on Earth, that you won't relinquish your right and, even, responsibility for independent analysis and deep inquisitiveness and expressions of concern and open expressions of criticism when public officials like myself don't reach the standards that you've set for our country.

This is important to me. I'm a human being like you. I have a background perhaps similar to many of yours. Three years ago, I was completely unknown. I didn't have any money. I worked on my own with my family to become known enough for me to get elected to the highest office in our country. And that shows what our Nation can do.

I'm trying to do a good job. I'll make my share of mistakes. When I'm right, I need your support and your public expression of support. And I believe that in spite of its failures and faults and serious mistakes in the past which have caused doubt among people about the integrity and meaning of our government, that you won't lose that faith.

We have a kind of a self-correcting mechanism in the United States in that I'm directly responsible to you. And the public opinion polls, expressed by people who are well educated or have a special knowledge of a subject, are very important. And the voice of those with courage is very important.

Our country is so strong and so influential in the rest of the world. We're so fortunate in our country, not only in material things but in the freedom of spirit that we enjoy.

I hope that you'll emphasize not just your criticism but an expression of your faith and belief in the finest aspects of what America is.

One of the foreign policy matters that also applies domestically is in the area of human rights. I felt when I came into office that there was a sense of discouragement, an alienation and distrust among people in our country toward government because of the Vietnam war and because of Watergate and because of CIA revelations. And I felt then and feel now that there ought to be some clean, decent, clear expression by me as President, supported by you, of what our country stands for and what it has meant in the world the last 200 years.

I hope that you can help me discern those kinds of things, like peace and fairness and basic decency and human rights and honesty, that can be legitimate sources of pride for us.

I would say that political officeholders are no better or worse than any of you or those who elect us. We struggle sometimes with too much appreciation or lack of appreciation or understanding with extremely complicated issues. And when something gets on my desk in the Oval Office or arrives in the Congress for a decision, it's a matter that hasn't been resolved in spite of efforts by an individual American or family or at a city hall or county courthouse or a State capitol building. Almost inevitably, when a matter gets here to Washington, it is difficult, it is controversial, and there are sharp debates about how a resolution of an issue has to be reached.

But you are part of the process. And your voices can be very strong and very influential. And you have an ability and a freedom, which I've already described, to make your voice extraordinary in its effect.

I don't believe there's a dormancy among college-age students that has been deplored by some news analysts. I think the commitment, which can be extremely beneficial, is still there. And I think because of the outspoken nature of young people your age on the civil rights question in our country, the work of Martin Luther King and others was made possible for success. And because of the deep concern about young people your age, maybe inspired by singers like Bob Dylan and others, there was a deploring of an unnecessary and ill-advised war and a recommitment to preserving the quality of our environment. And the same opportunities exist for you as existed for previous college generations.

I thank you for coming and letting me be part of your session. I really admire what you all stand for and what you can do, and ask you to join with me in a partnership to make our great country even greater.

Thank you very much.

Wesley Bolin

Statement on the Death of the Governor of Arizona. March 4, 1978

Rosalynn and I extend our sincere sympathy to Marion Bolin and the people of Arizona on the death of Governor Wesley Bolin.

Wesley Bolin was part of the public scene in Arizona longer than almost anyone else in the State's history. He was elected constable of the West Phoenix Precinct in 1938 and had held statewide office for the last 30 years. In that time his State changed dramatically, but he was unchanged in his integrity, his warm spirits, and his dedication to duty and to the values he believed in.

Before being appointed Governor last fall, he had been elected to 13 consecutive terms as secretary of state, and he had become one of the most popular and well-respected men in the State.

The last week of his life was a time of particular fulfillment for Governor Bolin, as he came to Washington to represent his State at the National Governors' Conference. He dined with us at the White House and danced with Rosalynn to begin the evening's entertainment. We join the many others who knew the warmth of his personality and are saddened by his death.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

Executive Order 12042. March 6, 1978

CREATING A BOARD OF INQUIRY TO REPORT ON LABOR DISPUTES AFFECT- ING THE BITUMINOUS COAL INDUSTRY IN THE UNITED STATES

The existing labor disputes between coal mine operators engaged in the production of bituminous coal in the United States or coal mine contractors engaged in construction work in and around coal mines in the United States and certain of their employees represented by the United Mine Workers of America and its locals and affiliates have resulted in strikes in a substantial portion of the coal industry. In my judgment these strikes affect a substantial portion of the bituminous coal industry, an industry engaged in trade, commerce, transportation and transmission among the States and with foreign nations, and will, if permitted to continue, imperil the national health and safety.

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me by Section 206 of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, 61 Stat. 155, as amended (29 U.S.C. 176), I hereby create a Board of Inquiry to inquire into the issues involved in the dispute. I appoint as members of that Board:

John N. Gentry, Chairman
Eva Robins
Carl A. Warns

The Board shall have the powers and duties set forth in Title II of the Labor Management Relations Act and shall report to me, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, as expeditiously as possible. Upon submission of its report, the Board shall continue in existence to perform the functions required of it under the Act.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

Remarks Announcing Invocation of the Taft-Hartley Act. March 6, 1978

A majority of the United Mine Workers have now rejected the negotiated coal contract. I'm disappointed that this agreement was not approved. But I recognize that the United Mine Workers' system of collective bargaining requires approval by union members before a contract can take effect.

My policy has been to do everything possible to help the collective bargaining process produce a settlement. But this rejection by the United Mine Workers' collective bargaining is now at an impasse.

The coal strike is 3 months old. The country cannot afford to wait any longer.

Coal supplies have been reduced to a critical level throughout the Midwest.

Tens of thousands of people are already out of work because factories have laid off workers to conserve fuel. Power curtailments have reached 50 percent in Indiana, 30 percent in West Virginia, and critical levels in other parts of the Midwest. One month from now, at least a million more Americans would be unemployed if the coal strike continued.

My responsibility is to protect the health and safety of the American public, and I intend to do so.

I've ordered the Attorney General, under the Taft-Hartley Act, to prepare for an injunction to require the miners to return to work and the mineowners to place the mines back into production.

I've appointed a Board of Inquiry and asked it to report back to me as soon as possible to begin the emergency dispute-settling procedure under the Taft-Hartley Act.

In addition, I've asked the Attorney General and the Governors of the affected States to make certain that the law is obeyed, that violence is prevented, and that lives and property are fully protected.

The Department of Energy will use, as necessary, its allocation powers to minimize the effects of fuel shortage on regions which are most dependent on coal by moving energy resources to places where they are most urgently needed. We will depend on the free and voluntary distribution of energy whenever possible.

I have not taken this action lightly. These steps are absolutely necessary if our Nation is not to be the innocent victim of a total breakdown of the collective bargaining process.

I expect that all parties affected by these actions will cooperate fully and abide completely by the law. Under a Taft-Hartley injunction, miners ordinarily are required by law to return to work under the existing contract, unless more acceptable terms can be negotiated nationwide between management and labor.

During recent negotiations, both mine-workers and operators agreed on new wages to begin in 1978. When the Taft-Hartley injunction takes effect, we will seek to permit any company to offer this new wage settlement to those who return to work under the injunction.

The new 1978 wage package is a generous one which reflects the special conditions of coal mining. And I must say quite frankly that I do not support and would personally oppose any more liberal and inflationary wage settlement.

The best permanent solution to this dispute is a settlement reached through collective bargaining. While the Taft-Hartley injunction is in effect, I will take steps to see that all parties resume negotiations as rapidly as possible. Whenever negotiated coal contracts are ratified by the UMW membership, the Taft-Hartley injunction will be lifted.

The difficult and dangerous work of coal miners has helped America prosper and grow strong. For too many years in the past, the miners, their parents, and their grandparents paid an unfair and bitter price for working in the mines. They often did not have the safety protection they needed. And they did not receive compensation for black lung disease and other hazards that they encounter daily.

More improvements are still needed in these working conditions for miners. But we have made important progress. I recently signed legislation, passed by Congress, that will significantly improve both black lung benefits and the enforcement of Federal health and safety standards in the coal mines.

As Americans, we all share the responsibility for preserving the health and safety of our country, which is now in danger. The labor laws of our country, of the United States, have been written to protect our Nation and at the same time to protect the rights of workers.

In times of crisis, the law binds us together. It allows us to make decisions openly and peacefully, and it gives us, through the courts and legal procedures, means to resolve disputes fairly. Respect for the rule of law ensures the strength of our Nation. The law will be enforced.

As President, I call on the mineworkers, the coal mine operators, and all Americans to join in a common effort under the law to protect our country, to preserve the health and safety of our people, and to resolve fairly the differences which have already caused so much suffering and division in our land.

Thank you very much.

United States-United Kingdom Air Services Agreement

Letter to the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board. March 6, 1978

To Chairman Alfred Kahn

I have examined your order (Docket 32183) dated February 28, 1978, which proposes to take certain actions regarding air fares and services between points in Texas and London.

The Board and I share the same commitment to low-priced, competitive air transportation, a principle embodied in Article 12, Section 2 of the US-UK Air Services Agreement of 1977 (Bermuda II). I agree with the Board that the action of the British government in rejecting low-fare tariffs filed by Braniff International Airways for its new Dallas/Ft.

Worth-London route is inconsistent with Bermuda II.

I note, however, that negotiations with the British government concerning this matter began on February 10 and resume today for the period March 6 through March 17. I am confident that during these negotiations the British government will adopt a position consistent with Bermuda II, and I therefore request that you withdraw your order at this time. If a satisfactory resolution with the British is not reached by March 17, I will reconsider the need for unilateral action by the United States.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

[The Honorable Alfred Kahn, Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D.C.

Energy Emergency in Maryland

Statement by the President. March 7, 1978

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Maryland, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I hereby determine that an energy emergency exists in the service area of the Potomac Edison Company of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate regulations under the Maryland Air Quality Implementation Plan may be necessary, and that other means of responding to the energy emergency may be inadequate. This determination shall be effective for not more than thirty (30) days, provided that the State of Maryland shall hold the public hearing required by Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act within 1 week of this determination. If, during the period of suspension, I find that this energy emergency no longer exists, I will direct that this determination of energy emergency be rescinded and that all suspension orders issued by the Governor be terminated effective on the day of that rescission. The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Maryland and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to act with due care if he suspends air pollution regulations under the authority provided by this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health. In conducting hearings and making findings, I urge the Governor to consider carefully that suspensions which would allow a facility to burn available fuel which could not otherwise be utilized generally are appropriate. On the other hand, suspensions which permit facilities to turn off pollution control devices should be used sparingly and as a last resort, because such suspensions will accomplish only small energy savings while increasing risks to public health.

I also urge the Governor to implement fully necessary energy conservation measures so that the necessity for suspension of pollution control regulations can be minimized.

NOTE: The Presidential determination is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1978

Statement on Signing H.R. 9375 Into Law. March 7, 1978

The Supplemental Appropriations Act, H.R. 9375, which I am signing today, contains three major elements that I had requested: it rescinds funds for the B-1 bomber, makes available $4.5 billion in waste water treatment grants to local communities, and provides $1.4 billion for Small Business Administration disaster loans to farmers who suffered crop losses in last year's drought.

I am particularly pleased that the Congress has supported the rescission of the funds formerly planned for construction of the fifth and sixth B-1 bombers. In supporting this rescission, the Congress has saved the taxpayers nearly half a billion dollars.

The program of research and testing we will carry out, using the first four B-1 aircraft, will provide an adequate hedge against the unlikely possibility that our current plans for modernizing the B-52 bombers with cruise missiles do not work out.

I am especially grateful to Chairman George Mahon and Senators John Stennis and John Culver for their dedicated work in the passage of this bill, in keeping out additional B-1 funds.

The largest appropriation in this bill is for the waste treatment grants. The Congress has authorized funding of this program through fiscal year 1982, so that local governments can plan their projects better. I am committed to consistent long-term Federal support for the effort to clean up our water supplies. As a legislator and as a Governor, I saw the serious problems and needless expense that local communities often suffered when funds were inconsistent, delayed, or impounded.

Under current law, both the Farmers Home Administration in the Department of Agriculture and the SBA have authority to grant disaster loans to farmers. I have recommended legislation to remedy this overlapping jurisdiction by giving the Department of Agriculture sole responsibility in this area. In the meantime, the funds in this supplemental appropriation will enable SBA to handle current applications for low-cost loans.

Another important provision of this bill is the $124 million for welfare payments and medical and social services to refugees from Cambodia, Vietnam, and Laos. This will reimburse States and local governments 100 percent for providing these basic services to refugees, as well as funds for special educational and training projects.

H.R. 9375 also appropriates $80 million for the Clinch River Breeder Reactor. I believe that a strong research and development program for the breeder reactor is essential to maintaining a diversity of energy supply options for this country. In my FY 1979 budget, I have recommended $367 million for continued research and development on the liquid metal fast breeder reactor. Our breeder program is the largest in the world. We can draw upon this technology—and build a demonstration plant—whenever it becomes necessary and economically feasible.

I believe just as strongly, however, that we cannot afford to waste vitally needed energy research and development funding on energy projects which are neither necessary to meet our projected energy needs nor economically sound. Development of coal technology and solar and renewable resources, resolution of issues hindering increased use of light water reactors, and improved oil and gas recovery methods all must be pursued on a high priority basis.

In view of these priorities, and my commitment to a strong breeder research and development program, I continue to believe that the construction of the CRBR is an unproductive use of our taxpayers' dollars, which will not enhance our ability to call upon the breeder to meet our energy needs. The $80 million contained in this bill for the CRBR will be used to complete the systems design for this reactor and to terminate further CRBR activities in an orderly way. I will continue to work with the Congress to ensure that our research and development resources are directed to those programs which will give us maximum assurance that we can meet our energy needs.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 9375 is Public Law 95-240, approved March 7.

Visit of President Josip Broz Tito of Yugoslavia

*Remarks at the Welcoming Ceremony.
March 7, 1978*

PRESIDENT CARTER. This morning the people of the United States are honored by the presence of a great world leader, President Tito of Yugoslavia.

This is his third visit to the United States. The last time he was here was in 1971. One of the first actions that I took as President was to ask Vice President Mondale to go to Yugoslavia to present my own respects and admiration to President Tito.

He is indeed a remarkable man who has exhibited in his own life tremendous personal courage in battle, in times of severe testing of his strength as a human being and as a patriot. He's a contemporary of great world leaders who survived the crises of world war, a friend and associate of Prime Minister Churchill, President Roosevelt, General de Gaulle. He's a man who, on his own initiative, combined with other great leaders, Nehru, Nasser, to form an organization of the nonaligned peoples of the world. His recent activities in world events have been truly remarkable for any leader, and particularly one of his experience and the size of his nation.

He's a father of the United Nations' Disarmament Conference, which will take place later this year. He has recently been the host of the leaders of the world who have assessed the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, known as the Helsinki agreement. He will later be the host, this year, in Yugoslavia of a meeting of the foreign ministers of the nonaligned nations.

He's a man who has understood for a long time our own Nation's commitment to détente and the true significance of this misunderstood word. He realizes and has told me in frequent, personal communications that he understands that détente must be comprehensive, that it must be reciprocal in nature, and it must be a demonstration constantly by the super powers of mutual restraint and a constant search for peace.

President Tito is a leader who has such great respect that he's able to bridge the gap of communications and understanding between nations and leaders who quite often have difficulty in dealing with one another. Within the last 9 months, he has made major visits to many countries and many capitals, including Moscow, Peking, and now Washington.

Perhaps as much as any other person, he exemplifies in Yugoslavia the eagerness for freedom, independence, and liberty that exists throughout Eastern Europe and indeed throughout the world. He and the people of Yugoslavia are recognized by our own country as worthy of admiration. We understand that the independence and the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia is one of the basic foundations of world peace now and in the future.

He's been an inspiration to the people of his own country and to others in his constant insistence on this freedom and independence. The people of Yugoslavia have in a unique way recognized their own willingness to sacrifice to the ultimate degree for the freedom of their own country. Within the Yugoslavian Constitution itself, there is a direct prohibition which forbids capitulation to any other outside force.

And finally, President Tito is the leader of a modern, prosperous country. He's a friend of the United States. He's been helpful to me through constant consultation, has given me advice and constructive reports as a result of his trips around the world and his free communication and mutual confidence with other world leaders.

The trade and commerce between ourselves and Yugoslavia's people is valuable to us. We hope to see it expanded in the future.

So, President Tito, on behalf of the people of our Nation, we welcome you to our shores, to our country, as a true friend.

PRESIDENT TITO. Mr. President, may I thank you warmly for your friendly words of welcome. I am very pleased to have this opportunity to visit again the United States of America in response to your kind invitation. The peoples of Yugoslavia and the American people are linked with bonds of traditional friendship born in times of great trial and hardships they have gone through in their histories. I am looking forward in particular to having a broad exchange of views with you, Mr. President, and to meeting also other American statesmen, Congressmen, and prominent personalities. We highly value contacts and political dialog with American leaders.

In the last few years, Yugoslav-American relations have been developing and expanding gradually, but very successfully, the differences of view on certain international questions not being an obstacle for the further strengthening of cooperation between the Governments and our friendship between the peoples of the two countries. The development of our bilateral relations has shown that through mutual efforts and good will, even the most complex problems can be solved with success.

We in Yugoslavia are very much interested in the continuing, successful, and comprehensive development of relations between our two countries on the basis of the already established principles of independence, sovereignty, mutual respect, and understanding.

We expect that our visit to the United States, the exchange of views on current international issues, as well as the talks on the promotion of bilateral cooperation, will make an important contribution to the further strengthening and promotion of friendly relations between our two countries and thereby, also, to broader understanding, respect, and cooperation in the world.

I take this opportunity to convey to the American people on behalf of the peoples of Yugoslavia the expressions of their friendly feelings and their best wishes for your overall progress.

Thank you, sir.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:42 a.m. on the South Lawn of the White House. President Tito spoke in Serbo-Croatian, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter.

Visit of President Tito of Yugoslavia

Toasts at the State Dinner. March 7, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. First of all, I would like to say that my wife, Rosalynn, and I welcome all of you to the White House. We here tonight and all the people of the United States are deeply honored by the visit of a great world leader, President Tito of Yugoslavia.

We've had a delightful conversation during supper. I found that he has some things in common with us. He has a private farm where he grows grapes and produces wine. It's my second favorite vine, the first one being peanuts, of course. [Laughter]

Although we do have differences there, my brother, Billy, as you know, is—[laughter]—he produces beer, not wine. [Laughter]

President Tito is a man of great courage. He was telling me that there is an island—which some of our guests here at the head table, the Harrimans at least, have visited—about 2½ miles wide, 5 miles long, where he has a tremendous collection of puma, lions, camels, elephants, other animals, wild boar. I know very well how he feels when he goes there for a weekend, very similar to the way I felt when I came to Washington 13 years ago. [Laughter]

President Tito is a leader who has welcomed many great Americans to his country. One of the first was in 1944. President Tito, then an early leader of Yugoslavia toward freedom, was in his headquarters when a B-24 crashed in a barnyard while he watched the plane go down.

Out of the B-24 stepped the crew. The first man out of the plane was George McGovern. [Laughter] This is a true story. And ever since, President Tito has welcomed American visitors of great distinction to his country. [Laughter]

This is a world leader who has led his people and protected their freedom almost for the last 40 years. Through peace and war, he has been part of the personal history of the world during our own generation and the previous generation.

James Reston, who interviewed President Tito recently, said that he is the last political giant of this century. He's a man of eternal strength, of eternal youth, of eternal vigor, and of eternal courage.

The Nation of Yugoslavia has been close to us in the United States since its very foundations, when Woodrow Wilson, our President, was instrumental in helping Yugoslavia become a country.

President Tito was a contemporary of great men, Prime Minister Churchill, President Roosevelt, General de Gaulle, and, as you know, many others, particularly Stalin. And he, along with President Nasser and Prime Minister Nehru, originated the concept of the strength of the nonaligned nations.

Not only the world but he's watched the history of the United States evolve. I'm the seventh American President in succession whom he has known.

He is a man who is very vigorous in his leadership. Within the last 8 or 9 months he's visited many countries personally, including the People's Republic of China, Peking; the Soviet Union, Moscow; our own country, Washington.

He's constantly searching for common beliefs and common hopes and common dreams that can unite people who might otherwise be separated by a lack of communication or differences in philosophical or political outlook.

He's a man who believes in disarmament. As a matter of fact, he is a father of the upcoming United Nations conference on disarmament.

He's a man who believes in human rights. He was the host this past few months of the human rights conference which was designed to assess the progress of the Helsinki agreement in that matter, human rights, plus searching for a more common ground on which the nations of Eastern and Western Europe might unite and resolve our differences.

Early in the present conflict between Israel and her neighbors, he told me today, on a trip to Egypt he reminded that Arab nation, which was then involved in disharmony and even hatred and war with Israel, that a time had come to recognize the right of Israel to exist and to exist in peace.

There is a feeling of personal friendship and warmth and admiration that exists among the people of the United States toward this great leader and the land which he has guided through very difficult times in recent decades.

On behalf of the American people, I would like to offer a toast to the great and courageous leader, President Tito, and to the independent and proud country which he leads, Yugoslavia.

PRESIDENT TITO. Mr. President, dear Mrs. Carter, ladies and gentlemen, friends:

May I first thank you sincerely for the expressions of welcome, the exquisite hospitality you are surrounding us with, and particularly for the friendly words you have addressed to the peoples of Yugoslavia and to me personally.

I wish straightaway to underscore my pleasure at the successful development of relations and ever broader cooperation in numerous fields between our two countries, to which you, Mr. President, are contributing so much.

In founding the relations on the familiar principles of equality, noninterference, and mutual respect, Yugoslavia and the United States have, by the results that we have achieved, reaffirmed to the full extent the vitality and the irreplaceable validity of these principles.

This can only encourage us to proceed along that path and these bases in developing increasingly our cooperation in political and economic fields, in science, technology, engineering, culture, tourism, and other spheres.

I am certain that this is also a safe way for the constant strengthening of friendship between our peoples, for the building of mutual confidence and respect, and thereby also for a constructive contribution to the creation of better conditions in the world.

I am convinced—and your words, Mr. President, encourage me in it—that this visit and our talks will serve these objectives in the best possible manner.

While speaking of the tradition of our friendship and the invaluable links between our two countries, I should like to recall the exceptional contribution to it made by many Yugoslavs who found in your country their new homeland, and who have been devoting their talents and work and who continue to devote them to the development of your country and to the well-being of mankind.

Mr. President, in the endeavors towards peace, stability, and progress today, détente is undoubtedly that major preoccupation of both the United States and Yugoslavia, as well as of almost all countries in the world.

We are deeply convinced that détente can fulfill the expectations of all the peoples of our planet if it becomes a universal process and if it encompasses all the burning problems of the day—first and foremost political, military, and economic—as at present, we live in a world of such interdependence that its fate is ultimately common.

Crises and problems necessarily affect everybody by the same token as the progress and achievements of each people become the possession and inspiration of the entire humanity. It is for this reason that we deem it indispensable that parallel with avoiding confrontations between big powers, basic problems of development should be resolved, as well as those in the field of disarmament, that the policy of power and interference into the internal affairs of others should be eliminated from international relations, and that the efforts of all countries should be aimed at the overcoming of bloc and other divisions in the world, as well as the establishment of a new and more just international economic order.

All these problems bear on the vital interests of the whole mankind. Widely acceptable solutions have to be found to them if we are to secure survival, peaceful development, and prosperity for everybody.

I should like to point out that Yugoslavia, like many other countries, is especially interested in the elimination of existing focal points of armed conflicts which at any time may become the source of new, still greater crises of widest proportions.

Particularly worrying at the present juncture is the crisis in the Middle East, which is increasing tension in the region of the whole Mediterranean. Any complication or any further aggravation of the situation in the Middle East constitutes—and this we are profoundly convinced of—constitutes an extremely serious threat to peace and security in this region, with consequences affecting a wide range of countries.

We have been pointing out on numerous occasions our views, founded on the decisions of the United Nations and non-aligned countries, on the irreplaceable ways for bringing about a just and durable solution to the crisis and thereby also for the creation of the indispensable preconditions for the security and cooperation of all the countries and all the peoples in the region.

Here I would just like to point out that it would be extremely dangerous indeed to allow the possibility of having the policy of force and forceable acquisition of foreign territories—those in the Middle East or anywhere else in the world—even partly pay.

Likewise, I should like to voice my firm conviction that it is quite inadmissible that today an entire nation—I mean the Palestinians—should be denied the elementary national rights that other nations have been enjoying for centuries, and that the settlement of the Palestinian problem is essential and is the core of the solution and lasting settlement of the crisis in the Middle East as a whole.

During our recent exchange of messages, we could, Mr. President, note a considerable closeness of our positions on the need for the parties to the conflict in the Horn of Africa to find a peaceful solution to their problems under this spirit without interference from outside, and on the basis of mutual respect, independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, and nonintervention in each other's affairs.

I think that such an approach should be applied also to other parts of Africa. It must not be allowed that any region, either in that or in any other continent, should become the ground for the contention of blocs of big powers. Any such rivalry carries in itself the danger of a broader conflict with consequences that necessarily affect the entire international community.

I am confident that our views are also close in that it is necessary within the framework of the efforts of all member states of the United Nations further to promote constantly, integrally, universally, human rights as one of the essential ingredients in the strengthening of the equitable international cooperation and peace in the world. And an end should be put as soon as possible to colonialism, racism, and apartheid in southern Africa and everywhere else in the world where these deplorable vestiges of the sinister past of part of mankind still survive.

I should also like to stress that Yugoslavia fully shares the concern by the overwhelming number of countries over the unabated continuation of the arms race, which exposes mankind to tremendous dangers and, it is needless to say, greatly encumbers the settlement of the essential political and economic problems in the world we live in.

For this reason, we view the forthcoming special session of the General Assembly of the United Nations devoted to disarmament as an exceptional opportunity for a joint effort of all the world organizations, member countries, to its opening up for the sake of the security of the present and future generations a process of genuine disarmament.

We cherish a deep hope, Mr. President, that both you, personally, and your country will provide your share which will give an impetus to this process, which will, beyond any doubt, earn you well-deserved recognition.

May I also on this occasion emphasize how great importance for peace, security, and the prosperity of all countries have the building of new, more just economic relations in the world and particularly the promotion of an accelerated economic development of developing countries and the finding of solutions to the problems of energy, raw materials, food, the transfer of technology, and others.

The solution of this, I would say, major problem of the present-day world would constitute is the historic imperative of our time. Any delay of this resolution constitutes a serious risk of creating an atmosphere in which a search for solutions reached by common agreement would be made considerably more difficult.

Mr. President, the movement of non-alignment, to which Yugoslavia belongs and within which it has been active ever since its beginning, has become today a recognized factor in the world due to its consistent struggle for peace and security, for equality and unimpeded development, for the settlement of burning issues of the present-day world.

A comprehensive emancipation of nations and countries, decolonization and creation by means of the establishment of the new economic order of genuine preconditions for the prosperity of all countries are inseparably linked with the activities of nonaligned countries. These ideals and objectives are in no way new. They permeated our aspirations also at a time of the founding of the United Nations.

The movement of nonaligned is a logical expression of the objective need of the present, still considerably divided world. It is an exceptionally important part, an active factor of the process of détente. It can be discerned that there is growing consciousness and awareness in the world of such a role of the movement of nonaligned countries in the current development of international relations.

Therefore, every attempt at weakening the nonaligned movement and that linking its parts to one or the other bloc is inevitably directed against détente itself, against the strengthening and expansion of peaceful coexistence. And this leads to dangers that might affect the nonaligned countries and countries belonging to blocs alike.

I have already mentioned the interdependence of the world, which requires from all countries—irrespective of their size, might, and affiliation—close cooperation, coupled with mutual respect. The nonaligned countries always stand ready for such cooperation. Their decisions and activity are inspired by it, and it is my firm belief that the only way for mankind to move towards a more secure future lies in this very cooperation, rather than confrontation.

We have been guided by it also in our activity during the Belgrade followup meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, at which Yugoslavia, as the host, has special responsibilities.

We certainly believe that it is paramount for all the states participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to equally exert efforts towards a constant strengthening of the process of relaxation and cooperation in the spirit of Helsinki, for only thus may this process yield results which millions of people in Europe, the United States, and Canada, as well as in the rest of the world, expect from it.

Any attempt to impose unilateral interests casts a shadow over the already attained level of confidence and throws us back into the past, while the very nature of the process of détente makes it incumbent on us, due to the accountability of all countries and peoples to themselves, to move constantly forward.

Yugoslavia and the United States of America have been cooperating successfully in the international field already for a number of years. This cooperation dates back to a time when sharing on the same side the hardships of the past World War, we were searching for the best means to make it possible for the world to live in peace, understanding, and friendship.

I profoundly believe that now we shall deepen this cooperation still further in our mutual and even broader interest. The United States is a big power. Yugoslavia's part of the nonaligned movement. It is for this very reason, this very reason, which calls for our two countries to cooperate more closely in the search for widely acceptable solutions to pressing international problems.

Such a Yugoslav-American cooperation can only contribute to a broader international understanding so greatly needed in the present world.

Our view is that differences, sometimes substantial and often unavoidable, are not nor ought to be an obstacle to cooperation; but, quite on the contrary, one more reason for dialog and for search for agreed solutions. In this respect, we already have very positive experience.

Mr. President, I wish to point out that we highly appreciate the contribution made by your country and by you, personally, to the cause of understanding and cooperation in the world.

You have invested a great amount of good will in resolving certain problems. May I mention the Panama Canal agreement as an illustration.

In this agreement you have, together with the Government of Panama, encouraged the hope that it is possible—and I would also add, indispensable—to resolve in a similar way other outstanding international problems as well. Your country has thereby only gained in the eyes of the world.

Mr. President, I am sure that our talks will show that we have much in common and will provide a strong impetus to our future cooperation in all fields, as well as that by our candid and constructive approach we shall contribute to better knowledge of each other and broader understanding in the world. For this reason, I think that our talks transcend the Yugoslav-American framework and reflect far broader interests.

It is with this in mind, and in a sense of satisfaction and gratitude for such a warm reception, that I propose this toast to your health, Mr. President, to that of Mrs. Carter, for the further prosperity of the friendly American people, for the comprehensive development of relations and ever closer cooperation between our two countries, for Yugoslav-American friendship, for increasing understanding, respect, and cooperation in the world.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:35 p.m. in the State Dining Room at the White House. President Tito spoke in Serbo-Croatian, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter.

Civil Service Rules

Executive Order 12043. March 7, 1978

AMENDING THE CIVIL SERVICE RULES REGARDING NOTICE OF EXEMPTIONS FROM THE COMPETITIVE SERVICE

Pacific Northwest River Basins Commission

Appointment of Melvin L. Gordon as Federal Chairman. March 8, 1978

The President today announced that he will appoint Melvin L. Gordon, of Portland, Oreg., to be Federal Chairman of the Pacific Northwest River Basins Commission. He replaces Donel J. Lane, resigned.

Gordon, 55, has been a commissioner of Multnomah County, Oreg., since 1963. From 1961 to 1963, he served in the Oregon Legislature. Before 1961 he owned and operated Standard Batteries, Inc., and Mel Gordon Tire Co. in Portland.

As county commissioner Gordon is county liaison to the Columbia Regional Association of Governments, the Metropolitan Service District, and the Port of Portland. He was a member of the Federal Energy Administration's Environmental Advisory Committee and is former chairman of the Energy and Environment Committee of the National Association of Counties.

United States Tax Court

Nomination of Herbert L. Chabot To Be a Judge. March 8, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Herbert L. Chabot, of Rockville, Md., to be a Judge of the U.S. Tax Court for a term of 15 years. He would replace Bruce M. Forrester, retired.

Chabot was born July 17, 1931. He received a B.A. from City College of New York in 1952, an LL.B. from Columbia Law School in 1957, and an LL.M. in taxation from Georgetown University Law School in 1964. He served in the U.S. Army from 1953 to 1955.

From 1957 to 1961, Chabot was staff counsel for the American Jewish Congress. From 1961 to 1965, he was attorney-adviser to Judge Russell E. Train of the U.S. Tax Court.

Since 1965 Chabot has been on the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation of the U.S. Congress. He joined the committee staff as an attorney, served as assistant chief of staff from 1973 to 1977, and since 1977 has been deputy chief of staff.

Chabot has also been an adjunct professor of law at George Washington University since 1974.

Federal Reserve System

Remarks at the Swearing In of G. William Miller as Chairman of the Board of Governors. March 8, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, I want to welcome all of you here to the White House for a memorable occasion. I've been looking forward to it. [Laughter]

The turnout is superb in quality and in quantity. It's about a month later than I had anticipated, but I think it is obvious from those who are assembled here that this is a great day for our country.

Bill Miller is a man who has a broad range of background and experience that will be additionally valuable to our country in the months and years ahead. As a businessman and industrialist, as one who's intimately involved and an expert on international trade, as someone who's been deeply associated with the social changes that have taken place in our country—equal opportunity, civil rights, the sacrificial work that he's done in providing job opportunities for young people, for minority groups, for veterans—these will all be tremendous assets that he will bring to his new position as Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

He's also become an expert on congressional relations recently. [Laughter] I was very envious when he was so overwhelmingly approved with a voice vote, and no apparent negative votes at all—much better than the political victory I won a year and a half or so ago. [Laughter]

I think all of you realize the tremendous importance of the position that he will occupy as Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. I would say that as far as the Nation's monetary policy and strength is concerned, that perhaps second only to the White House and all its influence, this chairmanship will be the most influential in shaping our Nation's economic strength in the future.

There is, under our Constitution and laws, a very good balance of responsibility and authority between the White House, the Congress, and the Federal Reserve. There is a deeply cherished commitment to independence. And under Chairman Burns, this commitment was preserved, and there was exemplified in the chairmanship an absolute integrity, honesty, competence, dedication, courage, which enhanced our Nation's reputation throughout all the other nations of the world. And the people of the United States, Mr. Chairman, owe you a deep debt of gratitude and appreciation and admiration, and I thank you personally.

Our new Chairman, Bill Miller, has a precedent established for himself that will be a challenge even to a man with his superior qualifications and dedication. And on behalf of the people of our Nation, I congratulate Bill Miller, the members of the Federal Reserve Board, and the people who work here in Washington with him and with me and with the Congress.

We have had now a fourth year of economic recovery. This past year was a good one with the unemployment rate dropping, the inflation rate holding steady, our gross national product increasing, business profits and personal income being up. But we still have serious problems with the strength of the dollar, with a constraint on the inflation rate, and pockets of unemployment that cause all of us deep concern.

I have complete confidence in William Miller and would now like to ask Chief Justice of the Supreme Court Warren Burger to come give this fine man the oath of office.

Mr. Chief Justice.

[At this point, the Chief Justice administered the oath of office.]

MR. MILLER. President Carter, I know I speak for my family and friends and associates in thanking you for having us here in the White House for this occasion. It's an important occasion for me and my family, and I'm sure I speak for everyone in expressing our appreciation.

The Federal Reserve is a unique American institution. It represents a solution to central banking that's typically American, where you blend the national responsibilities with local and regional participation. And it's a system that has well stood the test of time.

For 65 years, it's served through good times and bad times and has shown its ability to respond to a changing world and a changing America. We've seen unprecedented changes in technology, social, economic development, and the Federal Reserve has been able to adapt and respond to provide for the needs of a growing America.

The Federal Reserve System has also had remarkable leadership. Since the present organization was established in the thirties, there have been four Chairmen of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and two of them are with us here now.

William McChesney Martin, who was Chairman for a longer period than any other Chairman, has a record that speaks for itself and is a beacon of excellence. And Arthur Burns, well, he's a legend in his own time. And I cannot say any more gracious words than the President has already said, but I'd like to second them and third them and applaud them, because you have been a great fighter against inflation. Your integrity, your intellect, your talents are known, and you are well loved and respected throughout the world.

I never expected to be a central banker, but when the President invited me to do so, the warm response that Arthur Burns gave and the support and help he's given me is more than a reward in itself. It's been a great experience for me and one which I shall always cherish.

Well, it's obvious that I've had giants as predecessors, and so I face a very demanding standard in trying to carry out the duties of this great institution. I can tell you that I will do my best to make a contribution to the best of my ability.

We do, Mr. President, I believe, have the ability to pledge to you that the entire Federal Reserve family will devote itself to the most professional conduct of its affairs, so that it can contribute to our national goals of growth and price stability.

It's going to be difficult. We face many problems. And it will take time. And it will take some self-discipline for all of us to do our part in moderation and in contributing individually to the solution.

On the other hand, the Federal Reserve has enormous resources to call upon to carry out its programs. In the first place, it has in the family of the Federal Reserve dedicated and competent men and women who are devoted to professionalism. It has an able Board of Governors. It has men of high quality as Presidents of the Reserve banks. And those human resources are very important.

The Federal Reserve also has the resource of adaptability. It's shown itself to be a living institution that can change and can respond and can innovate, and that will be a strength.

It also operates in an American system that has shown itself to have the strength of flexibility. In the last 10 years, we've been impacted by many substantial and adverse forces that have had great consequences in our economy of the United States and the world economies. And yet, how remarkably our system has responded and shown its resilience and capacity to absorb and to self-correct, and it's on that process now.

We also have the strength of national leadership which, represented by President Carter, is taking on the responsibility to reestablish the confidence of the American public in their public institutions.

And finally, we have the greatest resource of all, the boundless resource of the American people.

Americans are basically optimistic, and they have a right to be. It's justified by their past accomplishments.

For many years now, we've had a certain amount of self-examination about that optimism. And it seems to me the time is here where that's coming out into a recognition of self-confidence. And as we individually gain our self-confidence, I'm sure that collectively, as each of us plays our role, the cumulative effect will be to establish, reestablish the direction and vitality and the strength of this Nation.

And Mr. President, with those resources, the Federal Reserve should be able to make a contribution. And to the best of my energies and talent, I'll try to play my part.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:35 p.m. in the East Room at the White House.

17th Anniversary of the Peace Corps

Statement by the President. March 8, 1978

Seventeen years ago this month, President Kennedy signed the Executive order that created the Peace Corps. Since then, tens of thousands of volunteers have worked in the developing world, serving their host countries and serving this Nation as well.

Thirteen years ago, the first VISTA volunteers began their work in the poorest and most isolated communities in our Nation.

The spirit of Peace Corps and VISTA springs from the deepest wells in our culture, from the reasoned and strongly felt impulses of our people to share with their neighbors their caring and their labor.

Peace Corps and VISTA and the thousands of other voluntary associations in this country are our greatest human resource in the effort to provide for the human needs of our neighbors on this Earth.

These associations of volunteers, including the Peace Corps and VISTA, represent our best offering to communities across the Nation and around the world.

I ask the American people to join me in commemoration of the thousands of our citizens of all ages who have served in these and similar programs, and call upon you to support the voluntary efforts which are so important both to our own Nation and the rest of the world.

United States Metric Board

Nomination of Andrew H. Kenopensky and Dennis R. Smith To Be Members. March 9, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Andrew H. Kenopensky and Dennis R. Smith to be members of the United States Metric Board.

Kenopensky, 43, of Union, N.J., will be nominated for a 6-year term. He is national automotive coordinator for the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers and has served in a number of positions in that union. Kenopensky has a B.S. degree in labor-management and a masters degree in education.

Smith, 31, of Middleboro, Mass., will be nominated for a 2-year term. He is a mathematics teacher for grades 7 and 8 in Middleboro and metric coordinator for grades K through 12 of Middleboro Public Schools. He is an instructor in adult education (metric) for the Massachusetts Department of Education.

Visit of President Tito of Yugoslavia

Joint Statement. March 9, 1978

At the invitation of the President of the United States, Jimmy Carter, the President of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Josip Broz Tito, paid a State Visit to the United States of America, March 7-9, 1978.

In the talks, on the Yugoslav side, participated:

Josip Broz Tito, President of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

Sergej Kraigher, President of the Presidency of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia

Milos Minic, Vice President of the Federal Executive Council and Federal Secretary for Foreign Affairs

Josip Vrhovec, Member of the Council of the Presidency of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

Dimce Belovski, Ambassador of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to the United States of America

Branko Pavicevic, President of the Academy of Arts and Sciences of the Socialist Republic of Montenegro and others

On the American side:

Jimmy Carter, President of the United States of America

Walter F. Mondale, Vice President of the United States of America

Cyrus R. Vance, Secretary of State of the United States of America

Harold Brown, Secretary of Defense of the United States of America

Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs

Lawrence S. Eagleburger, Ambassador of the United States of America to the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia
and others

During the visit, President Tito met with members of the House of Representatives and Senate. The talks reflected a high degree of interest in the legislative bodies of both countries to promote understanding and contacts between the peoples of Yugoslavia and the United States, including a broadened exchange of political leaders. President Tito also met with other distinguished Americans.

The two Presidents held extensive and useful talks in a spirit of mutual regard, candor, and friendship. They agreed that the significant improvement in bilateral relations over the past year, marked by a series of personal messages between them as well as by high-level visits and consultations, should be continued and deepened, building upon the basis of mutual respect which the United States and the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia hold for each other as equal, independent, and sovereign states. They confirmed that the principles contained in previous joint statements (Washington, October 1971 and Belgrade, August 1975) have been tested in practice and that they, together with the present statement, constitute the basis for developing relations between the two countries. The two Presidents considered this meeting a major step in reinforcing the already strong foundations of US-Yugoslav relations. The views of the two sides reflected wide areas of agreement on the issues discussed.

The two Presidents, noting the deep historical and cultural ties between their peoples, agreed that Americans of Yugo-slav descent have played a major role in strengthening the bonds of friendship and understanding between their past and present homelands.

The two Presidents noted with satisfaction that economic exchanges between their two countries have developed positively, but agreed that there was potential for substantial additional interchange. While approving the balanced nature of trade between the two countries, they emphasized the need for further efforts to expand its volume, to strengthen industrial cooperation, to promote travel and tourism, to encourage joint ventures and to improve opportunities for business representatives to work in both countries. The two Presidents expressed their appreciation for the contribution of the United States-Yugoslav Economic Council to the development of economic relations and welcomed the establishment of joint economic/commercial working groups which will serve to facilitate increased trade and economic cooperation.

The two sides confirmed their mutual interest in the free flow of information and people between their two societies and endorsed both governmental and non-governmental cultural and information exchange programs which further this goal. In addition the two Presidents agreed that greater understanding by the general public of each society's culture and social development would be beneficial. They affirmed the importance of scientific and technological cooperation as well as exchanges in the field of social and physical sciences, education, culture, and information and pledged to develop them further.

Presidents Carter and Tito examined major international issues. They devoted special attention to questions of peace and security in the world and to the promotion of international cooperation. They affirmed the necessity of extending the policy of the reduction of tensions to all regions of the world and all areas of international relations and of ensuring an opportunity for all countries to contribute to the resolution of current world problems and to the strengthening of peace and security. They underlined in particular that all countries should seek to resolve disputes by peaceful means and should deal with each other on the basis of equality.

They also affirmed that the right of all states to determine their own social systems without outside interference must be respected and that relations among states, regardless of differences or similarities in their social, political, and economic systems, must be based on the spirit and principles of the United Nations Charter.

Presidents Carter and Tito agreed that nonalignment is a very significant factor in world affairs. They share the view that the nonaligned countries can and should make an active contribution to the resolution of international problems and to the more favorable evolution of international relations. President Carter reaffirmed the respect of the United States for Yugoslavia's commitment to nonalignment and for the role Yugoslavia plays in that movement.

President Tito welcomed the steps taken by the United States Government over the past year on a number of long-standing issues of concern to the non-aligned. In this connection President Carter thanked President Tito for this warm message of support for the treaties which the United States has negotiated with the Republic of Panama concerning the future status of the Panama Canal. President Tito reaffirmed his view that the treaties would serve the interest of peace and stability in the region and throughout the world.

The two Presidents reviewed recent developments and pledged renewed efforts to lower the barriers to understanding and contact between all peoples of Europe, in accordance with their common aspirations. In this regard, they discussed the results of the Belgrade Conference and agreed that it has significantly strengthened the foundations for the continuation of multilateral efforts to increase security and cooperation in Europe. They reaffirmed their commitment to the success of the CSCE process and to full implementation of all sections of the Final Act. They urged all signatory states to join in efforts to achieve full implementation in order to further the process of consultation and contact between the participating countries and to promote mutual understanding. They pledged continued efforts toward these goals in the period leading to the next Conference in Madrid in 1980.

Presidents Tito and Carter expressed their special concern about the situation in the Middle East which remains a source of great tension in international affairs. They agreed on the urgent need to find a comprehensive, just and lasting solution to the problems of the Middle East and explained in detail their respective views on the current situation.

The two Presidents also agreed that the Ethiopia-Somalia conflict should be resolved by peaceful means, taking account of the need to respect both territorial integrity and the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of both countries, and in conformity with the principles of the Charter of the Organization of African Unity and the Charter of the United Nations. They expressed their belief that the international community should exert greater efforts for securing conditions to maintain the territorial integrity, independence and nonaligned position of these two countries.

In their discussion of developments in Southern Africa, the two Presidents expressed support for the legitimate aspirations of the African peoples to self-determination and majority rule. They condemned racism in all forms.

The two Presidents discussed a variety of aspects of human rights in the contemporary world and agreed that efforts toward the implementation of human rights in all countries should be in accord with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Helsinki Final Act.

Presidents Carter and Tito reviewed the international economic situation with particular attention. While approaching global economic problems from different perspectives, they recognized their gravity and stressed the need for necessary changes in world economic relations which take into account the interests and equality of all countries. They noted in particular the importance of increased support for accelerated economic development for the developing countries and a broader linkage between the economies of the industrialized and developing countries. They emphasized the significance of the global economic dialogue as a vital element in fostering cooperation between the industrialized and developing countries, which is an indispensable precondition for the settlement of existing economic problems.

The two Presidents voiced their deep concern over the continuation of the arms race, which renders difficult the solution of substantial political, economic, and other problems besetting mankind today. Both governments believe that durable peace in the world as a whole can only be assured if effective measures are undertaken to halt the arms race and to take concrete steps for nuclear disarmament toward the ultimate goal of general and complete disarmament. In this connection, the two Presidents underscored the importance of the negotiations on strategic arms limitations, mutual and balanced force reductions in Central Europe and of other efforts to limit the arms race. They also stressed the importance of the forthcoming special session of the General Assembly of the United Nations devoted to disarmament.

The two Presidents emphasized the decisive importance of the development of energy for the economic growth of all countries, and of the developing countries in particular, and they believe therefore that nuclear energy for peaceful purposes should be made accessible to all countries without discrimination. The two Presidents also pointed to the danger of the proliferation of nuclear weapons and agreed that this danger can be diminished through an effective reduction of existing nuclear armaments and through the development and application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes and the implementation of measures in accordance with the provisions and objectives of the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and other international agreements within the framework of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

The two Presidents observed that terrorism is a common scourge of the international community, and they agreed that effective measures must be taken to eliminate this senseless threat to people throughout the world. President Carter specifically condemned the violence directed against Yugoslavia by terrorists in the United States and pledged his government's commitment to take firm measures to prevent and to prosecute such criminal activity which is against the interests of the United States and of good United States-Yugoslav relations.

President Carter reiterated the continuing support of the United States for the independence, territorial integrity and unity of Yugoslavia. During the talks it was stressed that good relations and cooperation between the United States and Yugoslavia constitute an essential element of American foreign policy and that the United States is interested in a strong and independent Yugoslavia as a factor for balance, peace and stability in Europe and in the world.

President Tito extended an invitation to President Carter to pay an official visit to Yugoslavia. The invitation was accepted with pleasure.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

Letter Directing the Attorney General To Seek a Court Injunction Against Further Strike Activities. March 9, 1978

To Attorney General Griffin Bell

On March 6, 1978, by virtue of authority vested in me by Section 206 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (29 U.S.C. 176), I issued Executive Order 12042. This Order created a Board of Inquiry to inquire into the issues involved in a labor-management dispute in the bituminous coal industry which has halted the production of bituminous coal in almost every major coal producing state east of the Mississippi River.

On March 9, 1978, I received the Board's written report in this matter, which indicates that there is little chance of a prompt settlement of this dispute. A copy of this report is attached. I have also directed that a copy be filed with the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and be made available to the public.

In my opinion this unresolved labor dispute has resulted in a strike affecting a substantial part of the bituminous coal industry of the United States. As a result of dwindling coal stocks in the affected region, electricity curtailments are in effect, the production of materials and parts essential to manufacturing industries has decreased, and unemployment has increased and threatens to increase drastically if the coal strike is allowed to continue. This strike, if permitted to continue, will imperil the national health and safety.

Therefore, in order to remove this peril and to secure the resumption of bituminous coal production, I direct you at this time, pursuant to the provisions of Section 208 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (29 U.S.C. 178), to petition in the name of the United States in any District Court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties to enjoin the continuance of such strike in the bituminous coal industry and for such other relief as may in your judgment be necessary or appropriate.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

[The Honorable Griffin B. Bell, The Attorney General, Washington, D.C. 20530]

NOTE: The White House press release also included the text of the Board of Inquiry's report to the President.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF MARCH 9, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Good afternoon. I have two brief statements to make before I answer questions.

THE COAL STRIKE

Three days ago, I appointed a Board of Inquiry whose purpose under the Taft-Hartley Act was to investigate the negotiating stalemate, and we know that this has closed our Nation's coal mines.

This morning, the Board presented its report to me. Its finding was that an impasse does exist and that the situation is serious. This morning, using the authority of the Taft-Hartley Act, I directed the Attorney General to seek this afternoon a court injunction which will order the miners to return to work and the operators to open the mines during the 80-day cooling off period, during which time negotiations will proceed.

The welfare of our Nation requires this difficult step, and I expect that all parties will obey the law. The Federal Government will use its resources to minimize the national economic and social dislocations caused by this labor dispute.

The Department of Energy and the State Governors will improve the distribution of energy resources by moving our supplies of coal to places where the need is most urgent. The relief agencies of the Federal Government are prepared, if necessary, to act in a coordinated fashion to assist local areas which are particularly hard hit.

This is a time for cooling off. We will do everything in our power to be sure that it does not become a time of confrontation. The law must be enforced.

I have met this afternoon with the Attorney General and have asked him to assume personal direction of Federal law enforcement activities in this area.

The Secretary of Labor just informed me that he has asked the Board of Inquiry, as an extension of their duties, to go into the coal mining areas and consult with the miners, to encourage compliance with the law and to return to the negotiating area.

There is no easy solution to this problem. What is required from all of us now is reason, patience, and a willingness to cooperate with one another and to obey the laws of the United States.

I'm confident that with the support of the miners and the coal owners, the mine operators, and the American people, and all public officials, that we can resolve this dispute without further damage to the well-being of our Nation.

SOMALI-ETHIOPIAN CONFLICT

I have another statement to make. Last night, I was informed by President Siad Barre of Somalia that he was agreeing to withdraw his forces from the Ogaden area, the occupied areas of Ethiopia, and just the last few minutes, he confirmed this commitment to me with a public statement.

I welcome President Siad Barre's announcement of this decision. The United States hopes that this decision will result in an immediate halt of the bloodshed in that area of the Horn of Africa. We hope that the Organization of African Unity can move quickly to assist all parties to terminate hostilities, to agree quickly on rules that can be observed so that Somali forces can retire rapidly into their own territory and to ensure that peaceful conditions are restored among the civilian population.

As soon as Somali forces have withdrawn completely, and as soon as Ethiopian forces have reestablished control over their own territory, withdrawal of the Soviet and Cuban combat presence should begin.

The United States looks forward to the complete withdrawal of all foreign forces from the two countries, Ethiopia and Somalia, at an early date. We stand ready to assist the Organization of African Unity in working out the basis for negotiations between Ethiopia and Somalia which would ensure the territorial integrity of all countries in the region and the honoring of international boundaries.

QUESTIONS

U.S. ASSISTANCE TO SOMALIA

Q. Mr. President, does that Somalia announcement cause you to look any more favorably on Somali requests for American arms, assuming they go through with it?

THE PRESIDENT. We notified Somalia many months ago that as long as they were in occupied territory, that there would be no consideration on our part for defensive arms of any kind. I think it would require a tangible demonstration of the carrying out of this commitment on the part of the Somalians, and also a renewed commitment not to dishonor the international boundaries of either Ethiopia or Kenya, before we would be willing to discuss with them economic aid or defensive arms supplies.

In this case, working with the Organization of African Unity and the Congress, we would consider this in a routine manner, but not until.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, there seem to be conflicting signals on what you would do if miners do not return to work. Would you consider seeking legislation to seize the mines, or do you have any other alternatives?

THE PRESIDENT. My firm belief and my firm commitment is that the Taft-Hartley Act will be enforced, that this will be adequate to assure supplies of coal to our country to avoid an additional crisis, and that it will also be an adequate incentive to bring the bargaining parties back to the negotiating table for successful resolution.

I have absolutely no plans to seek congressional action authorizing seizure of the coal mines.

U.N. RESOLUTION 242

Q. Mr. President, on the Middle East, the State Department today reaffirmed that U.N. Security Council Resolution 242 remains, in our view, the bedrock of our effort to bring peace to that area and more or less served notice on the Israeli Government not to take any decision to renounce that. Could you state for us what your understanding or your interpretation of Security Council Resolution 242 is and what your understanding of the Israeli position on this is?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, United Nations Resolution 242 was passed about 10 years ago. Since then it has been endorsed with practically no equivocation by our own country, by the entire international community, by the Israeli Governments, and by the Arab countries who border on Israel. It calls for the withdrawal of Israel from territories occupied in the 1967 war. It calls for the restoration of security of Israel behind recognized and defensible borders. And this has been the basis on which all of our efforts since I've been in office, and also my predecessors' efforts, have been based.

For any nation now to reject the application of 242 to the occupied territories, including the West Bank, the Sinai, the Golan Heights, would be a very serious blow to the prospects of peace in the Middle East.

In addition to the principles that I've just described to you, we've also been working with complete commitment and with some substantial success, particularly in the case of Egypt, to ensure that Israel will not only be blessed with a cessation of hostilities but also with a full restoration of peace, open borders, diplomatic relations, free trade, exchange of tourism and students, and cultural exchanges. This is a prospect that we still have. But the abandonment of United Nations Resolution 242 as it applies to the West Bank and other occupied territories would be a very serious blow to the prospects of peace and a complete reversal of the policy of the Israeli Government and other governments in the area.

LIAISON WITH JEWISH AMERICANS

Q. Mr. President, have you given thought to abolishing the job of liaison with the Jewish community—the task of the job?

THE PRESIDENT. No. We have many members of our administration who work directly with Jewish Americans who are interested particularly in the Middle East and other similar matters of interest to other groups in our country.

I meet frequently with groups of Jewish Americans who come to the White House. So does the Vice President, the Secretary of State does at the State Department, Dr. Brzezinski, Hamilton Jordan, Stu Eizenstat, and so has Mark Siegel.

So, we have a concerted effort to present our views and to receive the views of those interested parties. And I think one of the most crucial elements of a successful achievement of peace in the Middle East is to continue those consultations, and we will of course do that.

Q. But isn't it discriminatory at all—isn't it discriminatory? I understand there are some 2 million Arabs in this country. Do you give this kind of consideration to them?

THE PRESIDENT. I have also met, I should have said, with Arab leaders from all over the country on the same subject.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, you have spoken many times of the commitment that the United States has for the security of Israel. In 1975, in September, the Sinai II agreement said specifically that the United States would promise to give advanced aircraft, such as the F-16, at an unspecified time and number, to Israel.

Now, why is that promise of the United States now made part of a package deal? In other words, why is it tied to approval for aircraft to other countries, Egypt and Saudi Arabia?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we are honoring completely the commitments made to Israel in the fall of 1975 concerning an adherence on our part to the adequate defense capabilities of Israel, including advanced aircraft like the F-15 and the F-16.

Some orders of this kind have already been placed, accepted, and deliveries are in prospect. Some planes have already been delivered. And the proposal that I've made to Congress on the arms sales package is compatible with that commitment.

In the fall of 1975, commitments were also made to the Saudi Arabians, to provide them with advanced aircraft, to replace their present Lightning planes which are becoming obsolete.

Later, in the Ford administration in 1976, in the fall, a commitment was made to them to send Defense Department officials to Saudi Arabia, to give them some assessment of the characteristics of the F-15's and F-16's, with a commitment then made that they would have their choice between the 16's and the 15's.

When Crown Prince Fahd came to our country last spring, I repeated this commitment, that had been made by my own predecessors in the White House, and so the sale of F-15's to Saudi Arabia is consistent with the commitment also made in the fall of 1975 and repeatedly reaffirmed.

The sale of the F-5E's—a much less capable airplane, by the way—to the Egyptians is, I think, a very legitimate proposal, because Egyptians in effect have severed their supply of weapons that used to come from the Soviet Union and have cast their lot with us, which is a very favorable development in the Middle East, one of the most profound developments of all.

I have no apology at all to make for this proposal. It maintains the military balance that exists in the Middle East. I can say without any doubt that the superior capabilities of the Israeli Air Force, compared to their neighbors, is maintained, and at the same time, it reconfirms our own relationship with the moderate Arab leaders and nations for the future to ensure that peace can be and will be maintained in the Middle East.

EGYPTIAN-ISRAELI RELATIONS

Q. Mr. Carter, on the same subject, we've seen reports in recent days from the Middle East, from both Cairo and Jerusalem, that in effect President Sadat's initiative has come to an end, that it has come aground. We also see reports from Jerusalem that ministers in the Israeli Government have decided that there is no deal to be made at this time. Could you give us your assessment of where this stands and where you think it's going to go?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as is the case in the White House and in the Congress, and in the United States, there is a difference in Israel, a very heated debate in prospect and already in progress about what should be done to bring about peace in the Middle East. There are, obviously, differences also between nations, between Egypt and Israel, between Israel and their other neighbors.

So, I would say that in comparison to the situation a year ago, the prospects for comprehensive peace in the Middle East are quite good. We would hope that there could be an immediate resolution of all the differences. That's not immediately in prospect.

Prime Minister Begin will be coming to visit with me this coming week. I know him very well. I've met with him twice before. He is a very strong advocate, a very dedicated advocate of the position of the Israeli Government. He's a forceful and outspoken person. And I'm sure after our meeting, we will at least understand each other better.

I hope we can move another step toward peace. I had an equivalent opportunity this year to meet and to have long discussions with President Sadat.

So, I would say that there's been a great deal of progress made. Just looking at the changes from the viewpoint of the Israelis, we have now the major Arab nation who has recognized Israel's right to exist, right to exist in peace, right to exist permanently, has offered the full definition of peace which I described earlier. They have been meeting directly and personally, Begin and Sadat and their representatives, which was not in prospect at all a year ago.

There are still differences between them—relatively minor differences in the Sinai, more major, strategic kinds of differences involving the Palestinian question and the implementation of U.N. 242. So we've got a long way to go.

It's a difficult question that's been one of the most challenging, I guess, in the last 30 years for the world, to bring about peace in the Middle East. But I'm not discouraged about it. We're going to stick with it. And even though it takes a lot of time and much abuse and much debate and many differences expressed by all public officials, I intend to stay with it. And I believe the American people are deeply committed to two things: One is the security of Israel under any circumstances, and secondly, the achievement of comprehensive peace.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, do you agree with the position of the coal operators as stated in the latest contract on both the issues of the right to strike and pension benefits? And can you explain why or why not?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I would rather not single out any particular aspect of the contract for my approbation or rejection. There are issues of that kind that have been in deep contention. The coal operators want to eliminate the possibility of wildcat strikes and to increase production. The coal miners want the security of their retirement funds, and they want to have continuation of health benefits without contributing to the fund out of their salaries. Those have been the major items in contention. And I don't want to comment on the degree of my approval of them.

One item on which there has been general and early agreement is the wage package, and this, I think, would be a basis for a resolution of the differences. But I don't want to comment as a President on my approval or disapproval of individual items.

Q. One followup: Do you think the miners should have gone along with the contract as it was last submitted?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I was hoping that they would. As you know, there have been two contracts negotiated between the mine leaders and the coal operators. One was rejected by the bargaining council. The other contract was approved by the bargaining council—39 members, ostensibly representing all the miners throughout the country—and rejected by the membership.

But I was hoping that those contracts would be accepted. I've never gotten involved in saying that a particular provision should be in or out of the contract, but one that's freely negotiated. I was obviously hoping that it would be approved.

U.S.-ISRAELI RELATIONS

Q. Mr. President, Mark Siegel, one of your aides, quit today, and you accepted his resignation with regret. He cited as his reason, differences with your Middle East policy.

His resignation, to many, symbolizes the split in the American Jewish community over the internal debate that's going on over our Middle East policy. And with Begin coming, I wonder if you could tell us what differences there are between the two of us, what your position will be on these differences, and a comment on the report that you're going to pressure him to make significant concessions?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't have any intention to pressure Prime Minister Begin. I don't have any desire to do it and couldn't if I wanted to. He's a very strong and independent person representing a strong and independent nation. Our role has been that of an intermediary. And one of the most pleasant respites that I have had since I've been in office was the brief time when Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat were negotiating directly and I was out of the role of carrying messages back and forth.

This is, however, a situation that has now deteriorated to some degree since President Sadat went to Jerusalem. Both the military and the political talks are now interrupted—we hope temporarily.

One of the things I will be doing is to repeat to Prime Minister Begin personally the request and the negotiating positions of President Sadat. And we've tried to do this through our ambassadors and through our negotiator, Mr. Atherton,<sup>1</sup> in the Mideast, and I think perhaps I can do it perhaps a little more effectively.

But the differences that exist between them are well known. In the Sinai, as I said, they are relatively easy to resolve—the Jewish settlements, the placement of Egyptian forces in the Sinai, and some continuation of Israeli control over some airfields or aerodromes, and the rapidity with which Israel would withdraw from the Sinai itself.

In the West Bank, Gaza Strip, this involves implementation of U.N. Resolution 242 and some resolution of the Palestinian question. We do not and never have favored an independent Palestinian nation, but within that bound of constraint, how to give the Palestinians who live in the West Bank, Gaza Strip some voice in the determination of their own future, is an issue still unresolved.

That outlines very briefly the situation that we're presently in.

TAX REDUCTION

Q. Mr. President, in the past, you have indicated an interest to make taxes in the upper brackets more equitable. Yet in your present tax message, there is nothing to have a limit of 50 percent on all taxable income, including dividends and interest as well as earned income at the present. Is there still hope that this is going to be done?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, there will be an alleviation of the tax burden on almost every American under the tax proposal that we put forward to the Congress.

Within the constraints of a $25 billion net reduction, you can't make this an all-inclusive proposal. I would say that most of the reductions are not at the $200,000 or $250,000 or higher level. Most of the reductions are in the low- and middle-income family tax payments.

I think, though, that in general, the proposal provides greater equity. It eliminates some of the unwarranted tax privileges that have existed too long. And of course, the net effect of it is the substantial reduction in both personal and corporate taxes.

But the higher income families that you've described, above $100,000 income, would not be benefited on a percentage basis nearly so much as the middle- and lower-income families.

RHODESIA

Q. Mr. President, in view of the great amount of discussion that's going on now about internal Rhodesian settlement, which excludes the Patriotic Front, is it possible in your view to have a settlement of the Rhodesian crisis without including Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Mugabe?

THE PRESIDENT. I would doubt that we could have a permanent settlement without including the right for all the nationalist leaders to participate. That would include Mugabe, Sithole, and would also, of course, include Nkomo as well. Muzorewa, the other leader, was here yesterday and met with Secretary Vance. We have had a meeting, yesterday afternoon, between myself, Secretary Vance, and the Foreign Minister of Great Britain, David Owen. And we reconfirmed our position, which has been consistent, that the Anglo-American plan is the best basis for a permanent resolution of the Rhodesian or Zimbabwe question. It's one that is substantially supported by the frontline presidents, presidents of those nations surrounding Rhodesia. And it has not been accepted completely by Nkomo and Mugabe, the Freedom Force leaders outside of Rhodesia.

We hope now that we can have a conference of all the interested nationalist leaders to try to work out the disparity between the internal settlement proposal, which is not adequate, and the so-called Anglo-American plan, which we believe to be adequate.

We've not rejected the individual component parts of the so-called internal settlement plan. To the extent that they are consistent with the overall Anglo-American plan provisions, they are a step in the right direction. But I think that it must be that any permanent settlement would include the right of all the interested nationalist leaders to seek the leadership of Rhodesia.

THE COAL STRIKE

Q. Mr. President, what are your plans if the coal miners refuse to obey Taft-Hartley and return to work? What do you do then?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the injunction, if it is granted—and the hearing for a temporary restraining order in commencing now, about 3:30—it's a far-reaching injunction. It prevents the interference of any law violators with those who want to go back to work. It prevents a picketing against those who are complying with the law and mining coal. It requires the coal mineowners and the mineworkers to recommence negotiation efforts. It prevents the interference with the transportation of coal in any form, and it provides a legal mechanism by which the Federal law enforcement officials and the State and local law enforcement officials can provide for the protection of lives and property.

I believe the coal miners to be law-abiding and patriotic citizens. And I believe that a substantial portion of them, an adequate proportion of them, will comply with the law. We also have modified the historic provisions of the Taft-Hartley law by encouraging the operators and the mineworkers to negotiate during this period regional settlements based on the wage package which was in general agreement from the very beginning weeks of the negotiations themselves. So, I believe that the law will be obeyed.

I might say one other thing. We've got about, I think, 82 percent of the mine-workers who are not now working. We are still producing about 50 percent as much coal, and the reserve supplies of coal are down below, December 5, only about 45 percent. So, I believe that if we can get a moderate number—hopefully all, but a moderate number—of coal miners to go back to work, that we can prevent a crisis evolving in our country.

The distribution of existing energy supplies—electricity, oil, natural gas, and coal—will also help to alleviate the problem. The injunction has broad coverage, and I think the sum total of all I've described will be adequate.

MARK SIEGEL

Q. Mr. President, to come back to the Dr. Siegel resignation, Dr. Siegel, as I understand it, resigned for two reasons: One, he was being asked to defend administration policy in the Middle East, and two, he was unable to affect that decisionmaking process within the White House.

Does his resignation cause you to have any doubts about his not being able to have played a more prominent role in forming that policy? And two, does it cause you to wonder about the entire decisionmaking process in the Middle East within the White House and its future implications?

THE PRESIDENT. The answer to both your questions is no. Mark Siegel is a fine young man and an excellent employee, and he's done his job well in the White House, dealing with one of the most difficult issues that I've had to face as President, an issue on which there is sharp disagreement in the White House, sometimes disagreements between myself and the Secretary of State or myself and the Secretary of Defense or myself and the national security adviser, myself and my own staff.

But we resolve those differences as best we can harmoniously. When there is continued disharmony, I make the final decision about the administration policy. But this is an issue that's almost inherently a subject for dispute and disagreement.

As I pointed out earlier, there is a sharp public dispute in the Israeli Cabinet itself, not limited to a difference between parties in Israel. And obviously there are sharp disputes between Israel and her neighbors. But I think that we are now addressing these difficult but crucial issues which are easier, politically speaking, to leave alone in a proper fashion.

We're not trying to impose our will on anyone. But I have to say that within the White House, when there is a continuing disagreement, that I make the final decision. That's what I was elected to do.

I think that Mark Siegel has had a strong input in his conversations and negotiating sessions with the Vice President, with Hamilton Jordan, with Dr. Brzezinski, and on occasion with me—not very often directly with me. But he has a perfect right to decide whether or not he prefers to continue performing that service. To explain the administration positions to very interested American Jewish groups has been a difficult task for me as well as him. And I honor his right to make that decision.

I don't think that we have a breakdown in communications and consultations within the White House. And after constant reconsideration, I believe that our policy on the Middle East is the proper one.

NATURAL GAS DEREGULATION

Q. Mr. President, are you willing to accept energy legislation that in a few years would lead to the deregulation of natural gas?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I am. This was a campaign statement and commitment of mine that I thought natural gas should be deregulated. In my speech to the Congress last April 20, I repeated this hope, and I think that a long, phased-in deregulation process without any shocks to our national economy would be acceptable.

DAVID MARSTON

Q. Mr. President, it now appears that there were some significant deletions in the Justice Department affidavits on the Marston case, bearing upon his competence and upon the nature of politics in Pennsylvania. And this has led to new charges of a coverup by some people high up in the Justice Department, or at the very least, some incompetence on the part of Justice Department people.

What is your assessment of how your Justice Department has handled this? If I may ask my followup before I sit down, are you irritated by the delay in naming Marston's successor?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the answer to your last question is no. You know, because of the high degree of attention focused on this particular appointment, the almost natural delay has been a matter of some interest. But it takes a long time to screen many applicants to make sure that we satisfy the desires of the judges in that area, of the responsible lawyers in that area, and that we satisfy ourselves that there's an adequate FBI check of their background, that their financial status is good, that there's nothing that can be brought up later on that would be embarrassing to the appointee when a thorough discussion or investigation is made. It's a time-consuming process.

I'm not dissatisfied. We are moving as rapidly as we can on that. I didn't know anything about the information presented to the congressional committees. I think in retrospect it would have been better to go ahead and include the statement of the FBI agent.

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMY; INFLATION

Q. Mr. President, can you tell us why you think the dollar is declining abroad? What are you going to do about it, and do you think it's time for more tougher measures to curb inflation here in the United States?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, this is a matter with international implications. I had a long talk this morning on the phone with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. This was one of the subjects that we did discuss. And German and American officials will be meeting this weekend to try to have a common approach to eliminating, or certainly reducing the disorderly marketing of the currencies of the world.

We have had a policy of intervening in the monetary markets only when disorder did occur, when there were fluctuations that were not warranted or that caused us some concern. I think recently the value of the dollar has been fairly well stable—with the deutsche mark, at about 2.02.

One of the things that has been pointed out to me is that the factors that caused a lowering of the dollar's value, compared to some of the stronger currencies—Swiss francs, Japanese yen, German deutsche marks—in this past year are being alleviated.

Higher interest rates in our country now, caused by various factors, now make investments in the United States more attractive than they were last year. We had a high increase in 1977 in the amount of oil imported. My guess is that this year, we will not have that increase in imported oil.

Last year, we had a much higher increase in our gross national product, a much more vigorous economy that made it possible for us to buy foreign goods better than foreigners could buy our goods.

I think the difference was about a 3-percent rate of growth. Because of the more vigorous economies in some of our foreign trading partners' countries this year, that difference is certainly likely to narrow.

Chancellor Schmidt told me that the last quarter in 1977 in Germany the GNP growth was 6 percent. This was higher than he had anticipated, and he didn't think that it was going to be maintained constantly, but he was pleased with that.

So, I think those factors all point to the very good strength of the dollar and, on a long-term basis, it being fairly well priced, compared to foreign currencies.

But any shocks to the market, any disorderly marketing will require us to intercede, and I will do so.

FRANK CORMIER [Associated Press].
Thank you, Mr. President.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978

*Remarks at the Bill Signing Ceremony.
March 10, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. During the 1976 Presidential campaign, one of the major issues that came up throughout the Nation was the subject of nonproliferation.

I think as recently as that, the world had a general impression that it was too late to control the proliferation of nuclear explosives among countries that don't presently have that capability, and at the same time ensure the proper and adequate use of atomic fuels for the production of power and for other peaceful uses.

Last April, I presented a message to Congress, who had long been working on nonproliferation legislation. And I'm very grateful today at the fine work that has been done in the House by Chairman Zablocki and by Congressman Bingham, Findley, and others, and in the Senate by Senator Ribicoff, Percy, and Senator Glenn.

This legislation takes a major step forward in clarifying our own Nation's policy. I think it would be a much more predictable factor in the decisions made by foreign nations. It will give guidance to me, to the Congress, to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and to the Department of Energy and other agencies in our Federal Government who deal with this very sensitive subject.

We've now helped to organize, with the assistance of our European allies, an International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation study. Forty nations have already joined in this study to inventory existing nuclear fuels in the form of ore, both uranium, thorium, and others, to assess the quality and capability of enrichment facilities and to deal with the proper distribution of nuclear fuels to those that don't have supplies in their own country—with international safeguards and constraints being adequate; and at the same time, to deal with the unsolved question of the disposition of spent nuclear fuels.

This is one of the most complicated questions that presents itself to the international community. I think it is accurate to say that some of our friends abroad will have to readjust their policy.

I've discussed them thoroughly with the heads of state who have been here to visit with me and whom I've gotten to know. And I think they will see the wisdom of the action that the Senate and the House have taken in this legislation.

I feel very strongly that we should continue to use, in an increasing way, atomic power in our country as a major element of energy production. Our light water nuclear plants, using enriched uranium, are adequate for the time being.

We have a very heavy research and development program going on for future production, including the liquid metal fast breeder reactors. We do not need to waste our money at this time in production models of the breeder reactor. We have one already in existence, a relatively inexpensive program using thorium.

But I believe that the Congress has taken a major step forward. And I am very grateful this morning to sign the legislation which would put into effect a clarified and an adequate American policy on the use and provision of atomic fuels to ourselves and to other countries and, at the same time, rigid constraints which would prevent the acquisition of explosive capability by nations that are not presently part of the nuclear explosive club.

So, thank you very much, all of you who helped so much in this legislation. And now I would like to sign this very important bill.

[At this point, the President signed the bill.]

Thank you very much.

Chuck, would you like to say a word?

I remember that in 1976, when I spent the night with John Glenn and his wife, this was one of the subjects that we discussed, the hope that some day we could have a nonproliferation bill passed. The first conversation I ever had with Senator Ribicoff was when he called me on the telephone to congratulate me on a speech I made at San Diego about the same subject.

John, perhaps you would like to say a word?

SENATOR GLENN. I just think this is a day that all of us have looked forward to. Some of us in the Congress have been working on this for quite some time. I know when President Carter, during the campaign, made his statements on this, I was wholeheartedly behind what he was proposing at that time.

I'm just glad to have been part of getting it through. It's a great day for all of us.

THE PRESIDENT. It is.

Clem.

REPRESENTATIVE ZABLOCKI. Mr. President, it is gratifying to see legislation for which we labored long has become a law. It is an indication that the executive branch and the legislative branch can work together. We had great concentration on this legislation with your office.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

Chuck Percy.

SENATOR PERCY. Mr. President, this is a bipartisan effort, obviously. I think this day marks the moment when the nuclear nonproliferators take over against the nuclear salesmen. But also I think it's an assurance to the world that, given proper safeguards, we will be a reliable supplier. But we insist upon safety of humanity in taking first precedence, I think, over the sale of nuclear materials.

We thank you for your immense cooperation ever since the outset of your administration and, I might say, in the course of your campaign, which helped also.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

This has been one of the major projects of Jonathan Bingham as well.

REPRESENTATIVE BINGHAM. Thank you, Mr. President.

We are very proud of your leadership in this, Mr. President, and it has been a privilege to work with you and your associates in this matter. I would just like to say that I think the enactment into law of this legislation represents the beginning, in a way, of a task which will stretch ahead, because it is a difficult problem for you and the rest of us to exercise leadership in the rest of the world.

We hope this legislation will be a foundation for a better course to come. But it is a beginning rather than an ending, I think.

THE PRESIDENT. It goes in very well with the SALT negotiations, the comprehensive test ban, and also the legislation that I will send up, hopefully, next week, concerning the expedition of licensing for atomic powerplants in our country.

Would anyone else like to say a word? Mr. Chairman?

SENATOR SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I simply say that I endorse everything that's been said by you—[laughter]—and by these gentlemen.

I think it is a great day, and I thank you for it.

THE PRESIDENT. Anyone else? I want to thank all of you. This is a project that had been very dear to the hearts of many Members of the House and Senate long before the election took place.

But I was surprised at the intense interest among the American people in the questions-and-answer periods, and in the debates during the campaign itself.

I might hasten to say that in November of 1976—or October, I believe, President Ford also endorsed the principles set out in this bill. So, it was indeed a bipartisan effort.

Thank you all again for your foresight and, I think, courage in addressing one of the most difficult questions that our country has had to face.

By the way, we hope within the next year to have evolved a comprehensive proposal for the first time on the disposal of nuclear wastes, spent nuclear fuels.

We'll need your help and advice and counsel and cooperation in that project as well.

Thank you very much. It's a very good day for our country.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:50 a.m. in the Cabinet Room at the White House.

As enacted, H.R. 8638 is Public Law 95-242, approved March 10.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978

*Statement on Signing H.R. 8638 Into Law.
March 10, 1978*

I am pleased to sign into law today H.R. 8638, the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978. Enactment of this legislation takes us a major step toward fulfillment of an objective which the United States shares with other nations—a halt in the spread of nuclear weapons capability while preserving the peaceful use of nuclear energy.

The Congress has responded to this challenge with both care and courage in establishing a framework for ensuring that we meet these objectives. Senators Ribicoff, Glenn, and Percy, Representatives Zablocki, Bingham, and Findley, their colleagues on the committees which developed this bill, and their staffs have my respect and my thanks for their leadership on this issue. It has been a privilege for me, as it has been for Secretary Vance and other members of my administration, to work with them on the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978.

Our efforts to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons began more than 30 years ago, when we went to the United Nations with an offer to place certain aspects of nuclear energy under international ownership and control. The passage of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 and the adoption of the Non-Proliferation Treaty by the United Nations in 1968 and now this law, each have moved us further toward attainment of our nonproliferation goals.

On April 7 and 27 of last year, I outlined the policies and programs which we would implement to diminish proliferation risks. Today, I want to reaffirm this administration's strong commitment to that policy. We also recognize that nuclear power technologies now in operation, which do not involve nuclear fuel reprocessing, can and must provide an important source of energy for our Nation and for their countries. Our current once-through fuel cycle is and will continue to be a significant contributor to our energy supply. Properly managed, it can function without increasing the risks of proliferation. Our policy takes a responsible course between forgoing the energy benefits of nuclear power and becoming committed to commercialized use of plutonium before we know that we can deal safely with its risks.

I continue to oppose making premature and unnecessary commitments to commercialization of the fast breeder reactor and reprocessing, as exemplified in the United States by the Clinch River and Barnwell projects.

We and the other nations of the world must use the time we now have and pause to develop safer technologies, better institutional arrangements, and improved safeguards which will permit all nations to achieve their energy objectives while preventing the spread of nuclear weapons.

More than 40 nations have already joined with us in an International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation to explore and assess our means of meeting these twin goals. During this period of examination, the uranium-fueled reactors now in widespread operation can be used without incurring new proliferation risks. If our common search for improved institutions and technologies is to be successful, however, all nations will be required to avoid those steps which prejudice the outcome of the INFCE.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act sets the conditions and criteria which will govern U.S. cooperation with other nations in our efforts to develop the peaceful use of nuclear energy. The encouragement of universal ratification of the Non-Proliferation Treaty is central to the act, as is the establishment of a comprehensive set of controls, including application of International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards and provision of a stable framework for international nuclear cooperation and commerce. The act will also make our export licensing process more predictable.

We also will be taking steps to strengthen the safety and security of the fuel cycle we now have in operation and to ensure that it continues to be an efficient and reliable source of energy, both domestically and abroad.

Over the course of this year, we will develop comprehensive policies for management and disposal of radioactive waste, including implementation of the spent fuel storage program announced last October. To ensure our ability to continue as a reliable supplier of uranium fuel to those who share our nonproliferation objectives, we are moving ahead with a new enrichment plant at Portsmouth, Ohio.

Preventing nuclear proliferation will not be easy—some have called this task impossible. I believe, however, that halting the spread of nuclear weapons is imperative. We must press forward in our efforts. Fear of failure cannot be allowed to become a self-fulfilling prophecy.

In our first year, we have made substantial progress. The nuclear-supplying countries have agreed upon and published guidelines for the export of nuclear fuel and technology. The International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation is under way. As this legislation now becomes law, we are establishing clear criteria and incentives for nuclear cooperation, as well as sanctions against violations of safeguards.

Although I still have reservations about the numerous provisions in this act which state that Congress may invalidate or approve executive branch action by concurrent resolution, I am signing it because of its overwhelming importance to our nonproliferation policy. I do wish to make clear, however, that by signing this act, I am not agreeing that the Congress can overturn authorized executive actions through procedures not provided in the Constitution.

In conclusion, I am persuaded that the new criteria, incentives, and procedures in this act will help solve the problems of proliferation. They will help to ensure that access to nuclear energy will not be accompanied by the spread of nuclear explosive capability. While I recognize that some of these provisions may involve adjustments by our friends abroad, this more comprehensive policy will greatly increase international security. I believe that they will ultimately join us in our belief that improved world security justifies the steps which we all must take to bring it about. Control over the spread of nuclear weapons on our planet is one of the paramount questions of our time.

If the world is to benefit from the great potential of nuclear power, we must act now to protect ourselves and future generations from its worst dangers. We in the United States will dedicate our expertise and technical resources to this task, and we urge other countries to do the same. Let us continue to work together to achieve these goals.

Budget Deferrals

Message to the Congress. March 10, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report a new Department of Agriculture deferral of Forest Service funds totalling $4.5 million in budget authority. In addition, I am reporting a routine revision to a previously reported deferral of Forest Service funds, increasing the amount deferred by $4.8 million.

The details of each deferral are contained in the attached reports.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
March 10, 1978.

NOTE: The attachments detailing the deferrals are printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 16, 1978.

Meeting With Israeli Defense Minister Ezer Weizman

White House Statement. March 10, 1978

The President met this afternoon for 70 minutes with Israeli Defense Minister Ezer Weizman for an exchange of views on the security situation in the Middle East and the status of the current peace negotiations.

The President assured the Defense Minister that United States commitment to the strength and security of Israel was a fundamental aspect of American Middle East policy and would continue to be in the future.

The President reviewed the close cooperation which currently exists between Israel and the United States on security matters, noting that he had approved in the current budget $1 billion in financing for Israeli military purchases, half of which would be a direct grant, in addition to $785 million in security supporting assistance. He also reviewed the recent approval of $1.8 billion worth of advanced jet fighter aircraft to be sold to Israel as part of a Middle East package.

The President briefly reviewed with Defense Minister Weizman the status of the peace negotiation process in the Middle East and his hope that current difficulties can be overcome and the opportunities for peace realized.

Also present at the meeting on the U.S. side were the Vice President, Secretary of State Vance, Secretary of Defense Brown, Dr. Brzezinski, and William Quandt of the NSC staff.

Defense Minister Weizman was accompanied by Ambassador Dinitz, Col. Ilan Tehila, and Minister Yosef Chihano, in charge of procurement of the Israeli Embassy.

Digest of Other White House Announcements

The following listing includes the President's daily schedule and other items of general interest as announced by the White House Press Office during the period covered by this issue. Events and announcements printed elsewhere in the issue are not included.

March 5

The President returned to the White House after a weekend stay at Camp David, Md.

The President declared a major disaster for the State of Arizona as a result of severe storms and flooding, beginning about February 28, which caused extensive public and private property damage.

March 6

The President met at the White House with:

- Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs;
- Frank B. Moore, Assistant to the President for Congressional Liaison;
- the Cabinet;
- the bipartisan congressional leadership;
- Vice President Walter F. Mondale;
- Senator Floyd K. Haskell of Colorado and Rabbi Stanley M. Wagner, professor of Judaic studies at the University of Denver;
- Joseph M. McLoughlin, president of the International Association of Lions Clubs;
- Mayor Cooper Tedder and City Manager Thomas Edwards of Florence, S.C.;
- winners of the Westinghouse National Science Talent Search.

March 7

The President met at the White House with:

- David L. Aaron, Deputy Assistant for National Security Affairs;
- Mr. Moore;
- the Democratic congressional leadership;
- Senator Russell B. Long of Louisiana;
- James T. McIntyre, Jr., Acting Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

March 8

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Mr. Moore;
- Representative Glenn M. Anderson of California;
- Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York;

Administration of Jimmy Carter, 1978

- W. Averell Harriman;
- Mrs. Carter, for lunch;
- Representative Neal Smith of Iowa;
- Mike Mansfield, U.S. Ambassador to Japan;
- British Foreign Secretary David A. L. Owen to discuss the Rhodesian situation.

March 9

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Mr. Moore;
- Representative Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana;
- Senator Dennis DeConcini of Arizona.

The President hosted a White House reception for Florida citizens who had supported him during the Presidential campaign.

The President attended a portion of the Radio and Television Correspondents Association's dinner held at the Washington Hilton Hotel.

March 10

The President met at the White House with:

- Vice President Mondale, Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance, Hamilton Jordan, Assistant to the President, and Dr. Brzezinski;
- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Mr. Moore;
- Senator Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts;
- Senators Russell B. Long of Louisiana and Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York, and Representatives Al Ullman of Oregon and James C. Corman of California;
- Senator Paul Hatfield of Montana;

Terrorist Attack in Israel

Statement by the President. March 11, 1978

The terrorist attack on a bus today in Israel was an outrageous act of lawlessness and senseless brutality. Criminal acts such as this advance no cause or political belief. They inspire only revulsion at the lack of respect for innocent human life.

NOTE: Members of the Palestinian guerrilla organization Al Fatah seized a sightseeing bus north of Tel Aviv and forced it south. They were stopped by Israeli security forces in Herzliya. In the aftermath of the attack, 35 Israelis and 9 of the terrorists were dead.

and all of the American people, who share your sorrow. Please give my personal sympathy to the families of the many who died and to those who were wounded. I am particularly distressed that an event such as this should occur just as you were preparing to depart on your mission of peace. I continue to look forward to talking to you soon and relaying to you in person the deep emotions which this event has aroused in this country. In the meantime, please accept, Mr. Prime Minister, my deepest and most heartfelt condolences.

JIMMY CARTER

Terrorist Attack in Israel

Letter to Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin. March 11, 1978

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

It was with a sense of deep personal shock and moral outrage that I learned of the cowardly and senseless attack today on a group of innocent civilians. This brutal act of terrorism will surely be met with universal revulsion by all men of conscience. I know the pain and distress which you must be experiencing at this tragic moment, and I offer you the condolences and deep sympathy of myself,

Energy Emergency in Ohio

Statement on Extending the Energy Emergency Determination. March 13, 1978

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Ohio, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I determined on February 11, 1978, that a regional energy emergency existed in the State of Ohio of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate control regulations under the Ohio Air Quality Implementation Plan might be necessary. I ordered the determination to be in effect for not more than 30 days unless I rescinded it before that time or extended it. Because of the continuing energy supply problems throughout the State, I hereby extend the regional energy emergency determination for the State of Ohio for a second 30-day period. During this extension, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Ohio on a case-by-case basis and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to continue to act with due care if he further suspends any air pollution regulations under the authority provided by the extension of this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health.

NOTE: The Presidential determination is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

Rural Telephone Bank

Appointment of Five Members of the Board of Directors. March 13, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of five persons as members of the Board of Directors of the Rural Telephone Bank. They are:

EILEEN J. A. GREVEY, commissioner of the New Mexico Public Service Commission in Santa Fe;

ALEX P. MERCURE, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture for Rural Development;

CLIFFORD M. OUSE, Special Assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture;

ROBERT L. STANTON, president and director of the Rock Port Telephone Co. in Rock Port, Mo., and vice president of Stanton Grain Co.;

SARAH WEDDINGTON, General Counsel of the Department of Agriculture.

The Rural Telephone Bank is part of the Rural Electrification Administration. It was established in 1971 to make loans to rural telephone systems.

Securities Investor Protection Corporation

Nomination of Three Directors. March 13, 1978

The President today announced three persons whom he will nominate to be Directors of the Securities Investor Protection Corporation. They are:

RALPH D. DENUNZIO, of Riverside, Conn., for a term expiring December 31, 1979 (reappointment). DeNunzio, 47, is president and chairman of the executive committee of Kidder, Peabody & Co. In 1971 and 1972, he was chairman of the board of governors of the New York Stock Exchange, the youngest person to hold that office.

BRENTON H. RUPPLE, of Milwaukee, Wis., for a term expiring December 31, 1978 (replacing Glenn E. Anderson, term expired). Ruppel, 53, is president and chief executive officer of Robert W. Baird & Co. in Milwaukee.

MICHAEL A. TAYLOR, of New York, N.Y., for a term expiring December 31, 1980 (replacing Henry Meers, term expired). Taylor, 40, is senior vice president, assistant to the chairman, and director of corporate relations for Paine, Webber, Jackson & Curtis. From 1969 to 1971, he was counsel to the House Subcommittee on Consumer Protection and Finance.

The Securities Investor Protection Corporation was established in 1970 to administer an insurance fund for limited investor protection against financial failures of brokerage firms.

Comprehensive Employment and Training Act

Statement on the Level of Public Service Jobs Under the Program. March 14, 1978

It gives me great pleasure to announce that the level of public service jobs under the CETA program reached 753,000 in the first week of March. This surpasses the target of 725,000 we had set for that date more than 9 months ago.

Last May, when the economic stimulus package was passed, there were fewer than 300,000 jobs being provided by the major public service employment titles of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act. There were numerous contentions that we would be unable to meet our schedule of 725,000 jobs by March 1.

Not only did we meet the target, but we met it in the week we had scheduled more than 9 months ago. This demonstrates that the CETA system is an effective fiscal policy tool that can move rapidly against the problem of unemployment.

This rapid expansion of the public service jobs program was done without the creation of a large, new Federal bureaucracy.

It was done, as a recent study by Richard Nathan of the Brookings Institution indicates, without a significant degree of substitution of CETA workers for regular municipal employees.

The increase in CETA employment since May was accompanied by a much larger increase in private sector employment. While the 450,000 new CETA jobs were being created, private employment increased by 2.6 million. The unemployment rate fell from 7.1 percent to 6.1 percent now. Black employment increased by 5.9 percent. It is estimated that 33 percent of that increase was due to the buildup of the CETA system jobs.

The growth since May has been concentrated much more heavily among disadvantaged workers than before. Prior to the expansion, fewer than half the enrollees in the major CETA employment titles were disadvantaged. During the expansion, more than 86 percent of new enrollees were disadvantaged. I have submitted to the Congress a reauthorization of the CETA bill that will devote 100 percent of the future resources of the system to the disadvantaged.

The new bill also contains a provision that automatically increases the funding for this program when the unemployment rate rises. Our recent success in reaching the 725,000 jobs target indicates these additional funds will be able to be spent quickly and efficiently, as we had intended when drafting the new bill.

I took office with the firm conviction that government can be made to work compassionately, quickly, and effectively. The successful expansion of the public service jobs program within such a short period of time reaffirms my faith in the ability of government to deal directly with serious economic and social problems.

Energy Emergency in Alabama

Statement by the President. March 14, 1978

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Alabama, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I hereby determine that a regional energy emergency exists in the State of Alabama of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate and sulfur dioxide control regulations under the Alabama Air Quality Implementation Plan may be necessary, and that other means of responding to the energy emergency may be inadequate. This determination shall be effective for not more than thirty (30) days, provided that the State of Alabama shall comply with the conditions set forth in this determination. If, during the period of suspension, I find that a regional energy emergency no longer exists in Alabama, I will direct that this determination of regional energy emergency be rescinded and that all suspension orders issued by the Governor be terminated effective on the day of that rescission. The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Alabama and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to act with due care if he suspends air pollution regulations under the authority provided by this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health. I urge the Governor to consider carefully that suspensions which would allow a facility to burn available fuel which could not otherwise be utilized generally are appropriate. On the other hand, suspensions which permit facilities to turn off pollution control devices should be used sparingly and as a last resort, because such suspensions will accomplish only small energy savings while increasing risks to public health.

I also urge the Governor to implement fully necessary energy conservation measures so that the necessity for suspension of pollution control regulations can be minimized.

NOTE: The Presidential determination is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

Department of State

Nomination of David D. Newsom To Be Under Secretary for Political Affairs. March 14, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate David D. Newsom, of Berkeley, Calif., to be Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. He would replace Philip C. Habib, whose resignation the President accepted today.

Newsom was born January 6, 1918, in Richmond, Calif. He received an A.B. from the University of California in 1938 and an M.S. from Columbia University in 1940. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1942 to 1946.

Newsom was a newspaper reporter from 1938 to 1941, and was publisher of the Walnut Creek (Calif.) Courier-Journal in 1946 and 1947. He joined the Foreign Service in 1947 and served as information officer in Karachi from 1948 to 1950.

Newsom was visa officer in Oslo from 1950 to 1951, and public affairs officer in Baghdad from 1951 to 1955. He was officer in charge of Arabian Peninsula affairs at the State Department from 1956 to 1959.

From 1960 to 1962, Newsom was political officer in London. From 1962 to 1965, he was Deputy Director, then Director, of the Office of Northern African Affairs at State.

From 1965 to 1969, Newsom was Ambassador to Libya. He was Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs from 1969 to 1974. From 1974 to 1977, he was Ambassador to Indonesia, and since 1977 he has been Ambassador to the Philippines.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

White House Statement on the Tentative Agreement. March 14, 1978

The President is "pleased and encouraged" by the announcement of a tentative agreement. "The welfare of our country requires a dependable supply of coal. A negotiated national contract is the best way to assure that supply."

Nuclear Waste Management Task Force

Memorandum From the President.
March 13, 1978

Memorandum for the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Transportation, the Secretary of Energy, Chairman, Council on Environmental Quality, Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency, Acting Director, Office of Management and Budget, Director, Office of Science and Technology Policy, Assistant to the President for Domestic Affairs and Policy, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs

Subject: Interagency Nuclear Waste Management Task Force

By this memorandum I am establishing an interagency Nuclear Waste Management Task Force to formulate recommendations for establishment of an Administration policy with respect to long-term management of nuclear wastes and supporting programs to implement this policy. I have asked the Secretary of Energy to chair this Task Force.

The Department of Energy is issuing a draft report setting forth preliminary views on key issues in the waste management area. This report should serve as the basis of initial discussion for the Task Force. Areas which should be considered, leading to establishment of an Administration policy for nuclear waste management, include wastes from commercial nuclear power operations, existing low-level, transuranic (TRU), and high-level defense wastes. In addition, on-going programs should be reviewed to assure that the policy is implemented in a timely manner. Attention should also be given to the necessity of legislation, environmental assessment, support for our non-proliferation objectives, and budgetary impacts including potential involvement in waste management programs by private industry.

The deliberations of the Task Force should include opportunity for appropriate participation by the interested public, industry, States, and Members of Congress.

I am directing that the activities of the Task Force be initiated by March 15 and final recommendations should be completed by October 1, 1978.

JIMMY CARTER.

NOTE: The text of the memorandum was released on March 15.

Cancer Control Month, 1978

Proclamation 4552. March 15, 1978

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

Of all known diseases in this country, cancer is probably the most feared. Recent statistics indicate that 700,000 cases of cancer will be diagnosed in the United States in 1978 and that 390,000 Americans will die of some form of the disease this year. Only through continued support of cancer research and control can we reduce these figures.

The Federal Government, in cooperation with non-Federal organizations, is committed to finding the cause and cure of all forms of cancer and of controlling it to the extent possible while that search goes on. Since the inception of the National Cancer Program, we have learned much about the cause, detection, treatment and control of cancer. Today, cancer can often be detected earlier, making more effective treatment possible and saving many lives. Surgical, radiation and chemotherapy techniques have been improved, and research shows promise of adding immunotherapy as an additional method of treatment. Because prevention offers the best hope for ultimate control of cancer, cause and prevention research remains one of our highest priorities for we still have much to learn.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the month of April, 1978, as Cancer Control Month as requested in the joint resolution of the Congress March 28, 1938 (52 Stat. 148, 36 U.S.C. 150). I invite the Governors of the States and the appropriate officials of all other areas under the United States flag to issue similar proclamations.

I also encourage the medical and health professions, the communications media and other interested persons and groups to take this opportunity to educate the people on this subject and to help them to take advantage of available resources to prevent needless suffering and death.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this fifteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

JIMMY CARTER

United States Military Academy Board of Visitors

*Appointment of Harry Y. Baxter and Margaret Buckner Young as Members.
March 15, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of Harry Y. Baxter and Margaret Buckner Young as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy for terms expiring December 30, 1980.

Baxter, 47, of Burlington, Iowa, is a stockbroker with Schoff & Baxter.

Young, 56, of New Rochelle, N.Y., is the author of several children's books and taught at Kentucky State College and Atlanta University.

United States Advisory Commission on International Communication, Cultural and Educational Affairs

Nomination of Olin C. Robison To Be a Member. March 15, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Olin C. Robison, of Vermont, to be a member of the United States Advisory Commission on International Communication, Cultural and Educational Affairs for a term of 1 year. Upon confirmation by the Senate he will be designated Chairman.

Robison was born May 12, 1936, in Anacoco, La. He received his B.A. from Baylor University in 1958 and a Ph. D. from Oxford University in 1963. He attended Southwestern Theological Seminary from 1958 to 1960.

From 1961 to 1963, he served with the United States Air Force in England as auxiliary chaplain and as assistant education officer. He was dean of students at San Marcos Academy from 1963 to 1964. From 1964 to 1966, he worked with the Peace Corps as regional officer for the University Relations and Training Division. Robison was Special Assistant to the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. From 1968 to 1970, he was associate provost for the social sciences and lecturer in public affairs at Wesleyan University (Conn.). He was provost, dean of the faculty, and senior lecturer in government and legal studies at Bowdoin College (Maine) from 1970 to 1975. Since 1975 he has been president of Middlebury College.

Mississippi River Commission

Nomination of Roy T. Sessums and James W. Yancey To Be Members. March 15, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Roy T. Sessums and James W. Yancey to be members of the Mississippi River Commission for terms of 9 years.

Sessums, 69, of Metairie, La., would be reappointed to the Commission. He is a former director of the Louisiana Department of Public Works (1953 to 1955) and former professor of civil engineering at Louisiana Polytechnic Institute. From 1955 to 1973, he was with the Freeport Minerals Co., retiring as vice president. Since 1973 he has been a consultant to Freeport Minerals Co. He was a member of the National Offshore Operations Industry Advisory Committee to the Commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard from 1959 to 1973, and served on the President's Water Pollution Control Advisory Board in 1967 and 1968.

Yancey, 55, of Marianna, Ark., has been a farmer and ginner for the past 40 years. He served in the United States Navy from 1941 to 1945. He is president of the board of directors of the Mid-South Cotton Growers Association and president and manager of Marianna Gin, Inc. Yancey is a delegate and representative of the First Congressional District and also serves as a member of the executive board of the Arkansas Association of Quorum Courts.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Dinner

Remarks at the Dinner. March 15, 1978

It's a great honor for me to be here and to be introduced by one of the finest men I've ever known, Vice President Maddox—I mean, Vice President Mondale. [Laughter]

I've had a hard time lately. It's hard to make decisions. I avoided it all during the campaign. One of the good things about running for President, there are so many different issues to be fuzzy on. [Laughter] But then when you get in the Oval Office, it's all changed, and the hard matters press upon you.

One thing I had to decide very early was who would lead our great Democratic Party. And I have to say that the people who really lead and support the Democratic Party are the ones who, year after year, have made a tremendous sacrifice to make it possible to select and present to the American people for election the wonderful Democratic leaders who serve in the Congress, in the House and Senate. I thank you all for doing that.

Speaker O'Neill and Majority Leader Byrd are the two greatest congressional leaders I've ever had a chance to work with as President. We have a wonderful chairman, John White.

When I was first elected, I had to make a decision about Bob Strauss. I asked him to come over as Special Trade Representative, which was one of the best decisions I ever made for the Democratic Party. I needed to have restored business confidence. The stock market fell 300 points. He's in charge of foreign trade. We had a $30 billion trade balance last year—deficit. He's also in charge of the value of the dollar, as you know. [Laughter]

I have had some happy days. One was just before Christmas, when I got a report that the energy conference had reached an agreement. And I've had several happy days when we've resolved the terms of the coal contract. [Laughter]

I've also had a chance to learn a lot. I came here naive, proud of myself for having been elected as the first person from the Deep South to take over the reins of the great Federal Government of our country. And then I came to Washington and found out that Russell Long had filled that position for a long time. [Laughter]

I wanted to bring a breath of fresh air to Washington. I told my Cabinet that I wanted to get away from the smoke-filled rooms. Joe Califano was the only one that heard me. [Laughter]

I have had an ability to kind of roll with the punches. I've been criticized a lot, as you know, either for indecision or for making decisions. The Republicans have been constantly on the attack, claiming that my foreign policy was a disaster. I felt when I took office that there ought to be some continuity at least between the Republicans and Democrats. [Laughter]

We've had some unpopular decisions, I know. I understand from the Park Service that you have to stand in line now to get a permit to demonstrate against me in front of the White House. [Laughter] So, one of my good friends, who happens to be a Governor from California, recommended that I get ahold of a good and popular issue. He thought that I ought to look to the South since everybody loves our friends in this hemisphere. He suggested that the Panama Canal Treaty would be a good issue—[laughter]—to get ahold of. And he was right. This has helped with the demonstrations. This is the only subject we've never had a demonstration in front of the White House in favor of, the Panama Canal treaties. [Laughter]

I've had a hard time learning how to compromise. It's very difficult for me, as has also been criticized. The other day Jim Allen came in, and I thought I had finally achieved success. He said, "I am ready to compromise with you on the Panama Canal treaties," and I breathed a sigh of relief. He said, "I've worked out a deal where we give the Panamanians one side of the canal and we keep the other side." [Laughter] I responded to this well, because we've been looking for a place for a Palestinian homeland. [Laughter]

I thought the best way to resolve the issue and to demonstrate the strength of my own leadership was to have a mass meeting in support of the Panama Canal treaties, and we had the meeting. Both of us were very glad that the other one came. [Laughter]

That was one of my worst days. I have a hard time relaxing after I get back to the Mansion, but that night I decided I'd get in the tub, take a warm bath—and my Ivory soap sank. [Laughter]

I think it's good when we gather together as Democrats to recognize our strengths and our weaknesses. We stand these days, with the help of Tip O'Neill, Bob Byrd, many of you, particularly Wendell Ford and Jim Corman,<sup>1</sup> who have done such a superb job this year and for whom we'll be deeply grateful the morning after the election in November, as a united party.

There are no differences that separate us one from another, and there is a strong sense that I have of mutual respect and cooperation between the Congress and the White House, executive branch of Government.

We are a party which does not believe in unanimity. We are a party which does not believe in complacency. We inherited some tremendous challenges and problems which have become opportunities for us.

When I came into office a little more than a year ago, out of every 100 people of working age, 8 were looking for jobs. And because of the tremendous work of the Congress during 1977, we had a net increase of 4 million jobs in the United States, the greatest increase in the history of our country. And the most recent statistics, as you know, on unemployment are only about 6 percent, a tremendous growth in the strength of our people and their confidence in the future, brought about by the simple right to work for their own living.

Last year the Congress reduced taxes $6 billion. This year we expect to reduce taxes again $25 billion.

We've begun to reorganize our own Government to make it more effective, more efficient, more responsive, more open, more simple; to do away with the redtape that strangles us and the paperwork that suffocates us; to try to write regulations in simple terms that people can understand; to draw together those who work for and with the Government of our country.

We proposed and put into effect one of the most far-reaching health programs for young people ever seen in our Nation and the biggest increase in the budget for simple education in history.

We've raised a banner, that can be seen clearly throughout the world, of openness and decency and commitment to the principles on which our Nation was founded—the principles of freedom, of liberty, of basic human rights. And this is a standard that we will never lower as long as Democrats run this Government.

We've strengthened our ties with our friends and allies around the world, and our potential adversaries know that we deal from a position of wanting peace. I hope to have success this year in negotiations to limit and to reduce and to restrain the investments in atomic weapons, to have a comprehensive test ban. And the Congress has recently presented to me and I signed into law, for the first time, a comprehensive way to permit atomic power to be used for peaceful purposes, but to prevent nations from having nuclear explosives derived from this superb, peaceful use.

We are a nation which is strong, which is confident. We're a nation united. We're a nation with the prospect for the future that doesn't cause concern. We're struggling with issues without timidity or fear, without trepidation or hesitation. We're a nation that, through strength, has achieved for this first 14 months—and we will retain as long as this administration lasts—absolute peace for American men and women throughout the world. We have peace, and we're going to keep it.

America is a multifaceted community. We pride ourselves on individuality, on the right to be different, the right to speak our piece, the right to be heard, the right to debate, the right to reach a solution through tough, independent negotiations. We respect one another because we are one people.

In 1976 American voters, having confidence in us, gave a mandate for administration, and in 1978, this year, all of us jointly, working together, recognizing from whence comes our strength, will take this superb vision of what our Nation can be to the people. And in that effort, I have no doubt that we will be successful.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at approximately 9:45 p.m. in the International Ballroom at the Washington Hilton Hotel. He was introduced by Vice President Walter F. Mondale.

Small Business Week, 1978Proclamation 4553. March 16, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

Small business has been the economic backbone of American life since the earliest colonial days. Traders, craftsmen and merchants spurred the economy and played a vital role in the Nation's westward movement and growth. They helped create the multitude of opportunities that distinguish our free enterprise system—the system which has made American progress the envy of the world.

Of the 14 million businesses in the United States today, more than 13 million of them are small, including some three million farms. Together, they provide employment for over half the business labor force and account for more than 48 percent of the gross business product. America's prestige in the world today could never have been achieved without this outstanding productivity.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the week beginning April 30, 1978, as Small Business Week, and I urgently call on every American to join me in this very special tribute.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this sixteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

World Trade Week, 1978Proclamation 4554. March 16, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

From the days of its founding, the United States has always been a trading nation. Commercial relations with the rest of the world enabled our country to develop, prosper, and grow strong. Today, more than ever, international trade is essential to our national well-being.

For the American consumer, expanded trade means broader choices in the marketplace. For American business, it means more opportunities to sell the products of American ingenuity in the world's markets. For the American worker, it means more jobs at home.

International trade encourages the exchange of ideas as well as knowledge and experience among nations. It helps make better use of global resources and nurtures trust among the world's nations.

The United States is firmly committed to fair and open trade. To that end, we and our trading partners are pledged to eliminate impediments to trade, bring about sound and liberal trade rules, and keep the world's economy moving ahead.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim the week beginning May 21, 1978, as World Trade Week, and I urge that all the people of the United States participate during this week in activities that will promote continuing awareness of the importance of world trade to our Nation.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this sixteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

National Maritime Day, 1978

Proclamation 4555. March 16, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

The American Merchant Marine is the lifeline that links America with its overseas trading partners. In times of peace, it builds our economy; in times of national emergency, it provides logistic support to our armed forces.

In recognition of the importance of the American Merchant Marine, the Congress, by joint resolution of May 20, 1933 (48 Stat. 73; 36 U.S.C. 145), designated May 22 of each year as National Maritime Day in commemoration of the departure from Savannah, Georgia, on that date in 1819 of the SS Savannah on the first transatlantic voyage by any steamship, and requested the President to issue annually a proclamation calling for its appropriate observance.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby urge the people of the United States to honor our American Merchant Marine on May 22, 1978, by displaying the flag of the United States at their homes and other suitable places, and I request that all ships sailing under the American flag dress ship on that day.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this sixteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Aldo Moro

Letter to President Giovanni Leone of Italy on the Kidnapping of the Former Italian Prime Minister. March 16, 1978

Dear Mr. President:

I was shocked to hear of the terrorist kidnapping of Aldo Moro. I know that millions of Americans join me in praying for his quick and safe return. This outrage deeply affects all of us. Please convey my personal sympathies to the Moro family and to the families of the brave men slain in the line of duty in this senseless terrorist attack.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

NOTE: Former Prime Minister Moro was abducted in Rome en route from his home to a meeting of the Italian Parliament by members of the Red Brigades, an Italian terrorist group. His bodyguards were slain during the incident.

United States Naval Academy Board of Visitors

*Appointment of Mary Ellen Hanley and Albert H. Rusher as Members.
March 16, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of Mary Ellen Hanley and Albert H. Rusher as members of the Board of Visitors of the United States Naval Academy for the terms expiring December 30, 1980.

Hanley, 48, of Seattle, Wash., served in the United States Marine Corps from 1951 to 1954. She received a B.S. from Brown University in 1951 and a J.D. from the University of Washington, 1958. Since 1963 she has been a partner with Karr, Tuttle, Koch, Campbell, Mawer & Morrow, Attorney at Law.

Rusher, 55, of Brinkley, Ark., served in the United States Navy from 1946 to 1949. He received his B.S. from the United States Naval Academy in 1946. He has been with the Bank of Brinkley since 1963 and has been president since 1969. Rusher is also partner in ownership and operation of Rusher Insurance Agency.

St. Patrick's Day, 1978

Message of the President. March 16, 1978

Throughout America—wherever the irrepressible Irish spirit thrives—St. Patrick's Day is a special time for celebration. Each year it reminds us of the warmth, the joy in living, and the basic human goodness of the Irish people whose qualities are so deeply etched upon our own national character.

Recognizing the unique bond of festivity, faith, and national pride that this day commemorates, Rosalynn and I join every American in honoring St. Patrick's Day by the wearing o' the green.

Railroad Rehabilitation

Announcement of Proposed Legislation. March 16, 1978

The President has asked Transportation Secretary Brock Adams to send to Congress legislation that would enable the States to help maintain important local rail freight service.

The Railroad Amendments Act of 1978 would streamline the process by which States receive Federal money to rehabilitate unprofitable branchlines that provide service vital to local economies.

Under existing law, railroads must obtain permission from the Interstate Commerce Commission to abandon a branchline before that line is eligible for Federal assistance. The administration's proposal would eliminate that requirement, allowing States to make grants or loans for rehabilitation before rail lines have been abandoned.

It would also eliminate the provision in the current law that allocates at least 1 percent of available funds to each State, even if the State has no lines eligible for assistance.

The benefits of the legislation will be felt especially in the Midwest, where some railroads are facing a severe financial crisis.

The proposal, which is being transmitted to Congress today, does not increase the cost of the branchline program, currently authorized at $360 million.

Panama Canal Treaties

Remarks on Senate Ratification of the Neutrality Treaty. March 16, 1978

I have a brief statement to make.

The people of our Nation owe a debt of thanks to the Members of the United States Senate for their courageous action taken today in voting for the Panama Canal neutrality treaty.

I add my sincere personal congratulations to the entire Senate, and especially to the three men who have led their colleagues with bipartisan statesmanship and wisdom through this long debate—Senator Robert Byrd, the majority leader, Senator Howard Baker, the minority leader, and Senator John Sparkman, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

As a nation, we also owe our gratitude and admiration to former President Ford and to Democratic and Republican leaders who have served in previous administrations who, by giving the treaties their support, gave us the opportunity to judge the treaties on their merits and not on a partisan, political basis.

This vote today is, of course, only the first step in the process of ratification, but I am confident that the Senate will show the same courage and foresight when it considers the second treaty. This is a promising step toward a new era in our relationships with Panama and with all of Latin America.

General Torrijos and the Panamanian people have been patient and forbearing during the negotiations and during the Senate debate. They've earned the confidence and respect of the American people. Their actions during the last few months is proof of their willingness to form a partnership with us, to join in cooperation rather than confrontation.

It's been more than 14 years since negotiations began with Panama, and we've been through many months of discussion and debate about the two treaties that the Senate has considered. This has been a long debate, but all of us have learned from it.

The basic purpose and the underlying principles of the treaty have been affirmed and strengthened by the actions of the Senate. Under the treaty as approved, the United States and Panama will have joint responsibility to assure that the canal after the year 2000 will remain neutral and secure, open and accessible.

The United States can take whatever actions are necessary to make sure the canal remains open and safe. The vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama are assured of transit through the canal as quickly as possible and can go to the head of the line in time of emergency or need.

While the right of the United States and Panama to act against any threat to the regime of neutrality is assured by this treaty, it does not mean that there is a right of intervention, nor do we want a right of intervention by the United States in the internal affairs of Panama.

But perhaps the most encouraging lesson of all in these last long months is that in a full and open debate, even in a very controversial and difficult issue, in our foreign policy objectives, we can still reach the decisions that are in our Nation's long-term, best interests.

I congratulate again the Senators for their decision and give them, on behalf of the Nation, my sincere thanks.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House.

Earlier, the Senate had voted 68–32 to ratify the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

Interview With the President

*Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session
With Members of the American Press Institute.
March 16, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. I appreciate your letting me interrupt your meeting. I'd like to restrict our time, which was set up for 30 minutes, to 25 minutes, so that the 5 I might have an individual picture made with you if you have no objections to that. And I'll try to abbreviate my answers so you won't have to suffer because of a lack of time.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

Today is, I guess, a typical day in the life of a President. I thought I might just outline briefly a few of the things that we are addressing on a very current basis.

I've been on the phone and meeting privately with Cy Vance this morning and last night on the Israeli-Lebanese question, which is a matter of great concern to us and which involves not only our nations but also the United Nations today.

We're working to try to understand the possibilities of the coal strike being resolved. As you know, this is the third contract that has been negotiated, the second one that the bargaining council has approved, and we're trying to monitor that progress and also to continue the good increase in coal production that has taken place since the Taft-Hartley Act was invoked. We've had a good many nonunion members go back to work. There's been a minimum of violence around the country. And some union mines are back in operation, and the rate of coal production is increasing steadily.

At the same time, we are trying to help with the Rhodesian question and monitoring carefully the withdrawal, now complete, of the Somalis from the Ogaden area.

We are dealing in the House with the Humphrey-Hawkins bill. The vote is today. We're trying to hold our tax package together, prevent a reopening of the entire question of social security, and in the Senate, of course, we have the crucial vote on the Panama Canal treaties this afternoon. Debate is going on now, and I understand another Senator just endorsed the treaties, which is very encouraging to us.

These are some of the matters that are my responsibility just today, and I don't go into the minor ones. I've got to make a major speech on defense policy tomorrow morning at Wake Forest College in Winston-Salem, and that's what I've just been working on when I came in here. And I'm going to go out tomorrow morning and afternoon on one of our major nuclear aircraft carriers to see at first hand some of the new weapons systems that I have to decide about in preparation of the budget and in shaping our defense capabilities.

I'd like to answer any questions you might have, and I'll try to be rapid—and brief answers.

QUESTIONS

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMY

Q. Mr. President, I'm Bob Wicker from Dothan, Alabama. And I'm working in West Germany with Stars and Stripes. As you probably know, the value of the dollar, declining dollar, is of great value to our troops over there. I just wonder if you could shed any light on the impact this is going to have on NATO in the near future.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've been pleased in the last few weeks to see the dollar stabilizing as it relates to the deutsche mark. When I was overseas, it was down, hovering around two deutsche marks per dollar, and now I think it's up to 2.05, 2.06, 2.04, right in that neighborhood. So, we have been acting with the Germans and with the prospect of acting in an equivalent way with the Japanese to stabilize the irregularities in the market.

We have a strong reason to believe that this year we'll see an improvement in the dollar, in its value, related to other currencies. And I'll give you two or three very quick reasons.

One is that we don't anticipate our imports of oil to increase in 1978 as they did in 1977. That's one of the major reasons for our adverse trade balance.

Secondly, last year we had about a 3-percent higher growth rate than the average of all our major trading partners. This year, because the other economies are improving somewhat, that 3-percent difference is likely to narrow considerably. Obviously, when our economy is booming, compared to theirs, we have extra money that we can use to buy their goods; they can equivalently afford to buy our own goods.

Because of many factors, which I won't describe, to save time, interest rates in our country have now gone up, compared to interest rates abroad. Yesterday the equivalent to the prime rate in Japan was lowered again. This means that it's more attractive now for foreigners who have money to invest it in our country than it was last year.

I think we'll have an energy bill before too many weeks go by. We are making some progress already in the Senate. We have an agreement now. We're introducing this Senate agreement—the Senators are; I think Senator Jackson, in the lead, Senator Bumpers was helping him—today to the House, and I hope that will resolve the question.

I think a doubt and an uncertainty about what we are going to do on the energy question has been an adverse factor. And although the results of an energy package will be slow in being realized, they will be sure and steady and give some predictability about the future markets.

Temporary things hurt the dollar, too. The invasion of Lebanon by Israeli forces caused the market to be shaky yesterday. And the news reports that the kidnapping in Italy causes the dollar to be a little bit shaky.

So, these matters, as they are resolved, if and when they are resolved, that don't relate to any decision that I might make, have an adverse effect on the stability of the international markets.

We don't try to stop long-range trends, of course, in currency values. These are determined primarily by trade relationships. But we do intercede in an increasingly effective way and an increasingly aggressive way to compensate for disorderly movements in the market.

But I think the trends this year, based on these factors and a few others, show that the dollar is likely to strengthen during 1978.

SPACE PROGRAM

Q. Mr. President, my name's Ron Thornburg; I'm with Today newspaper in Brevard County, Florida. We're the home of Kennedy Space Center, so we're very interested in space policy. I have a doublebarreled sort of question for you.

Do you have any plans to put funding for the fifth space shuttle orbiter back into the budget? And secondly, what do you see as the role of the United States in space in the next 10 years?

THE PRESIDENT. No, at this time I don't intend to put the fifth space shuttle orbiter back in the budget. We have four that I have recommended to the Congress, and we believe this is completely adequate to take care of our needs for a long time in the future and also give us a standby vehicle if we need it. We will upgrade, however, the early models produced to make sure that they are fully operational in character. This was not in the original plan.

I think that our space program in the future, the next 10 years, will be stable, well planned, carefully considered. I think the space shuttle capability that we will have will greatly expand the customer market for space services far beyond our own country. Other nations and private enterprises will now be using our space shuttle capability when they couldn't really use the very limited and tightly controlled space capability of independently launched missiles.

I don't need to go into detail about geodetic survey capabilities, geological survey capabilities, astronomical capabilities, weather monitoring, crop assessments to detect diseases in trees. Every time I have a foreign visitor, I give that person a 400-page summary of the kind of space data that we have available to them.

One of the things that we've just done recently, for instance, is put in a communications system for the first time in the Southwest Pacific. The United States took in new territory for the first time since 1912, this January, when we added one commonwealth and one protectorate to our resources, and we put up a space satellite capability for communications there.

So, I see a great possibility in meeting our human daily needs—research and development, astronomy, geology, geodetic surveys—that can keep these space shuttles busy.

CENTRAL UTAH PROJECT

Q. J. Heslop, Deseret News, Salt Lake City, Utah. We worry a lot about water in Utah. And our Central Utah project was on the famous hit list, then off, and now we get the impression that we may be starved to death by increased costs and lack of money. What do you see that can be done to help us in the completion of that project before we're priced out of business?

THE PRESIDENT. I haven't known about any changes lately. So far as I know, the Central Utah Project is approved and will be completed on schedule.

Q. Very minimum budget.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the budget is evolved, as you know, over a long period of years, sometimes 10, 15, 20, 25, 30 years. And whatever the budget is required to complete a project once it's approved will be provided. The increase in the budget is necessary to compensate for inflationary factors, increased costs. And this is accommodated by my budget recommendations to Congress and by their action.

I might say that many of the projects that are not warranted began just with tiny apportionments of money, tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars, later growing into hundreds of millions of dollars in a project, once it gets a momentum of its own.

But we've reassessed several times, with a great deal of concern, the Central Utah Project, and the final determination by me, Secretary of Interior and the Corps of Engineers as advisers, has been that it's a worthy project, and so far as I know, it will be completed.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Q. I am Phil Dessauer, Tulsa World. I'm interested in—would you tell us who the name of the last Senator you had on the Panama—

THE PRESIDENT. Paul Hatfield, I think, endorsed the treaty just a few minutes ago. He's the newly appointed Senator from Montana.

Q. How do you size up the prospects now?

THE PRESIDENT. I think the prospects are good, but extremely close. And these last few hours of debate, obviously, are crucial. This is a focusing of the amendments on which the Senators feel intensely. And I think there's going to be a very close vote. It is the most difficult political problem that I have ever faced. I think I would almost equate it with the difficulty of being elected President. [Laughter]

We started out a year ago, inheriting this important matter from my three predecessors. And at that time, obviously I had to decide whether it was a good treaty or not. I decided that it was a good treaty—two treaties. And we began the slow, laborious, difficult process of acquainting the American people with the facts—and obviously, the Members of the Congress. We've made good progress.

I think that the most recent poll results from all the known sources show that a plurality of Americans now favor the treaties with the leadership amendments on them.

I will be very glad when this vote's over. That is on the neutrality treaty that takes effect at the end of 1999. And then we'll have another major and difficult vote on the treaty to take place between now and the end of this century. So, I feel hopeful, but still somewhat in doubt.

Q. You have any conversations with Senator Bellmon?

THE PRESIDENT. I have had conversations with every Senator on the Hill. [Laughter] Senator Bellmon is a statesman—[laughter]—and I have confidence in his judgment.

URBAN POLICY

Q. I'm Sue Reisinger from the Dayton Daily News. We understand you're going to introduce your urban policy at the end of this month. We would appreciate you being as frank as possible about how much money and what kind of programs will be in that policy.

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know yet, you know, about the details. I met most of the afternoon yesterday with the Secretary of HUD and with my own advisers on domestic policy and also economics, to go over the general principles and policies and the strategies for the urban policy.

We want to have as much as possible authority and responsibility at the local level of government and among non-governmental entities. We realize that in the broad scope of things a relatively small portion of any future budget within a city's boundaries will come from the Federal Government. The overwhelming portion of it has got to come from private enterprise, from local persons. Neighborhood groups, volunteers, local authorities, regional authorities, State authorities have got to play a major role. And that will be one of the thrusts.

Among the cities of our country, there's over a $3 trillion investment just in buildings, factories, and homes, and we feel that they ought to be preserved.

We have now analyzed all the programs, about 160 programs, to measure their effectiveness in dealing with urban problems. And it was a very stringent analysis. We've also required for the first time our major heads of department, agency heads, to come together to share both criticisms and some hope for the future.

We'll probably phase out some programs. We are starting our analysis with the first of last year to put together a comprehensive approach to what the urban problems were when I took office. Some of the proposals have already been introduced to Congress. Some have actually been passed by Congress. A few have actually already been funded and now are being implemented. But it'll be very comprehensive, and I think it will result in a great improvement in dealing with urban problems.

But the exact additional budget above and beyond what we've already done has not yet been determined, but I will issue the urban policy analysis by the end of this month.

Also, we'll come out, I hope and expect, with a brochure that might be used as kind of a textbook or handbook for people who are interested, at all levels of government, including from myself all the way down to the average homeowner, so that there can be a delineation of what programs are available, what responsibilities should be assumed by private citizens or by business leaders or by local, State, and Federal officials. And this, I think, will help also.

But it's a very good discipline for us. We've been working on it for literally months. And although I don't know the final details of it—if I did, I would really rather wait until the end of this month, but I don't yet. And I think you'll be pleased with it. I hope you will.

SOCIAL SECURITY PAYMENTS

Q. I'm Nancy Keil with the Daily Oklahoman. In Oklahoma, as almost everywhere, the sentiment about the social security program is getting pretty strong, now that the effects have been going in on paychecks. And I was wondering if you're doing any reassessment of the program that you've gotten through, now that there is some talk about retrenching on it.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think you know that none of the increases in social security payments that have taken place this year were a result of recent legislation. This is a built-in increase schedule that was passed years ago. The Congress, I think very courageously, acted under emergency circumstances in a mandatory way. Had the Congress not increased the contributions to the social security system, it would have gone bankrupt. A couple of the major funds would have been bankrupt by next year, 1979, so the Congress had to take that action.

We have proposed to the Congress a tax reform measure and a tax reduction measure consisting of about $25 billion in net savings to the American taxpayer, and there'll be very few families in our country who would have a net increase this year or next year, once the tax reductions go into effect. I advocated to the Congress some reduction in contributions from wage payments from the general fund, in case the inflation rate is more than 6 percent and other circumstances, to pay for the nonretirement type benefits—survivors benefits and death benefits.

The Congress did not do this, which added about $30 billion in net additional cost to come from payroll deductions. I think this is something the Congress might go back and reassess. But my guess is that because of an extremely crowded calendar this year, that no substantial modification will take place in the present social security law.

GOVERNOR REUBIN ASKEW OF FLORIDA

Q. Mr. President, Walker Lundy from Tallahassee, Florida. Most people in Florida think Reubin Askew is going to come work for you after he finishes being Governor. What kind of job would you predict he might have?

THE PRESIDENT. I think Reubin Askew could fill any job in Washington, including the one I hold. [Laughter]

Q. He disagrees.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I feel that way. Reubin has been very helpful to me already. We have added a dimension of competence, I think, to the appointment of diplomatic officials around the world because of the committee that Reubin has headed. Typically of him, he's done an extremely conscientious job, and every appointment that I've made to any diplomatic post—ambassadors and so forth—have been made after the screening process that Reubin has supervised.

I have asked Reubin before, I might say, to come to Washington and work with me, before I was inaugurated, at a Cabinet level. And I think he knows that my hope still stands that he might do this, to fill a vacancy that he and I could agree upon. But he made it clear to me at the time that although he was honored by the invitation, that he had duties to perform in Florida. So, I have not discussed with him any specific thing. I don't know what opportunities would present themselves if and when he decided he might move. But he loves Florida, and he's dedicated to be a full-time Governor. And we've not discussed it since I offered him the Cabinet post, if he would take it.

But you can tell from my comments how much I think of him.

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

Q. Mr. President, Curtis Sitomer, Christian Science Monitor, in Boston. The Gallup Poll today shows a 51 percent approval rating for you among the public. This is a slight increase, but is only about half of the electorate. Going into a midterm year, what will you do to improve your status with the American public and help your party in its congressional and local and State elections?

THE PRESIDENT. Of course, I was pleased to see the trend going up. [Laughter] It's quite a pleasant change. My own personal popularity is still quite high, around 70 percent or better. The measurement that Gallup and Harris and them use, of course, is how the American people assess my performance as President. And this has varying factors that go into the public's opinion.

One is how well the Congress and I can cooperate on very difficult questions, like energy legislation or tax reform or Government reorganization or the Panama Canal treaties. It also measures the effectiveness of my administration as it relates to dealings with the Soviet Union on SALT and the comprehensive test ban, on dealing with the problem in the Middle East, on trying to retain a semblance of peace around the world.

Of course, a lot of it is determined by just visceral human reactions to my own personal activities and statements. So, I would guess that the measurement of my effectiveness as President by the public opinion polls would primarily be determined by whether or not I'm successful in bringing to a conclusion many of those problems that I outlined to you at the first of this meeting.

If we got a solution in the coal strike, that would be helpful for my personal opinion polls, although there's very little that I can do to require a coal strike resolution. And the Panama Canal treaty vote will have an impact, the energy package being passed would have an impact. We undertook a lot of very difficult and controversial subjects, tasks, when I became President. We have not yet had time to be successful in many of them, and I think that is the major factor.

All of us work hard, and we do the best we can. We make mistakes. But I think the public's been very gracious in their analysis of my administration. And I'm pleased with that upturn that came at a very good moment.

I told the Democratic fundraising group last night—a banquet that raised about a million dollars, the best one we've ever had—that some days I had a very hard time, and that one night, after having two or three Senators announce they were not going to vote for the Panama Canal, I went home, and I thought I would at least have to relax by getting in a warm tub bath. And my Ivory soap sank. [Laughter]

So, some days are good and some days are bad. The Gallup Poll has helped a little bit this morning.

TAXATION AT LOCAL LEVELS

Q. Jim Houck, San Francisco Examiner. The major political issue in California right now is a ballot initiative which would dramatically reduce the amount of revenue through the property tax available to local governments. I suspect this is an issue elsewhere in the country. Are there any Federal initiatives that are being considered in this area?

THE PRESIDENT. No, not to put a statutory limit on what a local government can do on taxation. I don't know of any Federal—obviously, as we increase Federal contributions in the field of transportation or health, environmental quality, education, that cuts down on the amount of contribution that local taxpayers have to pay.

When I was Governor of Georgia, I did have a responsibility in that field, and we cut property taxes substantially by giving refunds from the State government derived from sales tax and income tax. We have a pretty good income tax in Georgia, but there is no Federal movement to control the actions of local governments or directly to restrain how much property tax they can levy. I think that is a responsibility of the State governments.

U.S. ATTORNEY DAVID MARSTON; SELECTION OF U.S. ATTORNEYS AND JUDGES

Q. I'm Mike Renshaw, Mr. President, from the Courier Times in Bucks County, Pennsylvania. In retrospect, do you feel that the Marston affair could have been handled in a less inflammatory manner?

THE PRESIDENT. I think so. I have literally hundreds of appointments to make, and the Marston affair never came to my attention at all. I never heard of Marston until out in November.

This has become a very highly publicized issue. If I had known a year ago what I know now, I would have looked in personally to what the circumstances were, would have consulted very closely with the Attorney General, who probably had not much more knowledge of it than did I, and would have handled it more expeditiously and more openly and frankly.

This is an issue that I think has been distorted. You know, my commitment to the American people has been completely honored, that the appointments to the judiciary and to the Attorney General's office would be handled on the basis of merit. And in spite of dozens of appointments, we have never been accused of making an appointment that wasn't meritorious.

And in my debate with President Ford, I said that all things being equal, that I would appoint people to the Supreme Court and to lesser offices who were compatible with my own basic philosophy. I think the Attorney General has done the best he could with it.

We initiated as aggressively as possible, with the constraints placed on me by custom and tradition in the Senate, a merit selection of judges. And we've, for instance, got in every Federal judicial circuit now a merit selection board. And they give to me recommendations, three, four, five, six of the top quality, the best nominees that they can discern for each vacancy. And I've always chosen my appointments from those recommended.

On the district court judges, primarily limited to the bounds of one State, I've written all of the Democratic Senators a personal letter, my first few weeks in office, asking them to appoint a similar merit selection board. And I think 17 or 18 of them have already done that. So, we are moving as strongly as we can toward merit selection.

But the Marston case has been obviously a very serious problem for us, and I regret that it happened. And had I known a year ago what I know now, I think we could certainly have handled it better.

NOTE: The interview began at 1 p.m. in the Cabinet Room at the White House.

The transcript of the interview was released on March 17.

Air Services Between the United States and the United Kingdom

Statement by the President. March 17, 1978

I am pleased to announce that we have been able to reach an agreement with the United Kingdom today which will make possible a wide range of low fares.

Budget and standby fares will be available on scheduled flights between the United Kingdom and 14 United States gateway cities. These cities are: Anchorage, Alaska; Atlanta, Ga.; Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; Dallas/Ft. Worth, Tex.; Detroit, Mich.; Houston, Tex.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Miami, Fla.; New York City, N.Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Calif.; Seattle, Wash.; and Washington/Baltimore.

This agreement also liberalizes charter rules and ensures charter rate freedom. All this will encourage air travel between the United States and the United Kingdom.

Taken together, these two agreements constitute a major step forward in implementing our key objective in international aviation—to provide the traveling public with a wide choice of low fares on scheduled flights.

The agreement also demonstrates once again that we can work out difficulties with our most important aviation partner to the mutual benefit of airlines and consumers in both the United States and the United Kingdom.

Winston-Salem, North Carolina

*Address at Wake Forest University.
March 17, 1978*

As someone who comes from a great tobacco-producing State, it's an honor for me to be here in the capital of the greatest tobacco State in the world. What you do here means a lot to Georgia. And we have always found that the people in the Winston-Salem area and throughout North Carolina share with us common purposes, a common heritage, and a common future. You've always received me with open arms. You expressed your confidence in me during the campaign for President. And I'm indeed honored to come here to Wake Forest, to Winston-Salem, and to North Carolina, our neighbor State, to make a speech of major importance.

It's a pleasure to be with your great Senator, Bob Morgan, who cast a courageous vote yesterday, and who is extremely knowledgeable about the subject that I will talk about. He's on the Armed Forces Committee, as you know—the Armed Services Committee, responsible for our Nation's defense. He's on the special committee, a highly selective committee on our Nation's intelligence, and he has been one of the staunch protectors of our Nation and is a great man and a great statesman. Bob, I'm very glad to be with you.

It's also good to renew my friendship with your great Governor, Jim Hunt. I first met him before he was Governor and before I was President. We formed an instant personal friendship, and his leadership of your State has brought credit to you and the admiration of the rest of the Nation.

And I'm particularly grateful to be here with Steve Neal. The first time I came here was to join with him in his campaign in 1974, when the prospects were not very bright. But because of the confidence in him, expressed by the people of the Fifth District, he was successful.

He's now assumed a leadership position in the Congress. He's a man, also, who believes in the strong defense of our country. His voting record proves this. In addition, he's on the Science and Technology Committee, which is responsible for advancing our purposes in the future. And he is honored by being the chairman of that portion of the Banking and Finance Committee responsible for international trade. This means a great deal to us, because the exporting of our products and the protection of our textile industry, our tobacco industry, our farm products, is very crucial, and Steve has now worked himself up to a seniority position so he can be exceptionally effective, now and in the future.

I'd like to also acknowledge the presence of two members of my Cabinet, Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, and your own Juanita Kreps, Secretary of Commerce.

To Georgia and to North Carolina, the most important, perhaps, Member in the Congress is the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee. He takes care of tobacco farmers; he takes care of peanut farmers, important to both Georgia and North Carolina. And I'm very honored today to have with us my own United States Senator, Herman Talmadge.

I won't acknowledge the presence of every distinguished guest here today, but I would like to say that I'm pleased that several of North Carolina's great Members of Congress have chosen to come to honor me by their presence—Charlie Whitly, Richardson Preyer, Bill Hefner, Lamar Gudger. Would you stand up, please, gentlemen? Please stand up. Thank you very much.

Charlie, I believe that you and Bob Morgan are alumni of Wake Forest. Is that not correct? I know the Wake Forest people are glad to have you back.

Well, I'd like to say that this is a remarkably great honor for me. This is a great college, and it's a time in our Nation's history when we need to stop and assess our past, our present, and our future.

I've noticed the statistics in North Carolina that shows that under my own administration—because of your work, not mine—there's been remarkable economic progress.

In the State of North Carolina, the unemployment rate, for instance, last year, dropped 2.3 percent. You now have an extraordinarily low unemployment rate of only 4½ percent. This shows not only that our Nation is strong but the North Carolina people want to work. And when they are given a chance, they do work. And I thank you for that.

A hundred and ninety-eight years ago, in the southern part of your State, 400 North Carolina militiamen took up arms in our own War of Independence. Against a force of 1,300 British soldiers, the North Carolinians prevailed, and their battle at Ramsour's Mill became a step on the road to victory at Yorktown 1 year later.

Your ancestors in North Carolina and mine in Georgia and their neighbors throughout the Thirteen Colonies earned our freedom in combat. That is a sacrifice which Americans have had to make time and time again in our Nation's history. We've learned that strength is the final protector of liberty.

This is a commitment and a sacrifice that I understand well, for the tradition of military service has been running deep for generations in my own family. My first ancestor to live in Georgia, James Carter, who moved there from North Carolina, fought in the Revolution. My father was a first lieutenant in World War I. My oldest son volunteered to go to Vietnam. And I spent 11 years of my life as a professional military officer in the United States Navy. This is typical of American families.

Down through the generations, the purposes of our Armed Forces have always been the same, no matter what generation it was: to defend our security when it's threatened and, through demonstrated strength, to reduce the chances that we will have to fight again.

These words of John Kennedy will still guide our actions, and I quote him, "The purpose of our arms is peace, not war—to make certain that they will never have to be used."

That purpose is unchanged. But the world has been changing, and our responses as a nation must change with it.

This morning I would like to talk to you about our national security—where we now stand, what new circumstances we face, and what we are going to do in the future.

Let me deal at the beginning with some myths. One myth is that this country somehow is pulling back from protecting its interests and its friends around the world. That is not the case, as will be explained in this speech and demonstrated in our actions as a nation.

Another myth is that our defense budget is too burdensome and consumes an undue part of our Federal revenues. National defense is, of course, a large and important item of expenditures, but it represents only about 5 percent of our gross national product and about a quarter of our current Federal budget.

It also is a mistake to believe that our country's defense spending is mainly for intercontinental missiles or nuclear weapons. Only about 10 percent of our defense budget goes for strategic forces or for nuclear deterrence. More than 50 percent is simply to pay for and support the services of the men and women in our Armed Forces.

Finally, some believe that because we do possess nuclear weapons of great destructive power, that we need do nothing more to guarantee our Nation's security. Unfortunately, it's not that simple.

Our potential adversaries have now built up massive forces armed with conventional weapons—tanks, aircraft, infantry, mechanized units. These forces could be used for political blackmail, and they could threaten our vital interests unless we and our allies and friends have our own military strength and conventional forces as a counterbalance.

Of course, our national security rests on more than just military power. It depends partly on the productive capacity of our factories and our farms, on an adequate supply of natural resources with which God has blessed us, on an economic system which values human freedom above centralized control, on the creative ideas of our best minds, on the hard work, cohesion, moral strength, and determination of the American people, and on the friendship of our neighbors to the north and south.

Our security depends on strong bonds with our allies and on whether other nations seek to live in peace and refrain from trying to dominate those who live around them.

But adequate and capable military forces are still an essential element of our national security. We, like our ancestors, have the obligation to maintain strength equal to the challenges of the world in which we live, and we Americans will continue to do so.

Let us review briefly how national security issues have changed over the past decade or two.

The world has grown both more complex and more interdependent. There is now a division among the Communist powers. The old colonial empires have fallen, and many new nations have risen in their place. Old ideological labels have lost some of their meaning.

There have also been changes in the military balance among nations. Over the past 20 years, the military forces of the Soviets have grown substantially, both in absolute numbers and relative to our own. There also has been an ominous inclination on the part of the Soviet Union to use its military power—to intervene in local conflicts, with advisers, with equipment, and with full logistical support and encouragement for mercenaries from other Communist countries, as we can observe today in Africa.

This increase in Soviet military power has been going on for a long time. Discounting inflation, since 1960 Soviet military spending has doubled, rising steadily in real terms by 3 or 4 percent a year, while our own military budget is actually lower now than it was in 1960.

The Soviets, who traditionally were not a significant naval power, now rank number two in world naval forces.

In its balanced strategic nuclear capability, the United States retains important advantages. But over the past decade, the steady Soviet buildup has achieved functional equivalence in strategic forces with the United States.

These changes demand that we maintain adequate responses—diplomatic, military, and economic—and we will.

As President and as Commander in Chief, I am responsible, along with the Congress, for modernizing, expanding, and improving our Armed Forces whenever our security requires it. We've recently completed a major reassessment of our national defense strategy. And out of this process have come some overall principles designed to preserve our national security during the years ahead.

We will match, together with our allies and friends, any threatening power through a combination of military forces, political efforts, and economic programs. We will not allow any other nation to gain military superiority over us.

We shall seek the cooperation of the Soviet Union and other nations in reducing areas of tension. We do not desire to intervene militarily in the internal domestic affairs of other countries, nor to aggravate regional conflicts. And we shall oppose intervention by others.

While assuring our own military capabilities, we shall seek security through dependable, verifiable arms control agreements wherever possible.

We shall use our great economic, technological, and diplomatic advantages to defend our interests and to promote American values. We are prepared, for instance, to cooperate with the Soviet Union toward common social, scientific, and economic goals. But if they fail to demonstrate restraint in missile programs and other force levels or in the projection of Soviet or proxy forces into other lands and continents, then popular support in the United States for such cooperation with the Soviets will certainly erode.

These principles mean that, even as we search for agreement in arms control, we will continue to modernize our strategic systems and to revitalize our conventional forces. And I have no doubt that the Congress shares my commitment in this respect.

We shall implement this policy that I've outlined so briefly in three different ways: by maintaining strategic nuclear balance; by working closely with our NATO allies to strengthen and modernize our defenses in Europe; and by maintaining and developing forces to counter any threats to our allies and friends in our vital interests in Asia, the Middle East, and other regions of the world.

Let me take up each of these three in turn.

Our first and most fundamental concern is to prevent nuclear war. The horrors of nuclear conflict and our desire to reduce the world's arsenals of fearsome nuclear weapons do not free us from the need to analyze the situation objectively and to make sensible choices about our purposes and means.

Our strategic forces must be—and must be known to be—a match for the capabilities of the Soviets. They will never be able to use their nuclear forces to threaten, to coerce, or to blackmail us or our friends.

Our continuing major effort in the SALT talks taking place every day in Geneva are one means toward a goal of strategic nuclear stability.

We and the Soviets have already reached agreement on some basic points, although still others remain to be resolved. We are making good progress. We are not looking for a one-sided advantage. But before I sign any SALT agreement on behalf of the United States, I will make sure that it preserves the strategic balance, that we can independently verify Soviet compliance, and that we will be at least as strong, relative to the Soviet Union, as we would be without any agreement.

But in addition to the limits and reductions of a SALT II agreement, we must make other steps to protect the strategic balance. During the next decade, improvements in Soviet missiles can make our land-based missile forces in silos increasingly vulnerable to a Soviet first strike. Such an attack would amount to national suicide for the Soviet Union. But however remote, it is a threat against which we must constantly be on guard.

We have a superb submarine fleet, which is relatively invulnerable to attack when it's at sea, and we have under construction new Trident submarines and missiles which give our submarine ballistic missile force even greater range and security.

I have ordered rapid development and deployment of cruise missiles to reinforce the strategic value of our bombers. We are working on the M-X intercontinental ballistic missile and a Trident II submarine-launched ballistic missile to give us more options to respond to Soviet strategic deployments. If it becomes necessary to guarantee the clear invulnerability of our strategic deterrent, I shall not hesitate to take actions for full-scale deployment and development of these systems.

Our strategic defense forces, our nuclear forces, are a triad—land-based missiles, sea-based missiles, and air-breathing missiles, such as bombers and cruise missiles. Through the plans I've described, all three legs of this triad will be modernized and improved. Each will retain the ability, on its own, to impose devastating retaliation upon an aggressor.

For 30 years and more we've been committed to the defense of Europe, bound by the knowledge that Western Europe's security is vital to our own. We continue to cooperate with our NATO Allies in a strategy for flexible response, combining conventional forces and nuclear forces so that no aggressor can threaten the territory of Europe or its freedom, which in the past we have fought together to defend.

For several years we and our allies have been trying to negotiate mutual and balanced reduction in military forces in Europe with the Soviets and with the Warsaw Pact nations who are their allies. But in the meantime, the Soviets have continued to increase and to modernize their forces beyond a level necessary for defense. In the face of this excessive Soviet buildup, we and our NATO Allies have had to take important steps to cope with short-term vulnerabilities and to respond to long-term threats. We are significantly strengthening U.S. forces stationed in Western Europe and improving our ability to speed additional ground and air forces to the defense of Europe in a time of crisis.

Our European allies, who supply the major portion of NATO's conventional combat strength, are also improving their readiness and their reinforcement capabilities and their antitank defenses. The heads of the NATO governments will be here in our country attending a summit meeting in May, where we will address our long-term defense program which will expand and integrate more closely allied defense plans.

For many years, the United States has been a major world power. Our long-standing concerns encompass our own security interests and those of our allies and friends far beyond our own shores and Europe.

We have important historical responsibilities to enhance peace in East Asia, in the Middle East, in the Persian Gulf, and throughout our own hemisphere. Our preference in all these areas is to turn first to international agreements that reduce the overall level of arms and minimize the threat of conflict. But we have the will, and we will also maintain the capacity, to honor our commitments and to protect our interests in those critical areas.

In the Pacific, our effective security is enhanced by mutual defense treaties with our allies and by our friendship and co-operation with other Pacific nations.

Japan and South Korea, closely linked with the United States, are located geographically where vital interests of great powers converge. It is imperative that Northeast Asia remain stable. We will maintain and even enhance our military strength in this area, improving our air strength and reducing our ground forces, as the South Korean army continues to modernize and to increase its own capabilities.

In the Middle East and the region of the Indian Ocean, we seek permanent peace and stability. The economic health and well-being of the United States, Western Europe, Japan, depend upon continued access to the oil from the Persian Gulf area.

In all these situations, the primary responsibility for preserving peace and military stability rests with the countries of the region. But we shall continue to work with our friends and allies to strengthen their ability to prevent threats to their interests and to ours.

In addition, however, we will maintain forces of our own which can be called upon, if necessary, to support mutual defense efforts. The Secretary of Defense, at my direction, is improving and will maintain quickly deployable forces—air, land, and sea—to defend our interests throughout the world.

Arms control agreements are a major goal as instruments of our national security, but this will be possible only if we maintain appropriate military force levels. Reaching balanced, verifiable agreements with our adversaries can limit the cost of security and reduce the risk of war. But even then, we must—and we will—proceed efficiently with whatever arms programs our own security requires.

When I leave this auditorium, I shall be going to visit with the crew aboard one of our most modern nuclear-powered aircraft carriers in the Atlantic Ocean. The men and women of our Armed Forces remain committed, as able professionals and as patriotic Americans, to our common defense. They must stand constantly ready to fight, in the hope that through strength, combat will be prevented. We as Americans will always support them in their courageous vigil.

This has been a serious and a sober talk, but there is no cause for pessimism. We face a challenge, and we will do whatever is necessary to meet it. We will preserve and protect our country and continue to promote and to maintain peace around the world. This means that we shall have to continue to support strong and efficient military forces.

For most of human history, people have wished vainly that freedom and the flowering of the human spirit, which freedom nourishes, did not finally have to depend upon the force of arms. We, like our forebears, live in a time when those who would destroy liberty are restrained less by their respect for freedom itself than by their knowledge that those of us who cherish freedom are strong.

We are a great nation made up of talented people. We can readily afford the necessary costs of our military forces, as well as an increased level, if needed, to prevent any adversary from destabilizing the peace of the world. The money we spend on defense is not wasted any more than is the cost of maintaining a police force in a local community to keep the peace. This investment purchases our freedom to fulfill the worthy goals of our Nation.

Southerners, whose ancestors a hundred years ago knew the horrors of a homeland devastated by war, are particularly determined that war shall never come to us again. All Americans understand the basic lesson of history: that we need to be resolute and able to protect ourselves, to prevent threats and domination by others.

No matter how peaceful and secure and easy the circumstances of our lives now seem, we have no guarantee that the blessings will endure. That is why we will always maintain the strength which, God willing, we shall never need to use.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9 a.m. in Wait Chapel at the university.

Following his remarks, the President attended a reception for Representative Neal in the chapel building.

Winston-Salem, North Carolina

Informal Question-and-Answer Session With Reporters. March 17, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. I've just got a few minutes, and I thought I'd take a few questions from the local press.

VACANCY ON CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS

REPORTER. Mr. President, there has been a vacancy here on the circuit court of appeals for more than 10 months. I understand your nominating committee gave you five recommendations sometime in the fall. Have you made your decision? And if not, when will you?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know yet. That's something that I have not yet discussed in final form with the Attorney General. In all the circuit court appointments, however, in every place in the United States now, we have merit selection committees set up. And they give me the five names of the people that in their judgment—these are very distinguished people, as you know—would make the best circuit court judge. And from that list I will choose one of the nominees.

I've not yet had a chance to discuss this with the Attorney General. Before I can make a selection, we have to go through a long, detailed analysis of the person's financial background, have an FBI check, compare the candidates. It will not be delayed, but I can't give you an answer yet.

TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

Q. Mr. President, now that it is apparent that the Taft-Hartley Act isn't working, what are your options?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the Taft-Hartley Act is working. There's nothing in the Taft-Hartley Act that compels an individual miner to go into a mine and produce coal. But we have seen a rapid increase in coal production in recent days. We have no interruptions now with the nonunion miners producing coal. They were interrupted before.

We have an increase every day in the number of union miners who are going back into the mines. There's been no disruption recently, since the Taft-Hartley injunction, in the transfer of coal from one place to another when it is needed. And we are continuing to produce a substantial amount of coal additionally each day.

So, although the miners have not yet gone back to work, the Taft-Hartley Act is working. It's also brought to the bargaining table, without Federal mediators, which is good, the representatives of the operators and the miners. And they'd now worked out a third contract, which we hope will be accepted. So the Taft-Hartley Act is working.

ENHANCED RADIATION WEAPON

Q. Mr. President, you talked inside about maintaining a nuclear balance with the Soviet Union, and you talked a little bit about the SALT II negotiations going on. How does the Soviet demand that we stop production of neutron bombs fit into your wanting to maintain a balance?

THE PRESIDENT. The neutron bomb is not a strategic weapon; it's a tactical weapon. And it will not change at all the relative balance of strategic nuclear power.

The Soviets have used the neutron bomb issue primarily as a propaganda item. They are producing new weapons, like the SS-20, for instance, which has many, many more times the destructive power than any neutron bomb that's even being contemplated and does indeed disturb the balance of tactical forces between Eastern and Western Europe.

So, the neutron bomb issue has nothing to do with SALT and does not change the nuclear balance at all.

ANTI-SMOKING CAMPAIGN

Q. You spoke favorably of North Carolina as a tobacco-producing State. Does this mean you're calling Joseph Califano off the anti-smoking campaign?

THE PRESIDENT. No. Joe Califano has a responsibility, as the Secretary of HEW, to protect and enhance the health of American people. His responsibilities, as you know, are extremely broad. He is heading up a major effort, for instance, to reduce the adverse effect of drugs. Some drugs are very beneficial; some are very detrimental. I think we have a $275 million budget for the control of the adverse effects of drugs on the American health.

Alcohol is another major threat to American health. It's beneficial in some instances. It's well used—and legal—by many millions of Americans. We have a $175 million budget to reduce the adverse effects of alcohol.

Tobacco, in some instances, is damaging to our Nation's health, particularly among very young children and those who have respiratory diseases. We have only a $30 million budget on tobacco in HEW. This is all that Joe Califano asked for, and I think that's what he'll get. Two-thirds of that budget goes for research. And I don't think anyone who lives in Winston-Salem or North Carolina or Georgia or other States that produce tobacco would say that the research program in recent years has not been beneficial. So this is a well-balanced program.

I might say that it has nothing to do at all with the maintenance of the standard of living or the income or protection of the 600,000 American families who produce tobacco. Tobacco is Georgia's number one export item, and we ship most of our tobacco up to places like Winston-Salem to be produced into smoking products and other uses of tobacco.

So, I would say that there's a well-balanced campaign to protect the health of our Nation, which is Joe Califano's direct responsibility, on the one hand, and to preserve the health and stability of the tobacco industry, which is under Bob Bergland, Secretary of Agriculture, and myself.

I don't think there needs to be any concern about that, and nobody need fear the facts about tobacco use. Certainly, no one need fear the emphasis on research that will make the use of tobacco in the future even more safe than it has been in the past.

WILMINGTON 10

Q. Will the White House get involved with the Wilmington 10 case, intervene at all?

THE PRESIDENT. Not as far as I know. This is a State case, as you know. The only circumstances under which the Federal Government would get involved would be through the court system, if there was an appeal made to the Federal courts.

DESEGREGATION OF SOUTHERN UNIVERSITIES

Q. Will you get involved in the desegregation issue?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the desegregation issue applies to many Southern States—at the university level, I presume you mean.

Q. Yes.

THE PRESIDENT. When I became President and brought in my Cabinet, we were faced with a lawsuit—I think the man's name is Judge Pratt, in Washington—that required me and the Secretary of HEW to bring about a resolution of a dispute in the university system of some Southern States concerning the percentage of black students who go to school in white university component portions, and also vice versa. We've already reached agreement with Oklahoma, with Georgia, and with Arkansas, South Carolina, Florida. We are now working in the last stages of the resolution of the question with Virginia. This leaves North Carolina.

And Bill Friday and Governor Hunt and Bob Morgan and others, Steve,<sup>1</sup> have been to see me about this. We are trying to negotiate in good faith with the North Carolina university officials. And we have to comply with the Federal court orders, and we have to ensure that there are no remnants of discrimination against black people.

I think this is a commitment that I share with North Carolina people. How to go about resolving the differences in the court is something that is being negotiated in good faith.

When I came in from the airport this morning with your Governor, Jim Hunt, he expressed his conviction to me that this issue would be resolved very soon in the future. There's no incompatibility there. It's a lingering thing that has been going on in the courts for many years, and we hope to have it cleared up within the next few weeks.

Q. Do you think you'll grant an extension on the Monday deadline?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know anything about the legal aspects of it. I couldn't answer that.

Q. Califano's deadline is for Monday, though.

THE PRESIDENT. I can't answer that question. I don't know the answer.

Q. One more question. Have you discussed the subject with Secretary Califano since your meeting with Governor Hunt and Senator Morgan 2 weeks ago?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, we had a discussion about this Monday morning at the Cabinet meeting.

REPORTER. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. I wish I could stay longer, but I've got to go out and see how airplanes work on carriers.

NOTE: The question-and-answer session began at 9:50 a.m. outside Wait Chapel at Wake Forest University.

Savannah, Georgia

Remarks During a Visit Aboard the U.S.S. Dwight D. Eisenhower. March 17, 1978

In 1942, before many of you were born, I entered the Navy as an ROTC student at Georgia Tech. Later I went to the U.S. Naval Academy, and I was graduated in 1946 in the Class of 1947. And I then went to the U.S.S. Mississippi and the U.S.S. Wyoming, an old battleship that was doing modern experimental work.

Later I went into submarines and served on the U.S.S. Pomfret, later the U.S.S. K-1. And I was the commanding officer of the precommissioning crew of the U.S.S. Seawolf, the second atomic submarine that was ever built. Then I resigned from the Navy, and a number of years later I got a slight promotion to my new job. [Laughter]

But I'm still one of you. As President of the United States and as Commander in Chief, I've had a chance today to be reassured that our Nation is strong, that that strength is being used to preserve peace around the world, and that the destiny of our country rests on the shoulders of strong men like yourselves, who exemplify superb service and courage in one of the great ships of the greatest navy in the greatest country on Earth.

You can be truly proud of what you are doing. I know that for many of you this is your first tour at sea, and you serve on one of the newest and the best ships in the world. I've had a chance today to see how the ship operates, to study it before I came out this morning from an air base in Savannah. I've seen your nuclear reactor areas and the machinery areas, the flight deck operation. I've been on the bridge. I've seen your great crew maintain the U.S.S. Eisenhower and operate it in a means that would make the Navy proud had you been training for these specific duties for years and years, or even a whole career.

It's extremely important that the Eisenhower, as a major fighting component of our Nation's defense, be constantly ready for that purpose. We hope and we pray that the tremendous nuclear power and tactical power of our country won't have to be used in combat during our lifetime. And the best way to ensure that this is the case, that we do maintain peace for our own country, for our allies, for our friends, is to be strong. And as long as I'm Commander in Chief and President, I'll do the best I can to keep our country strong.

There is an inherent partnership between civilian leadership—myself, the Secretary of Defense, who's here, the Secretary of the Navy, who's here, Dr. Brzezinski, the head of my National Security Council, who is here—on the one hand, along with the Congress, and you, the fighting men of our Armed Forces.

There's also a close partnership that's required and certainly has been exhibited today between the ship's crew and the air combat fighters who have exhibited their superb capabilities to me and to you today.

We also have seen the supporting ships, and I know that you see the importance to a carrier operation to have that close teamwork. The Nation depends on you, and I'm proud to be the Commander in Chief of a group of men as well-qualified, as deeply dedicated, as patriotic and courageous as all of you.

On behalf of the people of the United States, I would like to thank you for what you do for our country and for freedom and peace around the world.

God bless every one of you. I'm proud of you.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

Statement Issued Following a District Court Denial To Extend the Temporary Restraining Order. March 17, 1978

The court decision shows that the country has responded well in dealing with the effects of the coal strike. We have had some success in moving coal, and the Taft-Hartley temporary restraining order has aided in opening up hundreds of coal mines.

The judge has found that as of now a national emergency no longer exists. Another hearing will be held on March 28.

I continue to hope that the collective bargaining process will be successful and bring about an end to the strike. We will be monitoring coal shipments closely and will be prepared to seek a permanent injunction at the March 28 hearing if a negotiated settlement has not been reached by that time.

Savannah, Georgia

Remarks at the Hibernian Society Dinner. March 17, 1978

President Gignilliat, Senator Talmadge, Senator Nunn, Congressman Bo Ginn, Mayor Rousakis, and fellow Irishmen:

As many of you know, this is one of the few times in the last 10 years that I have missed a St. Patrick's Day Parade in Savannah, and it was a sad day for me because of that reason. But the memories of past St. Patrick's Days in Savannah have left an indelible impression on my mind and on my heart. I remember how difficult it was for me to get an invitation to the Hibernian Society banquet. [Laughter]

I remember the first year that I was running for Governor of Georgia with a great number of well-known and distinguished opponents. Toby Buttimer was in a car pretty much at the end of the line in the parade. He asked me to ride with him. And when I approached the starting point of the parade, a very irate minor official among the parade marshals came forward and said, "Young man, what right do you have to ride in the parade?" It's something that I'll never forget. His name was Nick Kenny. [Laughter] And I sincerely hope as President that you've not let him have anything to do with the parade since then. [Laughter]

There's only one city in Georgia about which I've ever made this statement: Savannah's my favorite city of all, because you present to Georgia and to the rest of the world a unique and very fine combination of pride in the past—preserving what's right and decent and enjoyable and harmonious and inspirational—with no fear of the future and making the most of the present. And I'm very proud that you've invited me as President of the United States to come back and share this honor with you.

I've been honored in many ways in the last number of months. One of the greatest honors that I've had has been to work very closely with the distinguished leaders of the Congress. And I would like to recognize in particular the superb courage and leadership and inspiration that has been provided to our own State and to the country by Senator Talmadge and Senator Nunn, on the platform with me tonight.

I also feel particularly close to Toby Buttner. As you know, if I had as many sons and grandchildren as Toby Buttner, I would have been President 4 years earlier than I was. [Laughter] But in a way, in addition to his great family—I have two grandsons of my own—there are some other things that bind me together with Toby. As you know, he's a wholesale beer distributor. And my brother, Billy, is a wholesale beer consumer. [Laughter]

I hope that you won't mention to Billy my comment about him, because when I first was elected President, I made some humorous remark about Billy one night at a banquet, and the next day the national news media representatives went to Billy's filling station and said, "What do you think about your brother?" And he said, "Well, I'd rather not comment." And they said, "Well, I'm not talking about his character or his ability as a campaigner or a President, just some minor characteristic of his." And Billy said, "Well, I'd just rather not comment on my brother Jimmy." They said, "What do you think about Jimmy's smile?" And Billy thought for a while, and he said, "Well, it reminds me of a fox, intoxicated, licking sorghum syrup out of a live light socket." [Laughter]

So, I would appreciate you keeping harmony between me and my brother. [Laughter]

Another thing I like about the Irish, and the Hibernian members particularly, is that you are perfectly willing to go from the sublime to the ridiculous. Last year Bishop Fulton Sheen was your main speaker. This year, as the first choice—I was second choice—you invited Hamilton Jordan. I thought the same thing about sublime to the ridiculous the first time I observed that you began your festivities at the beautiful cathedral with Mass and wound up here, at night, with just the opposite. [Laughter]

Hamilton, really, and all of us have suffered some from the news coverage. As you know, in Washington we haven't been the favorites there. Jody Powell, Griffin Bell, Bert Lance, myself, Jack Watson, Andy Young, and other Georgians have not come out completely unscathed. And sometimes we can't understand it.

I remember a couple of weeks ago I felt very sorry for Hamilton at the latest episode. I didn't want to complain to him personally, because I knew he was already embarrassed. He came by to see me, and I was a little surprised. He said, "Mr. President, I want to talk to you for a few minutes. I don't understand Washington." And he said, "I get my name spread all across the Washington Post in headlines for doing the same thing we used to do every night in Savannah." [Laughter]

So in some ways, you've been good training for us. One of the news people observed, as I was leaving Washington to get in the helicopter to come to the airport to come down here, said, "Mr. President, I think you've contributed more to St. Patrick's Day than any other President that's ever lived." And I said, "I really appreciate that." He said, "Yes, your whole administration is green." [Laughter]

At least they're learning how to speak southern in Washington. That's good. [Laughter]

As all of you know, my family has great credentials as Irishmen. We came here as a result of the great peanut famine. [Laughter] I've always felt very close to the rest of you who came here accordingly.

I have been surprised at some of the characteristics of the President. I thought that when I got elected to the highest office in the land that there would be some special characteristics about it. I haven't found that to be true.

Yesterday morning, the Ambassador from Ireland came to tell me that they had just flown in from Ireland some shamrock especially for me to wear on St. Patrick's Day. And I put it on. I've only worn it 2 days, and even pinned to the lapel of the President, it wilted. [Laughter]

This has not been the only time I've been disappointed. I have been dealing lately, as you know, with a very difficult subject, the Panama Canal treaties. It's not been one of the most popular subjects that I've endorsed. And I called a couple of months ago a kind of a staff meeting and said, "What can I do to boost my spirits about this difficult but very important subject?" And my staff said, "Why don't we have a mass meeting at the White House?" So I called a mass meeting. Both of us were glad the other one came. [Laughter]

It was one of the worst days I ever had. I went home that night. The only way I could relax the tension that I felt as President was to take a warm bath in the tub. I got in the tub; my Ivory soap sank. [Laughter]

As Senator Talmadge well knows, we've also been afflicted in Washington with farmer strike members, who came to express their displeasure with crop yields and weather and farm prices. Last night I was writing some notes about my serious part of my speech to be made to you. And when I went to sleep, I had a nightmare.

I just thought to myself, what if all the Irishmen in Savannah rode on tractors? [Laughter] I can see Savannah after a St. Patrick's Day parade under those circumstances. The highest building in town would be 2 feet high.

We've tried, as you know, to do the best we could with some very difficult subjects. I have been pleased on occasion. We've had a coal contract every week. That's boosted my spirits some. [Laughter]

But one of the main things that has boosted my spirits has been the knowledge that many of you who helped me become President still have confidence in me and my administration, give me your support, and I hope you'll continue to do so.

We've not been afraid to address difficult questions. When I became President a little more than a year ago, out of every hundred persons who were looking for a job, eight couldn't find work. And with the help of the Congress during this last year, 1977, we had a net increase in jobs in the United States of more than 4 million. We've never had that much increase before. The unemployment rate has dropped 2 percent. And it shows that if American people have a chance to work, they'd rather work.

We've also begun, as Sam Nunn said, to address the urban problems. My wife met tonight, as I have met before, with some of the leaders in Savannah who initiated on their own—private citizens, black and white, rich and not so rich—an effort, 15 or so years ago, to rejuvenate what is inherently one of the most beautiful cities on Earth, that was in danger of being embarrassed with the deterioration of your own downtown area. And since then, you've set an example for the whole Nation to emulate, and in our new urban policy, we are using Savannah as an example of what people can do if they're willing to take advantage of what God gives them.

We're a nation of people who believe in peace. We like to get along with our neighbors. We want to protect our women and children and our future generations from the threat of nuclear war, and so far we've been successful—one of the first times in modern history that in the first year or 18 months of a new administration we haven't had American soldiers dying somewhere on Earth.

But if God gives me strength and judgment, I pray, joined by you, that we can preserve and enhance peace around the world—not based on weakness, but based on strength.

Today I made a speech in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Wake Forest University, about national security and then came out this afternoon, flew from Savannah by helicopter to land on the greatest warship in the world, a brand new atomic-powered aircraft carrier, 95,000 tons, the U.S.S. Eisenhower, operating off your coast. And I saw there a superb crew, young crew—the average age, 19½ years old.

More than half of the crew, before the Eisenhower was commissioned last fall, had never been on a ship. And we watched the most complicated, challenging military exercises that I have ever seen, and they went off with absolute perfection. And as the President of our country, as Commander in Chief, I realized even more intently that the best way to peace is to be strong. And as long as I'm President, our country's going to stay strong.

The South has known better than any other part of our great Nation what it means to be devastated and occupied as a result of war. And we are determined to maintain the leadership that's been shown by Senator Talmadge, by Bo Ginn, by Sam Nunn, who's taken the place in every way of the great Senator Dick Russell, that our country will have armed forces adequate to protect our country.

Another thing I learned when I was campaigning around our Nation was that as a result of the Vietnam war, as a result of Watergate, as a result of mistakes made and revealed in the CIA, that there had been a loss of spirit and confidence, there had been a loss of respect and a sense of partnership between the American people and our government. And I felt that something needed to be done, not only to correct those mistakes and to deal in such a way that those would not be repeated but to hoist a banner that would make our people proud to follow.

And I searched back in the early days of Savannah, Georgia, and the rest of the Thirteen Colonies and tried to understand what our people stood for who wrote the Declaration of Independence and who wrote the Constitution of the United States. And I knew then and I know now that our country always has to be the well-recognized leader and bulwark in protecting basic human dignity, basic human liberty, basic self-respect, known by the words "human rights." And they will be protected also as long as I'm in Washington and you give me your support.

I had a lot of criticism by some of the cynics in Washington and the national news media about saying that I wanted a government that was as good and decent and honest and truthful as the American people. But I sense among our people a hunger for that kind of knowledge that you need not ever be ashamed again, recognizing that government is not infallible, that we do make mistakes, recognizing that the Federal Government cannot and ought not to do everything to shape and control our lives, understanding that the Federal Government ought to be simple, well-organized.

Let us alone to manage the things that we can manage individually, in a family, in a neighborhood, in a city, in a State, but at the same time setting an example and lending a helping hand with taxpayers' dollars in an efficient way.

We're trying now with the Congress help to reorganize the basic structure of our Government to make sure not only that people outside Government have a chance to work but that people in Government have a chance to do a good job and are required to do a good job, because most of them want to. And I hope you'll help me with Government reorganization, civil service reform, welfare reform, tax reform, a cutting down of paperwork and redtape, to make your Government simple and workable so you can understand and control it.

I'd just like to say one more thing. The problems that face any President of this country are extremely complicated, they are difficult, and they are a great personal burden when you share the responsibility for the lives of more than 200 million Americans. But I've enjoyed this responsibility, because I have a sense that there is a partnership between me and people like you all over the world.

I don't know all the answers. But I believe that I will be right in my judgment, I will be fair and enlightened in my decisions. I will be inspired on occasion to restore and even to enhance the greatness of our country to the extent that I stay close to people who are interested, as are you, in the finest aspects of government in the greatest nation on Earth.

We have unresolved problems. We need a national energy policy. We need a comprehensive Government reform. We need to have a settlement of the major labor disputes like the coal strike. We need to have a SALT agreement with the Soviet Union to cut down on the threat of nuclear holocaust that might destroy us all. We need to have a ban against the testing of atomic explosives, in our country, the Soviet nation, Britain, France, and China. We need to have a prohibition against the testing or the evolution of explosives among the many nations on Earth that don't presently belong to the nuclear club. And we need to have again a government that's close to you.

There are many questions that need to be resolved that might take a long time. But I believe that it's best not to ignore them any longer. I'll do the best I can not to disappoint you.

Many of you are responsible for my being in the White House. And you have a responsibility to assure and to help me do a good job. And I hope you'll never let me down. I'll never let you down. And we, together, will assure that we will represent the United States of America, the greatest nation on Earth.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:10 p.m. at the Savannah Civic Center. In the opening portion of his remarks, he referred to Thomas Gignilliat, president of the society, John P. Rousakis, mayor of Savannah, and Toby Buttmer, chairman of the society's speakers committee.

Earlier in the evening, the President visited a reception for former campaign workers from the Savannah area at the DeSoto Hilton Hotel.

Visit of Prime Minister Menahem Begin of Israel

*Remarks at the Welcoming Ceremony,
March 21, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. It's with great pleasure that I, on behalf of the people of the United States, welcome to our country again Prime Minister Begin of the great and courageous state of Israel.

Our mutual commitment to the search for a permanent peace in the Middle East is exemplified by the fact that this is our third meeting personally within the last year. In 2 months we will all be celebrating the 30th anniversary of the founding of the nation of Israel.

We have a commitment to the preservation of Israel as a nation, to the security of Israel, the right of the Israeli people, who have suffered so much, to live in peace that is absolutely permanent and unshakable.

The ties that bind the people of the United States and the people of Israel together, the ties of blood, kinship, ties of history, ties of common religious beliefs, the dream, centuries old, of the founding of the new nation of Israel have been realized. But the dream that the new nation of Israel should be guaranteed a right to live in peace has not yet been realized for its people and those who love Israel around the world.

This dream has been prevented by the shackles of potential war, and have prevented the pursuit of justice and the reduction in human suffering which has so long been a characteristic of Jews everywhere.

Since 1967 we've been working in a concerted way with the leaders of the Israeli Government, trying to bring the prospects and the realization of peace. For 10 years, under the broad scope of United Nations Resolution 242, this search has been going on in a concerted way.

And last November, with the dramatic welcoming of President Sadat to Jerusalem by Prime Minister Begin and the Israeli people, the hopes of the world were raised.

Those bright days of new opportunity have now been clouded over, and the recent cowardly and unjustified attack by terrorists on innocent civilians in Israel have resulted in the loss of hundreds of lives and tens of thousands of people who are now homeless.

We still hope and pray for an end to the disputes which would almost instantaneously transform the lives of the people of the Middle East into ones of hope, friendship, trade, prosperity, brotherhood, and peace.

Those hopes have not and will not be abandoned. Israel is now, militarily and in many other ways, stronger than ever before in history, and with this strength in physical terms and with this strength of the leadership of Israel rests the prospects for a resolution of the difficulties that have so long divided the people of the Middle East.

Peace can come from a guarantee of security, and our staunch friendship for Israel will continue to be a major element in this foundation for progress.

We welcome this morning Prime Minister Begin, a man of destiny who has had thrust upon his able shoulders the responsibilities for the future of his own people, of the people in the Middle East, and indeed, of those who love peace around the world.

Mr. Prime Minister, you are welcome to our country.

THE PRIME MINISTER. Mr. President, I thank you for your kindness and hospitality in inviting me again to the White House, together with my friend and colleague the Foreign Minister, Moshe Dayan, to conduct important talks with you, Secretary of State, and your advisers about the main issues concerning the Middle East and the peacemaking process.

Admittedly, Mr. President, these are times of trial. Only 10 days ago Israel got another reminder of what character is the implacable enemy she faces, what is its designs and methods toward men, women, and children, citizens of our country.

We believe that we shall overcome, because this is our duty to our people and to humanity, and with our deep faith in freedom and in justice, I can say again we shall overcome.

Israel contributed seriously to the peacemaking process in the Middle East. For the first time the Government of Israel elaborated and produced a detailed peace plan, a most forthcoming plan. And I brought this plan, after my visit to you, Mr. President, in December, also, during the Ismailia conference, to the President of Egypt.

May I be permitted to say, Mr. President, that the atmosphere which prevailed in December during our conference and later on at Ismailia was of understanding, of real friendship, of openness. The same applies to the meeting in Jerusalem between President Sadat and myself. Those are encounters of the most positive character, and we can only pray today that the spirit of Jerusalem, of Washington, and of Ismailia be renewed.

This will mean real progress toward establishment of peace in the Middle East—our dream, our innermost wish.

Mr. President, you also stressed the friendship of the United States for my country. I am grateful. I believe this friendship between the American and the Israeli peoples is everlasting, and we find proof time and again of this mutual friendship.

I wish again to thank you for the sentiments of deep humanity you expressed in your cable to me after that unspeakable atrocity 10 days ago.

On the basis of such understanding we shall continue to build our common future as free, democratic nations, and with the spirit of those days, which I mentioned, we shall also make real progress towards the establishment of a just and durable, real peace in the Middle East for which we yearn and which is so necessary to Israel and to the Arab countries.

Again, Mr. President, I thank you for your wonderful hospitality on behalf of the Foreign Minister, all our advisers, and myself, and I do hope that our talks today and tomorrow in the White House will deepen the friendship between our two countries.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:35 a.m. on the South Lawn of the White House.

National Farm Safety Week, 1978

Proclamation 4556. March 21, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

All Americans, and a sizeable portion of the rest of the world's people, depend upon American agriculture for much of their food and fiber. Anything that diminishes the ability of farmers and ranchers to meet these vital needs is of great concern. Farm accidents are among the costliest impediments to production and cause great suffering and economic loss.

Accidents can destroy the lives and bodies, as well as the economic resources of farm families. Neither the individuals involved, nor the Nation, can afford these losses. Farm safety leaders believe that most farm accidents could be prevented with greater care in controlling hazards and unsafe practices—the same kind of dedicated, careful management and attention to detail that has made possible our incredible increase in agricultural production.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the week beginning July 25, 1978, as National Farm Safety Week. I call upon the men and women who operate the Nation's farms and ranches to regard safety as an integral part of all their activities.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-first day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

JIMMY CARTER

Energy Emergency in Indiana

Statement on Extending the Energy Emergency Determination. March 21, 1978

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Indiana, pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I determined on February 15, 1978, that a regional energy emergency existed in the State of Indiana of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate and sulfur dioxide control regulations and regulations governing reserves of low sulfur coal under the Indiana Air Quality Implementation Plan might be necessary. I ordered the determination to be in effect for not more than 30 days unless I rescinded it before that time or extended it. Because of continuing energy supply problems throughout the State, I hereby extend the regional energy emergency determination for the State of Indiana for a second 30-day period. During this extension, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Indiana on a case-by-case basis and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to continue to act with due care if he further suspends any air pollution regulations under the authority provided by the extension of this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health.

NOTE: The Presidential determination is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

National Teacher of the Year

Remarks at the Presentation Ceremony for Elaine Barbour. March 21, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. This is one of the pleasant experiences that a President has, to recognize excellence of achievement in our country.

The selection of the National Teacher of the Year is a ceremony that takes place every year, which is an inspiration, not only to those who depend upon the schools for a vital force in our lives and those of our children but also because we recognize that to choose one superb teacher from the tens of thousands who serve is really a recognition of them all.

Elaine Barbour has been chosen this year as the outstanding teacher of our Nation. She was born in Kentucky, educated there and in Colorado. She taught in West Virginia, as well as Colorado, and because of her excellence and her ability to portray what America is, she also went during the summers in Sierra Leone and to Ethiopia to carry her superb teaching capability to those people there.

She recognizes, as demonstrated by her success in the classroom, some fundamental principles of education. As a sixth-grade teacher in Colorado she has especially benefited from the fact that children are different; teaching instruction has to be different for each child. And she's brought a vivid awareness of life to the classroom environment.

She has encouraged her students, for instance, to take an old dilapidated, unpainted building and to turn it into a place of beauty. She's encouraged her students to dig a pond and to study aquatic life there and to let them have a real sense of the out-of-doors.

She's had a chance to plant more than 1,200 trees and to transfer to the school class area an old log cabin and to have the students help to erect it. It's now going to be used as a museum where the children can take in their discoveries of God's natural beauty and present it in an effective way as an additional teaching characteristic for the classroom experience.

I think what she's done has introduced her students in a practical human way to God's world, to one another, to herself, as their teacher, to the out-of-doors, and in the process, she's involved in an exemplary fashion the citizens of the community of Montrose and also the parents as part of the learning process of their children.

So, you can see that in a special fashion she has exemplified the finest aspect of teaching in our great Nation.

I'd like to read this presentation before I give it to her.

"Elaine Barbour is recognized for achievement, creative excellence, and dedicated service to the youth and schools of the Nation, exemplifying the finest ideals and the highest standards of the teaching profession as 1978 National Teacher of the Year, selected by a committee of distinguished national educators in the 27th Annual National Teacher of the Year Awards Program and presented this 21st day of March, 1978, by the sponsors, Encyclopaedia Britannica Companies, Ladies Home Journal, and the Council of State School Officers."

I am very proud to present this award as the National Teacher of the Year to Elaine Barbour on behalf of the people of our country.

And also I'd like to present an apple for the teacher. This crystal apple has also become part of the ceremony: "The 1978 Teacher of the Year for creative excellence and dedicated service, presented to Elaine Barbour at the White House."

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:15 p.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House.

Visit of Prime Minister Begin of Israel

White House Statement on the First Meeting, March 21, 1978

President Carter and Prime Minister Begin met with their advisers this morning in the Cabinet Room for 2 hours.

The President was accompanied by the Vice President; Secretary of State Cyrus Vance; the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs, Zbigniew Brzezinski; State Department Director for Intelligence and Research Harold Saunders; Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs Alfred Atherton; United States Ambassador to Israel Samuel Lewis; and NSC staff member William Quandt.

The Prime Minister was accompanied by Israeli Ambassador to the United States Simcha Dinitz; Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan; Attorney General Aharon Barak; Legal Advisor Meir Rosenne; Director, Prime Minister's Bureau Yehiel Kadishai; Military Secretary to the Prime Minister Brigadier General Ephraim Poran; Advisor to the Prime Minister Yehuda Avner; and Director, Israeli Supply Mission, New York and Designate: Director General for Foreign Affairs Josef Ciechanover.

The President and Prime Minister had a thorough discussion on the issues that must be resolved in order to assure continuity and progress in the peace negotiations. In particular, they have reviewed the status of negotiation on the Declaration of Principles for a comprehensive peace, and they have examined the question of the West Bank and Gaza.

The President reiterated his pledge to the parties to support and assist in every way the process of peace negotiations and reaffirmed the unswerving American commitment to the security of Israel. He expressed the view that, despite the recent increase in violence in the area, there remains a deep conviction that renewed progress toward peace is essential and that the door to progress remains open. He urged all those involved to seize this opportunity and to make the historic decisions on which peace now depends.

The President and the Prime Minister will meet again this evening and tomorrow.

pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I determined on February 18, 1978, that a regional energy emergency existed in the State of Kentucky of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate and sulfur dioxide control regulations under the Kentucky Air Quality Implementation Plan might be necessary. I ordered the determination to be in effect for not more than 30 days unless I rescinded it before that time or extended it. Because of continuing energy supply problems throughout the State, I hereby extend the regional energy emergency determination for the State of Kentucky for a second 30-day period. During this extension, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Kentucky on a case-by-case basis and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to continue to act with due care if he further suspends any air pollution regulations under the authority provided by the extension of this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health.

NOTE: The statement was released on March 22.

The Presidential determination of March 21 is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 24, 1978.

Appalachian Trail Bill

Statement on Signing H.R. 8803 Into Law. March 22, 1978

The bill I have signed into law, H.R. 8803, gives the American people and their elected leaders the means to protect the future of the Appalachian Trail.

The Appalachian Trail was conceived more than 50 years ago by Benton MacKaye, an eminent conservationist. By the time of World War II, a massive volunteer effort by concerned citizens had made the trail a reality. It now extends over 2,000 miles through 14 States from Maine to Georgia, and volunteer effort is still the primary means by which it is maintained.

Although much has been done to protect the Appalachian Trail over the years, the Congress and my administration recognized that more needed to be done. The result was this bill, to which Representatives Byron, Burton, and Sebelius, Senators Abourezk, Durkin, and Mathias, Secretary Andrus and Assistant Secretary Herbst made especially significant contributions.

The trail runs through national parks and forests, but it also runs through more than 650 miles of private land. H.R. 8803 provides increased authority and funding for the Secretary of the Interior to acquire lands to protect parts of the trail threatened by development and to relocate portions of the trail along its original route. Just as importantly, the bill requires the Secretary of the Interior—after consultation with the Advisory Council for the Appalachian National Scenic Trail, the Governors of the affected States, and the Appalachian Trail Conference (a coalition of citizens groups)—to develop and submit to the Congress by 1980 a comprehensive plan for land acquisition and for the management, development, and use of the Appalachian Trail.

The enactment of this bill into law means that the Federal Government can now work more effectively with the States and citizens to provide the protection necessary to preserve—and ultimately enhance—this important part of our American heritage.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 8803 is Public Law 95-248, approved March 21.

United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. March 22, 1978

One year ago, in my inaugural address, I pledged “perseverance and wisdom in our efforts to limit the world’s armaments to those necessary for each nation’s own domestic safety.” The report which I am transmitting is an account of the actions taken in 1977 by the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency towards the fulfillment of that pledge.

The Arms Control and Disarmament Agency is the focal point of my Administration’s efforts to reach arms control agreements through negotiations and to develop policies which will lead to reduced worldwide reliance on weaponry. This central role was legislated by the Congress seventeen years ago, and it is entirely in keeping with my concept of how these objectives should be pursued.

The arms control policy and goals set forth in this report reflect my own commitment to the achievement of these important objectives. In the nuclear age, when war could bring catastrophic consequences, our national security policy must include efforts to control arms, as well as to provide for our military defense. The two are complementary activities, both necessary to achieve our overall objectives—peace and security for this Nation and the world.

When necessary, we will maintain our security and protect our interests by strengthening our military capabilities. Whenever possible, however, we seek to enhance our security through arms control. Our security and the security of all nations can be better served through equitable and verifiable limits on arms than through unbridled competition. The United States has chosen arms control as an essential means of promoting its security. As we pursue this continuing course, we must convince other nations that arms control is in their interest as well. Their cooperation is vital if balanced arms control agreements are to be achieved.

Ensuring the stability of the nuclear relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union is the most urgent arms control task today. In the longer term, however, I believe that preventing the worldwide proliferation of nuclear weapons may be of equal significance. Other pressing problems, such as the worldwide traffic in vast quantities of sophisticated conventional arms and regional arms buildups, have far-reaching implications for our own peace and security and that of the rest of the world. As such, I have taken steps to restrict U.S. arms transfers and to gain the cooperation of other suppliers in curbing worldwide sales.

The challenge of preventing war—and redirecting resources from arsenals of war to human needs—is the greatest challenge confronting mankind in this last quarter of the twentieth century. It is a challenge I accept.

United States Court of Claims

Nomination of Daniel M. Friedman To Be Chief Judge. March 22, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Daniel M. Friedman, of Washington, D.C., to be Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Claims. He would replace Wilson Cowen, who has retired.

Friedman was born February 8, 1916, in New York City. He received an A.B. from Columbia College in 1933 and an LL.B. from Columbia Law School in 1940. He served in the U.S. Army from 1942 to 1946.

From 1940 to 1942, Friedman practiced law, and from 1946 to 1951, he was on the legal staff of the Securities and Exchange Commission. From 1951 to 1959, he was an attorney in the Appellate Section of the Antitrust Division at the Justice Department.

Since 1959 Friedman has worked in the Office of the Solicitor General at the Justice Department, and since 1968 he has been First Deputy Solicitor General.

Visit of Prime Minister Begin of Israel

Remarks on the Departure of the Prime Minister. March 22, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. The visit of Prime Minister Begin and his discussions with me and the other Israeli and American officials has been very important. These 2 short days have been spent in a comprehensive exchange of views on the Middle East peace process. I have reiterated to the Prime Minister the profound support of all Americans for the security and the well-being of the state of Israel as it approaches its 30th year of independence.

We share Israel's pride in this milestone.

Israel's achievements are uniquely its own, a mixture of high idealism, ingenuity, and self-reliance. Americans have always found an echo of our own frontier past in Israel's energy and its strong individualism.

Thirty years ago, Israel was born into uncertainty and a threatening future. Since that time, Israel has suffered more hardship and tragedy than most nations must endure in a century. Yet today, Israel stands as a powerful nation, fiercely independent and determined to forge its own political destiny.

The Israel of 1978 is strong and more secure militarily than at any time in its history. We in America take satisfaction in the knowledge that we have contributed in some small measure to the realization of that dream of strength. We have stood beside Israel from the earliest moments of its birth, and there we shall continue to stand.

This visit by Prime Minister Begin has had only one purpose, to explore the ways in which we can build our past cooperation into a true partnership for peace. In the course of these meetings, Prime Minister Begin and I have had an opportunity to review in considerable detail the present situation and our progress to date on a comprehensive settlement of the Middle East conflict.

As always, these discussions have been detailed and frank, as is to be expected from two partners in the peace process.

I have reviewed for Prime Minister Begin my recent discussions with President Sadat. And I have shared with him my assessment of what will be required to regain momentum in the common search for peace.

I emphasized to him the importance of reaffirming that all of the principles of Security Council Resolution 242 must apply to all fronts if peace negotiations are to succeed.

In the past few months, we have had a glimpse of what a peaceful future might hold. We have come to appreciate what it can mean in terms of human contact, direct contact, and liberation from the dangerous, self-defeating patterns of the past.

As Prime Minister Begin returns home, he will carry with him our hopes and our dreams for a future free of the bitterness and violence of the past generation.

We know that he faces both a challenge and an opportunity—the challenge of providing security for his people, and the opportunity to achieve that security through a true and enduring peace. It is our conviction that this opportunity must not be allowed to slip into the cycle of hatred and violence which has characterized the history of the Middle East for the past 30 years and which we have witnessed again over the last 2 weeks.

We pray with him that all peoples of the Middle East will come to realize that another generation must not be allowed to grow up learning only war and despair.

Prime Minister Begin does not return alone to his own country. He carries with him our deepest hopes and prayers. We stand with him as he faces the challenges and the opportunities of Israel's great dream.

At this historic moment, when peace still seems far away, we rely on the vision and the humanity of a great people, born of great suffering, to triumph once again.

In this mission, Prime Minister Begin carries with him the good wishes and the constant support of all the people of the United States.

Mr. Prime Minister, we wish you Godspeed.

THE PRIME MINISTER. Mr. President, I thank you wholeheartedly for the good words and the expressions of friendship and understanding for our people and country. This is a new reaffirmation of the mutual, deep amity between our peoples and our countries.

As you said, Mr. President, our people had to suffer much and to fight for its liberation and for its independence. Great sacrifices were given so that we can have the land of our forefathers to build up for our children. But when I stand here in Washington in the presence of the President of the United States, our great friend and ally, it is my duty as the elected Prime Minister of Israel to remind public opinion of the fact that Israel is still the only country in the world against which there is a written document to the effect that it must disappear.

There is no country, either large or small, or even the smallest, against which there is such a document, demanding, saying publicly, that country should not exist, should be wiped off the map, and behind those people who carry out also the abominable acts to prove that they mean it, there is an alignment of many Arab states, armed to the teeth by the Soviet Union, and sometimes getting modern weapons also from the West.

This is the decisive problem we face, which is called, sometimes, security. I would like to reaffirm what security means to us. It means the preservation of the lives of our elderly people, of our women and our children—the lives which are threatened daily—so that to make sure that the future generations, as ours, will live in a free and independent country. This is the great issue we face, or continue to face.

Now, Mr. President, what is our contribution to the peacemaking process? Yes, indeed, when I learned that President Sadat is ready to come to Jerusalem, I immediately sent out to him an invitation to come, and then his visit took place.

After that, President Sadat, in the wake of my visit to you in December, Mr. President, invited me to come to Ismailia. Both meetings of Jerusalem and Ismailia were characterized by the spirit of friendship and openness. We knew, President Sadat and I, that we have differences of opinion. But we both agreed that we shall discuss them freely, we shall negotiate them, because such negotiations are the soul of any attempt to reach an agreement and to conclude a peace treaty.

That was the spirit. In that spirit, Israel contributed three documents, making it possible to deal with the question how to reach and conclude peace treaties. We made a peace proposal in two parts—one concerning the bilateral relations between Egypt and Israel, and the other, the full administrative autonomy for our neighbors, the Palestinian Arabs residing in Judea, Samaria, and the Gaza Strip.

It was a real contribution to the thinking and making of peace, positive, constructive; and so it was appreciated here, Mr. President, and elsewhere, when those two documents were produced, a forthcoming proposal to make peace, a long step forward, a great deal of flexibility, a notable contribution, to quote the public statements.

We added another document, a declaration of principles which should make it possible for everybody to join in the peace effort. There are three Israeli documents contributing to go forward in the process of reaching peace in the Middle East. We only ask to negotiate. We said it is a basis and a fair basis for negotiations. There may be counterproposals. We shall also negotiate them. This is the process.

Mr. President, may I express our hope that this will happen, indeed, and the spirit of the Jerusalem, the Washington, and the Ismailia meeting will be renewed, and in that spirit of understanding and openness, the negotiations will be resumed.

As I will be leaving your great country, Mr. President, I will take with me the expressions of your friendship, of your humanity, of your understanding of our problems. We are very grateful to you. Israel is a very small country. The United States is a mighty world power. But there are bonds which tie us together in understanding and friendship which derive from our tradition, from our faith in divine providence, from our love of liberty, from our devotion to democracy.

These are the values which make life worthwhile to live. And therefore, as we say to each other from time to time, we are not only friends, we are partners, we are allies. And in this spirit, in the faith that we shall continue our partnership for peace, for liberty, for the welfare of our peoples and of mankind, I take leave of you, Mr. President, expressing my deep gratitude for your hospitality, for your warmth, and for your friendship.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12:25 p.m. on the South Lawn of the White House.

National Commission on the Observance of International Women's Year, 1975

Remarks at a Reception Honoring the Commission. March 22, 1978

First of all, let me say that I'm very delighted as President of the United States to welcome you to the White House on behalf of me and Rosalynn and the rest of our family. Rosalynn and Judy and Midge, three members of my family, attended the Houston conference. And they were delighted at the tremendous success that you ensured in bringing to the forefront of American consciousness the determination and competence, idealism, persistence, courage, sound judgment of the women of our Nation.

It was potentially an explosive situation and one that could have brought a great deal of disharmony and discouragement to those who have been in the forefront of the fight for women's rights. But under the superb leadership of Bella Abzug, and with your help, the conference was a complete success.

I want to be sure that I as President and my entire Cabinet, the members of my official and personal family, are successful in keeping the spirit of Houston alive.

I think the most crucial assignment that falls on the shoulders of you and me and all those I named is to ensure the passage of the equal rights amendment, which, as you know, is not going to be easy. [Laughter]

The fervor and the commitment and the success of even a conference so important as the one at Houston is, comparatively speaking, a transient success. Even if we implement through legislative act and through governmental decision all the points that you raised at Houston as goals for accomplishment and fail in the permanent amendment of the United States Constitution, which will guarantee women's rights, our success will not be complete. And I believe that it's necessary for us to redouble our efforts during the coming 12 months.

I have asked my own domestic staff under Stu Eizenstat, working closely with Midge Costanza, with the members of my Cabinet—Juanita Kreps, Pat Harris, Joe Califano, Ray Marshall, and Brock Adams, others have assigned their top people ever since the Houston conference was concluded—to begin implementation of the plan of action which you completed.

We now have a period of 4 months to make a complete report to the Congress about the progress that has been concluded. Without trying to preempt what I know Chairman Bella Abzug will say, we have had some successes already. The Senate has passed a bill relating to pregnancy disability. It's now in the House. We're fighting to get it passed.

In October, I signed a bill to Congress that passed concerning child abuse. I signed a bill against child pornography in February of this year.

We are continuing the $200 million commitment to child care under our Better Jobs and Income Program. We have an additional $600 million for child care asked for in the Congress. Two major reorganization proposals will have a permanent and very profound impact on women's employment.

In the last 12 to 14 months, we've seen the unemployment rate drop two full percentage points in our country. And women have shared their portion of the net increase of 4.1 million new jobs in America. We've never had that big an increase before.

But there's still a dearth of adequate opportunity under the law and administrative regulations, even in the Federal Government.

Under Eleanor Holmes Norton, we hope to completely reorganize the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's work and focus the responsibility for that fine principle under one strong and bold leader.

Another reorganization plan that's now being presented to the Congress is for the change in the civil service laws, which, although very fine in their vision a hundred years ago, have over the years perpetuated a deprivation of women's rights for adequate and equal employment opportunities. And the changes that we have proposed will go a long way toward eliminating that discrepancy.

Under Juanita Kreps, the new census regulations will move to redress the unfairness with which data applied to women to ensure their proper portion of attention from Federal laws, the administration of justice, and the distribution of our Nation's wealth to those who need it most.

I will establish by Executive order a continuing interdepartmental agency group. And I will also establish a continuing committee of women, many of you, to work intimately with the Cabinet officers, the agency heads, the White House staff, and me, personally, to be sure that the superb work that you did at Houston and since Houston will not be lost, but will be implemented completely.

And now I would like to take an opportunity as a great honor for myself to introduce to you my friend and a great chairman, Bella Abzug.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3 p.m. in the East Room at the White House. Following his remarks, Bella S. Abzug, presiding officer of the Commission, presented the President with a copy of the Commission's report on the National Women's Conference.

Department of Commerce

Nomination of Henry Geller To Be Assistant Secretary for Communications and Information. March 22, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Henry Geller, of Alexandria, Va., to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Communications and Information.

Geller was born March 14, 1924, in Springfield, Mass. He received a B.S. from the University of Michigan in 1943 and a J.D. from Northwestern School of Law in 1949.

Geller was an attorney adviser in the Law Department of the Federal Communications Commission in 1949 and a trial attorney with the National Labor Relations Board in 1950. In 1951 he was law clerk to Illinois Supreme Court Justice Walter V. Schaffer.

Geller rejoined the FCC in 1952 as an attorney adviser in the Broadcast Bureau and later served in the Office of Opinions and Review. In 1955 he became a trial attorney in the Office of the General Counsel.

From 1957 to 1961, Geller was a trial attorney in the Appellate Section of the Antitrust Division at the Justice Department. In 1961 he returned to the FCC as Associate General Counsel. From 1962 to 1964, he was Deputy General Counsel, and from 1964 to 1970, he was General Counsel. From 1970 to 1973, he was Special Assistant to the Chairman of the FCC.

From 1973 to 1975, Geller did research on communications at the Rand Corp. in Washington, and since 1975 he has been a communications fellow with the Aspen Institute Program on Communications and Society. He is also a consultant to the National News Council and the Rand Corp.

Geller has taught at the Georgetown University School of Law and the University of Pennsylvania Law School. He is the author of numerous articles.

The Cyprus Conflict

*Message to the Congress Reporting on Progress Toward a Negotiated Settlement.
March 23, 1978*

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by Public Law 94-104, this report describes the progress that has been made during the past sixty days toward a negotiated settlement on Cyprus.

In my last such report to the Congress, submitted on January 20, I outlined the continuing efforts that we and other nations have been making, in both bilateral and international meetings, to promote an early resumption of productive negotiations between the two Cypriot communities. I stressed that resolute action was still required, but still expressed the belief that we were moving in the right direction.

Since that time there have been developments of potential significance for Cyprus. Very shortly after his assumption of office on January 5, Turkish Prime Minister Ecevit publicly announced his intention to deal promptly and decisively with the outstanding foreign policy issues confronting his nation, prime among them being Cyprus. Ecevit acknowledged that a Cyprus settlement would be in Turkey's own best interests. "We want to see a rapid solution in Cyprus," he declared in a January 9 interview, "not because the U.S. or other friendly countries want it, but because it will be for the benefit of all Cyprus and for the benefit of peace in the region." Subsequently, in both public statements and private conversations, Prime Minister Ecevit said that he hoped negotiations between the communities would soon resume, and he declared that the Turkish side would submit concrete proposals on both the constitutional and territorial aspects of the issue.

United Nations Secretary General Waldheim visited Ankara, Athens and Nicosia between January 8 and 18. The Secretary General was apparently encouraged by his conversations with President Kyprianou, Prime Ministers Ecevit and Caramanlis, and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash, and afterwards said that it might be possible to reconvene the stalled Cyprus intercommunal talks sometime early in the spring.

My Administration has welcomed Prime Minister Ecevit's declared intention to move forward on the Cyprus issue, and we have expressed our readiness to give full support to the initiatives of the Secretary General. Secretary Vance stopped in Ankara and Athens on January 20–22, following a visit to the Middle East, and held very useful discussions on a number of subjects, including Cyprus. The Secretary returned from these discussions convinced that both the governments of Turkey and Greece earnestly desired to work towards a Cyprus settlement.

The Turkish Cypriots, assisted by the Government of Turkey, are now preparing detailed constitutional and territorial proposals that could serve as a basis for resumed intercommunal negotiations. Our understanding is that these proposals may be completed sometime in March, and that negotiations between the two communities could be resumed by the Secretary General sometime thereafter. Toward that end, the Administration has recently urged the Turkish Cypriot leadership and the government of Turkey to develop proposals that are sufficiently substantive and forthcoming to form a basis for genuine negotiation. We have at the same time encouraged the Government of Cyprus to regard the new Turkish proposals, together with the proposals tabled by President Makarios last year, as a basis for initiating a round of intensive, good-faith negotiations which can lead to a narrowing of differences.

I strongly hope that productive Cyprus negotiations will be reconvened very soon. I am sure that all who wish to see peace, justice, and stability in Cyprus and in the eastern Mediterranean share this hope.

Ohio River Valley Water Sanitation Commission

Appointment of John C. White as a United States Commissioner. March 23, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of John C. White, of Atlanta, Ga., as a Commissioner representing the United States Government on the Ohio River Valley Water Sanitation Commission.

White, 48, is Regional Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency for Region IV in Atlanta. He joined EPA when the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration (FWPCA) was incorporated into EPA in 1970. He has been with the FWPCA since 1966.

Improving Government Regulations

Remarks on Signing Executive Order 12044. March 23, 1978

I think this is the first time in history that a Presidential Executive order has been circulated for comment before it was issued, and the comments have been very constructive. We received some very careful and helpful comments from more than 350 people, and I think this is indicative of the interest that is shown in this particular action on my part.

This is also the first time that the executive branch, so far as I know, has attempted in a fundamental way to improve the Government regulatory process by making regulations simpler, less burdensome, and by giving the public a chance to be involved in a critique of the effectiveness of regulations, which quite often have the far-reaching effect of law and quite often are not as carefully considered as a legal act by the Congress.

Greater accountability will be built into the process in the future, since agency heads are required to publish semiannually a list of significant regulations which they are considering or which they have under review, and because, again, of a greater opportunity for public involvement before the head of an agency makes a decision on a regulation.

We have also required in this Executive order, which I shall soon sign, that agency heads reassess the effectiveness of existing regulations to determine not only the prospective need for regulation that's new but the continuing of demonstrated need of existing ones.

When a regulation is determined to be required, we want it to be the least burdensome alternative among many that are considered. I want to be sure that the regulations, for a change, will be written in plain English that I can understand and that the head of the department can understand, and that the person who's written the regulation be identified by name. I want to have a lot of pride of authorship in the regulation and not shame when a regulation is indecipherable.

Another requirement in the Executive order will be that the economic impact of regulations be assessed, whether or not they contribute to a burdensome and costly additional requirement on those who have to comply with the regulations. In the major ones we want to be sure that they don't contribute to inflationary costs and that they are compatible with the overall economic policy of our country.

I will be personally involved in assuring that the Executive order is carried out. And under me, the Office of Management and Budget will be working very closely with the heads of agencies and departments to assure that the spirit and the letter of the Executive order is honored. We want to make this a common effort.

The independent regulatory agencies are not included in the Executive order. Many of the heads of those agencies are here. The overwhelming response of almost everyone in the initial publication of the proposed Executive order was that regulatory agencies should come under the Executive order. I don't think that's necessary. I think their independence should be preserved. But to the extent that the Executive order is applicable and advisable, I would certainly hope that the regulatory agencies would decide to implement them on your own initiative as a voluntary effort.

You might want to go even further in some instances than I have done in this Executive order, because this has to apply to literally dozens of agencies. And you might, through your own actions, focus more nearly on correcting a defect that exists within the ICC or the FTC or others.

I'm very pleased that a common effort has brought this into being, and I'm looking forward to a benefit for our entire country because of the cooperation that I expect.

I'd now like to sign the Executive order which I think will be a major step forward for the people of the United States, to make my job easier, make your job easier. I think everyone benefits by this one; nobody will suffer except people who sell typewriter ribbons, and maybe some of the printers won't have as much to print. [Laughter]

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:31 a.m. at the signing ceremony in the Roosevelt Room at the White House.

Improving Government Regulations

Executive Order 12044. March 23, 1978

As President of the United States of America, I direct each Executive Agency to adopt procedures to improve existing and future regulations.

SECTION 1. Policy. Regulations shall be as simple and clear as possible. They shall achieve legislative goals effectively and efficiently. They shall not impose unnecessary burdens on the economy, on individuals, on public or private organizations, or on State and local governments.

To achieve these objectives, regulations shall be developed through a process which ensures that:

- (a) the need for and purposes of the regulation are clearly established;
- (b) heads of agencies and policy officials exercise effective oversight;
- (c) opportunity exists for early participation and comment by other Federal agencies, State and local governments, businesses, organizations and individual members of the public;
- (d) meaningful alternatives are considered and analyzed before the regulation is issued; and
- (e) compliance costs, paperwork and other burdens on the public are minimized.

SEC. 2. Reform of the Process for Developing Significant Regulations. Agencies shall review and revise their procedures for developing regulations to be consistent with the policies of this Order and in a manner that minimizes paperwork.

Agencies' procedures should fit their own needs but, at a minimum, these procedures shall include the following:

- (a) Semiannual Agenda of Regula- tions. To give the public adequate notice, agencies shall publish at least semiannually an agenda of significant regulations under development or review. On the first Monday in October, each agency shall publish in the FEDERAL REGISTER a schedule showing the times during the coming fiscal year when the agency's semiannual agenda will be published. Supplements to the agenda may be published at other times during the year if necessary, but the semiannual agendas shall be as complete as possible. The head of each agency shall approve the agenda before it is published. At a minimum, each published agenda shall describe the regulations being considered by the agency, the need for and the legal basis for the action being taken, and the status of regulations previously listed on the agenda. Each item on the agenda shall also include the name and telephone number of a knowledgeable agency official and, if possible, state whether or not a regulatory analysis will be required. The agenda shall also include existing regulations scheduled to be reviewed in accordance with Section 4 of this Order.

(b) Agency Head Oversight. Before an agency proceeds to develop significant new regulations, the agency head shall have reviewed the issues to be considered, the alternative approaches to be explored, a tentative plan for obtaining public comment, and target dates for completion of steps in the development of the regulation.

(c) Opportunity for Public Participation. Agencies shall give the public an early and meaningful opportunity to participate in the development of agency regulations. They shall consider a variety of ways to provide this opportunity, including (1) publishing an advance notice of proposed rulemaking; (2) holding open conferences or public hearings; (3) sending notices of proposed regulations to publications likely to be read by those affected; and (4) notifying interested parties directly.

Agencies shall give the public at least 60 days to comment on proposed significant regulations. In the few instances where agencies determine this is not possible, the regulation shall be accompanied by a brief statement of the reasons for a shorter time period.

(d) Approval of Significant Regulations. The head of each agency, or the designated official with statutory responsibility, shall approve significant regulations before they are published for public comment in the FEDERAL REGISTER. At a minimum, this official should determine that:

- (1) the proposed regulation is needed;
- (2) the direct and indirect effects of the regulation have been adequately considered;
- (3) alternative approaches have been considered and the least burdensome of the acceptable alternatives has been chosen;
- (4) public comments have been considered and an adequate response has been prepared;
- (5) the regulation is written in plain English and is understandable to those who must comply with it;
- (6) an estimate has been made of the new reporting burdens or record-keeping requirements necessary for compliance with the regulation;
- (7) the name, address and telephone number of a knowledgeable agency official is included in the publication; and
- (8) a plan for evaluating the regulation after its issuance has been developed.

(e) Criteria for Determining Significant Regulations. Agencies shall establish criteria for identifying which regulations are significant. Agencies shall consider among other things: (1) the type and number of individuals, businesses, organizations, State and local governments affected; (2) the compliance and reporting requirements likely to be involved; (3) direct and indirect effects of the regulation including the effect on competition; and (4) the relationship of the regulations to those of other programs and agencies. Regulations that do not meet an agency's criteria for determining significance shall be accompanied by a statement to that effect at the time the regulation is proposed.

SEC. 3. Regulatory Analysis. Some of the regulations identified as significant may have major economic consequences for the general economy, for individual industries, geographical regions or levels of government. For these regulations, agencies shall prepare a regulatory analysis. Such an analysis shall involve a careful examination of alternative approaches early in the decisionmaking process.

The following requirements shall govern the preparation of regulatory analyses:

(a) Criteria. Agency heads shall establish criteria for determining which regulations require regulatory analyses. The criteria established shall:

- (1) ensure that regulatory analyses are performed for all regulations which will result in (a) an annual effect on the economy of $100 million or more; or (b) a major increase in costs or prices for individual industries, levels of government or geographic regions; and
- (2) provide that in the agency head's discretion, regulatory analysis may be completed on any proposed regulation.

(b) Procedures. Agency heads shall establish procedures for developing the regulatory analysis and obtaining public comment.

- (1) Each regulatory analysis shall contain a succinct statement of the problem; a description of the major alternative ways of dealing with the problem that were considered by the agency; an analysis of the economic consequences of each of these alternatives and a detailed explanation of the reasons for choosing one alternative over the others.
- (2) Agencies shall include in their public notice of proposed rules an explanation of the regulatory approach that has been selected or is favored and a short description of the other alternatives considered. A statement of how the public may obtain a copy of the draft regulatory analysis shall also be included.
- (3) Agencies shall prepare a final regulatory analysis to be made available when the final regulations are published.
- (d) the need to simplify or clarify language;
- (e) the need to eliminate overlapping and duplicative regulations; and
- (f) the length of time since the regulation has been evaluated or the degree to which technology, economic conditions or other factors have changed in the area affected by the regulation.

Agencies shall develop their selection criteria and a listing of possible regulations for initial review. The criteria and listing shall be published for comment as required in Section 5. Subsequently, regulations selected for review shall be included in the semiannual agency agendas.

SEC. 5. Implementation.

(a) Each agency shall review its existing process for developing regulations and revise it as needed to comply with this Order. Within 60 days after the issuance of the Order, each agency shall prepare a draft report outlining (1) a brief description of its process for developing regulations and the changes that have been made to comply with this Order; (2) its proposed criteria for defining significant agency regulations; (3) its proposed criteria for identifying which regulations require regulatory analysis; and (4) its proposed criteria for selecting existing regulations to be reviewed and a list of regulations that the agency will consider for its initial review. This report shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER for public comment. A copy of this report shall be sent to the Office of Management and Budget.

(b) After receiving public comment, agencies shall submit their revised report to the Office of Management and Budget for approval before final publication in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

(c) The Office of Management and Budget shall assure the effective implementation of this Order. OMB shall re-

Regulatory analyses shall not be required in rulemaking proceedings pending at the time this Order is issued if an Economic Impact Statement has already been prepared in accordance with Executive Orders 11821 and 11949.

SEC. 4. Review of Existing Regulations. Agencies shall periodically review their existing regulations to determine whether they are achieving the policy goals of this Order. This review will follow the same procedural steps outlined for the development of new regulations.

In selecting regulations to be reviewed, agencies shall consider such criteria as:

- (a) the continued need for the regulation;
- (b) the type and number of complaints or suggestions received;
- (c) the burdens imposed on those directly or indirectly affected by the regulations;

port at least semiannually to the President on the effectiveness of the Order and agency compliance with its provisions. By May 1, 1980, OMB shall recommend to the President whether or not there is a continued need for the Order and any further steps or actions necessary to achieve its purposes.

SEC. 6. Coverage.

(a) As used in this Order, the term regulation means both rules and regulations issued by agencies including those which establish conditions for financial assistance. Closely related sets of regulations shall be considered together.

(b) This Order does not apply to:

- (1) regulations issued in accordance with the formal rulemaking provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 556, 557);
- (2) regulations issued with respect to a military or foreign affairs function of the United States;
- (3) matters related to agency management or personnel;
- (4) regulations related to Federal Government procurement;
- (5) regulations issued by the independent regulatory agencies; or
- (6) regulations that are issued in response to an emergency or which are governed by short-term statutory or judicial deadlines. In these cases, the agency shall publish in the FEDERAL REGISTER a statement of the reasons why it is impracticable or contrary to the public interest for the agency to follow the procedures of this Order. Such a statement shall include the name of the policy official responsible for this determination.

SEC. 7. This Order is intended to improve the quality of Executive Agency regulatory practices. It is not intended to create delay in the process or provide new grounds for judicial review. Nothing in this Order shall be considered to supersede existing statutory obligations governing rulemaking.

SEC. 8. Unless extended, this Executive Order expires on June 30, 1980.

Improving Government Regulations

Statement on Executive Order 12044.
March 23, 1978

I have often said that the American people are sick and tired of excessive Federal regulation. To many citizens who have to deal with it on a regular basis, the Federal Government has become like a foreign country, complete with its own interests and its own language.

As a farmer and a small businessman, and later as a Governor, I shared this resentment and frustration. I resented the cost of Government redtape, the interference it represented in my business and personal life, and not least of all, having to deal with the bureaucratic gobbledygook itself. I know I am not alone in this frustration. Many Members of Congress have expressed to me their personal concerns in this area.

I came to Washington to reorganize a Federal Government which had grown more preoccupied with its own bureaucratic needs than with those of the people. This Executive order is an instrument for reversing this trend. It promises to make Federal regulations clearer, less burdensome, and more cost-effective.

First, it will direct that regulations be written in plain English. Government regulations are usually written by experts for experts. Your clear mandate will be to translate regulations into language a small businessman—who must be his own expert—can understand.

Second, this order opens up the regulatory process to broad public involvement. It requires that departments and agencies issue regular “early warning” announcements of any significant new regulatory action that is being considered. This announcement must contain the name and telephone number of a specific official responsible in this area.

Third, it requires that you be personally and clearly accountable for the regulations that are being considered. You must sign off on items on the agency agenda; be satisfied that feasible alternatives have been carefully examined; and assure that regulatory burdens are reduced. It requires that the public be given the name, address, and telephone number of a knowledgeable agency official who can answer questions about new regulations.

Fourth, it directs that whenever a regulation may have a major economic consequence, the agency must conduct an early and rigorous examination of all alternatives of achieving the stated objective. This requirement will ensure that Federal regulations are cost-effective and impose minimum economic burdens on the private sector.

Finally, and very importantly, it requires every agency to undertake a systematic, “sunset” review of existing regulations. The agencies are to eliminate those which are unnecessary and reform others to reduce the burden to the minimum.

Many of these reforms are already underway at EPA, as well as HEW, DOT, Labor, and the Department of Energy.

I am confident that efforts of executive agencies to carry out this order will be matched by similar efforts on the part of the independent regulatory agencies. Many commissions are already well on their way in this regard. The Federal Communications Commission, for example, has just completed their rewrite of regulations that affect millions of CB radio owners. Here’s a line from the old version:

“Except as provided in paragraph B of this section, applications, amendments thereto, and related statements of fact required by the Commission shall be personally signed by the applicant, if the applicant is an individual.”

Instead of that gobbledygook, the new version says: “If you are an individual, you must sign your own application personally.”

This is an example of the kind of change the Executive order is meant to encourage.

Improving Government Regulations

Memorandum From the President.
March 23, 1978

Memorandum for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies

In order to assure full State and local participation in the development and promulgation of Federal regulations with significant intergovernmental impact, I want the Departments to develop procedures in the following manner:

- I have asked the national organizations representing general purpose State and local governments (including the National Governors’ Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the Council of State Governments, the National League of Cities, the United States Conference of Mayors, the National Association of Counties, and the International City Management Association) to systematically review the semi-annual regulation agendas to be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER by each executive department and agency.

- Any of these national organizations should notify the appropriate executive department or agency if it believes that a regulation included on an agency regulation agenda would have major inter-governmental significance. Notification should be made through the senior inter-governmental officials whose names I announced in a FEDERAL REGISTER notice on September 20, 1977.

- Upon receipt of notification from any of the above named organizations, the agency shall develop a specific plan for consultation with State and local governments in the development of that regulation. Such consultation shall include the solicitation of comments from the above named groups, from other representative organizations and from individual State and local governments as appropriate.

Consistent with my memorandum to you of February 25, 1977, whenever major agency regulations identified as having major intergovernmental significance are submitted to the Office of Management and Budget for review or are published in the FEDERAL REGISTER, those proposed regulations shall be accompanied by a brief description of how State and local governments have been consulted, what the nature of the State and local comments was, and how the agency dealt with such comments.

As you implement the new Executive Order, I expect that you will include in your revised agency procedures, provisions which will institute intergovernmental consultation described in this memorandum.

Because the goals and procedures of the new Order duplicate those of the OMB circular now governing the consultation process, OMB has rescinded it. However, nothing in this memorandum shall be construed as in any way diminishing the affirmative obligation of the executive departments and agencies to actively seek out, encourage, and facilitate the submission of State and local comments in the development of Federal regulations in any other ways appropriate to the agency and the proposed regulation.

Improving Government Regulations

Letter to the Heads of Independent Regulatory Agencies. March 23, 1978

Today I issued an Executive Order to improve government regulations. This Order will open up new opportunities for public participation in the regulatory process, require regulations to be clearer and more understandable, and assure more effective oversight of the development of agency regulations.

I believe that this effort is one of the most important reform initiatives to be undertaken by my Administration. I have asked the members of the Cabinet and other agency heads to give personal priority and attention to implementing the Order. To be fully effective and achieve the full range of needed improvements, I believe that it would be useful for the independent regulatory commissions to initiate a voluntary effort to achieve similar procedural reforms.

As you know, public comment on whether or not to apply these procedures to independent regulatory agencies was specifically sought in the November 18, 1977 notice in the FEDERAL REGISTER. The overwhelming response was that these agencies should adopt the provisions of the Order. The public is seeking a change. They are encouraging us to seek new approaches to the way in which government regulates. They point out that if regulations were simpler, less burdensome, and more clearly understandable, people would be better able to comply with them.

I believe that the new spirit of openness, simplicity and clarity advocated in this Executive Order responds to the public's concerns. I know that many important reforms are already underway in the independent agencies and I believe that the requirements of the Order complement these efforts. I am asking you as Chairman of your agency to initiate your own program to incorporate the provisions of the Order. In addition, it would be useful for you to report progress on your efforts to the Congress and to me by June 30, 1978. I look forward to reviewing these reports.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

Meeting With Prime Minister James Callaghan of the United Kingdom

Remarks on the Departure of the Prime Minister. March 23, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. I am sorry we kept you waiting for a few minutes, but I would like to point out again how delighted we are to have Prime Minister Callaghan come for an overly brief visit with us.

He's here in our country visiting his daughter, son-in-law, and his grandchildren, and a month or so ago we made arrangements for him to come and consult with me on some very important matters that affect our countries.

Prime Minister Callaghan has a superb background in the British Government concerning economics, and we all recognize and have had thorough discussions about the possibilities for multilateral action to improve the economic circumstances of the trading world.

Obviously, each country has to take its own initiatives against unemployment, against inflation, for the stabilization of currencies, for the enhancement of trade, for the conservation and proper use of energy, to prevent protectionist sentiments putting an obstruction before the progress of the standard of living of people in the world. And we've discussed all those matters this morning.

We've outlined to the British leaders some of the actions that we have in mind as possibilities. We've discussed our private conversations with the leaders of Germany, Japan, France, other trading partners.

Prime Minister Callaghan will be back here again in May, along with other heads of state, to consult on NATO matters, and we'll have a chance for political and economic discussions at that time. And I'll be joining with him and others in Bonn in July at an economic summit. But we have been very gratified at his initiative in coming here. We will be consulting with other leaders as well. Prime Minister Fukuda will come to visit me personally later on this spring.

The harmony that exists between ourselves and Great Britain is a very gratifying thing for a President. This has been a sustaining factor in our lives in this country so long as I can remember. And it's a basis for consultation in a private way between myself and my dear and good close friend, Jim Callaghan, not only in the matters I've described but many others that are of common interest to our people.

Jim, we're proud to have you here, and your meeting has been very helpful to us. I believe that our countries now, in preparation for the economic summit, can join together in a much more harmonious and effective way to bring about better economic circumstances, not only in our own nations but throughout the world.

Thank you very much.

THE PRIME MINISTER. Mr. President, and ladies and gentlemen:

Thank you very much for your hospitality, Mr. President, which we've enjoyed, and for the conversations.

We, like you, have been thinking about these economic problems for some time, and the thing that has obsessed me, having lived through this now for 20 years or more, at fairly close hand, is that internationally, we've lost the guidelines which used to set boundaries for our action. And we're cast adrift, almost, in some ways, and there is less united action; we're all acting individually as countries much more than I can recall.

There are reasons for this which I will not enumerate. They have developed since the end of the Bretton Woods era, really. And the result is that I think there is a greater responsibility thrust upon the world leaders now to try, in the absence of the old guidelines, to find collective and concerted action that will restore confidence in our capacity to use the human and material resources of the world in a much more efficient and able way than we've been doing over recent years.

The level of unemployment is far too high; the growth rates in the world are too low. The amount of aid that is going to other countries is too small and is affecting the capital flows. And yet we are not in the grip of economic forces that we are unable to control. If all of us together—certainly the major countries—want to apply the political effort to improving the situation, it can be done.

And what I've been happy to find, what I expected to find and have found, is that the President of the leading nation of the Western World not only recognizes this but is also ready to see collective action taken, leading up to the summit in Bonn in which we can consult and can coordinate our efforts as far as possible.

I hope I'm not abusing your hospitality, Jimmy, if you will allow me to say this, if I say how much I admire the energy conservation program that you've put forward. I don't know whether the American people recognize just how significant and important this program is to restoring economic health, not only to the United States but to the rest of us in the Western World. It is of vital significance, and I'm very gratified indeed that you have managed to get so far. And I certainly hope that you'll be able to carry it through.

I think all of us must support you in the sense that we must, too, have our own conservation programs. We can't allow you to do it all. But of course, you are by far the biggest user of energy in this sense, and therefore it's essential that you do have to bear the brunt of it. But I would like to say that I hope very much that the statesmanship that the United States administration is showing can be carried through in this particular direction.

If I may add just one other thing: We've got to coordinate our actions far more than we've done up to the moment, and we have got to relate them, whatever we are doing in the next few months, to the need to get the world economies moving together again.

I think what is true is that the actions that we take individually are less important than the collective sum of them. The collective action that we would take by agreement with each other is greater than the sum of the parts in restoring confidence.

So, I believe that we have begun on a good path. I know that other leaders—Chancellor Schmidt and President Giscard, Signor Andreotti, Mr. Trudeau, and Mr. Fukuda—are all concerned about these matters. It is for all of us to coordinate our actions, and I believe that come July, and the actions that we take between now and July and the efforts we make, if we can ratify those actions with a plan in July—not with declarations, we've passed that stage, but with a plan of action—I believe we can do a very great deal to pull the world out of the recession in which it finds itself.

I thank you very much, Mr. President, for setting aside this time for our discussions, which I value not only on this but on other matters, too.

We don't have to waste time circling around each other. We get down to talk straightaway. The President's a quick man at doing business. He thinks far too quickly for me. And that's why I'm always left behind. But I managed to struggle along behind him, keep up now and again. And between us, we can form some conclusions that I believe are of benefit to both our countries.

Thank you very much indeed.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:30 p.m. to reporters assembled on the South Grounds of the White House.

Meeting With Prime Minister Callaghan of the United Kingdom

White House Statement. March 23, 1978

The British Prime Minister, the Rt. Hon. James Callaghan, M.P., and the President met at the White House this morning, beginning at 11 a.m. and continuing through a working lunch. The Prime Minister is in Washington at the invitation of President Carter. He arrived yesterday afternoon and will remain in Washington for several days in a private capacity, visiting his daughter and family (Mrs. Peter Jay, wife of the British Ambassador). Mrs. Callaghan accompanied him.

The Prime Minister's trip here is in the context of our frequent and close consultations with the United States traditional friends and allies, particularly on economic and security issues affecting our mutual well-being. As you know, Danish Prime Minister Jørgensen was recently here in his capacity as EC Council President, and Mr. Callaghan's visit will be followed by the North Atlantic Council summit meeting here in May, Japanese Prime Minister Fukuda's visit later this spring, and another economic summit meeting in the coming months.

The meeting this morning was characterized by a very warm and friendly atmosphere, as befits the third meeting of the two leaders since President Carter took office last year. The Prime Minister and the President discussed a number of issues, including the international economic situation, at some length. They exchanged ideas and agreed to continue to be in close communication.

Pan American Day and Pan American Week, 1978

Proclamation 4557. March 23, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

For more than one hundred and fifty years the nations of the Western Hemisphere have recognized that peace and understanding can be achieved only if we are willing to put aside our differences and join together to solve our problems and share our opportunities. Drawing upon a common heritage and shared hopes for the future, the nations of the Americas constantly seek ways to strengthen their ties with each other. Their success in achieving these goals is due in large measure to the Organization of American States, the world's oldest regional organization.

Through the Organization of American States we in the Western Hemisphere have developed a unique system of cooperation which promotes political understanding, economic progress and social justice. An organization of great vitality and adaptability, it is now responding vigorously to the new challenges of the last quarter of the twentieth century. For these reasons, the United States continues, and will continue, to lend its full support to the Organization of American States and the Inter-American System. Accordingly, it is appropriate that we join with its other members in reaffirming our mutual commitment to friendship, trust and cooperation.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Friday, April 14, 1978, as Pan American Day, and the week beginning April 9, 1978 as Pan American Week and call upon all Americans to honor these observances with ceremonies and activities that will reflect the continuing commitment of the United States of America to a peaceful and productive relationship among the nations and peoples of the Western Hemisphere.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-third day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

United States Ambassador to the Dominican Republic

*Nomination of Robert L. Yost.
March 24, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Robert L. Yost, of Tujunga, Calif., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Dominican Republic. He would replace Robert A. Hurwitch, who has resigned.

Yost was born September 8, 1922, in Kirkland, Wash. He received a B.S. from the University of California at Los Angeles in 1942 and an M.S. from George Washington University in 1968. He served in the U.S. Army from 1942 to 1946.

Yost entered the Foreign Service in 1946 as economic and political officer in Madrid. He served as economic officer in Antwerp (1949-1952) and Leopoldville (1953-1955). He was an international economist in the Bureau of European Affairs at the State Department in 1958 and 1959.

From 1959 to 1962, Yost was principal officer in Cebu, and from 1962 to 1965, he served in Paris as financial advisor and special assistant and secretary to the United States Mission to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

From 1965 to 1967, Yost was Special Assistant in the Bureau of European Affairs. He attended the National War College in 1967-68, and from 1968 to 1972, he was Deputy Chief of Mission in Addis Ababa. He was Ambassador to Burundi from 1972 to 1974. Since 1974 he has been Deputy Inspector General at the State Department.

Director of the Office of Management and Budget

Remarks at the Swearing In of James T. McIntyre, Jr. March 24, 1978

First of all, I want to thank Fritz and Jim for holding the crowd together 'til I could get here. [Laughter]

This is a good day in the life of the Carter administration and the Federal Government and the United States of America. I doubt that there's anyone in the administration whom I know better and whom I admire more than Jim McIntyre.

He is something of an anomaly in the Carter administration, and that is that he's well qualified in the job that he holds. [Laughter] He is a professional. In his training and his background, his life's commitment is to the specific duties that he will be performing for the people of our country. He's a man of superb educational background and experience, complete integrity and total dedication. And I'm very grateful that he is here to represent the people of our country in such a superb way.

Jim is a man who knows me well. He has helped to evolve my own attitude toward government administration. He's been involved in our successes and our failures. We've learned through this experience. And when Jim McIntyre speaks to the heads of the Federal agencies in the preparation of the budget, they know that he speaks as though it were my own voice. And when he deals with the Congress to present testimony and evidence and opinion, there will be no doubt that he speaks with the voice of the President.

It's reassuring to me in the challenging job that I have to be supported by and advised by a man of this caliber and this quality. And I'm very grateful to him for being willing to serve our country in such a way.

Jim, thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2 p.m. at the ceremony in the Rose Garden at the White House. Prior to his remarks, Vice President Walter F. Mondale spoke and then administered the oath of office to Mr. McIntyre.

Spring Flooding

Announcement Concerning Flood Insurance. March 24, 1978

The President has expressed his deep concern for people faced with the threat of spring flooding.

Melting snow coupled with rising temperatures and spring rains could bring floods to many parts of the country without warning. Other areas not hit by winter storms could be affected if they are in the path of flood waters.

Recently, major flooding has taken place in Nebraska, Indiana, and Ohio. Mudslides and floods have left people homeless in Southern California. The New England coast and parts of Arizona were unexpectedly flooded. Property losses amounted to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Many of these losses could have been averted if property owners had purchased flood insurance.

People living in flood-prone areas can take precautions before disaster strikes. Local insurance agents offer low-cost, federally subsidized flood insurance available through the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Property owners can insure homes, businesses, and contents for as little as 25 cents per $100 coverage. Tenants can insure their personal belongings under the program.

It takes 15 days for flood insurance to take effect. Policies purchased today will cover damages if a flood hits in 2½ weeks.

Department of the Treasury

Nomination of Donald C. Lubick To Be an Assistant Secretary. March 24, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Donald C. Lubick, of Chevy Chase, Md., to be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy. He would replace Laurence Woodworth, deceased.

Lubick was born April 29, 1926, in Buffalo, N.Y. He received a B.A. from the University of Buffalo in 1945 and a J.D. from Harvard University in 1949.

From 1950 to 1961, and from 1964 to 1977, Lubick was associated with the Buffalo law firm of Hodgson, Russ, Andrews, Woods & Goodyear. From 1961 to 1964, he was tax legislative counsel of the Treasury Department. He also has been a member of the faculty of the University of Buffalo Law School on a part-time basis, teaching courses in a variety of fields, including Federal income taxation. He has published articles and been a frequent lecturer on Federal taxation.

In May 1977, Lubick was appointed Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy. Since Woodworth's death in December 1977, he has been Acting Assistant Secretary.

United States Assay Office in New York City

Nomination of Saul Silverman To Be Assayer. March 24, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Saul Silverman, of Philadelphia, Pa., to be Assayer of the United States Assay Office in New York City. He would replace Allan Ryan, deceased.

Silverman was born March 2, 1921, in Brooklyn, N.Y. He holds B.S. degrees in pharmacy and chemistry from St. John's University in New York. He served in the U.S. Army from 1942 to 1945.

From 1949 to 1954, Silverman was a pharmacist. He worked as an analytical chemist at R. H. Macy Laboratories and as a quality control and technical service chemist at E. F. Houghton between 1954 and 1962. In 1962 and 1963, he was a chemist for Orland Research and Development.

Silverman has been with the Philadelphia Mint since 1963, working as a chemist and supervisory chemist. Last January, after the death of the Assayer of the New York Assay Office, Silverman was temporarily assigned to that office as Supervisor of the Assay Division.

United States Air Force Academy Board of Visitors

Appointment of Bruce G. Sundlun and Sheila Widnall as Members. March 24, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of two persons as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Air Force Academy for terms expiring December 30, 1980. They are:

Bruce G. Sundlun, of Providence, R.I., president and chief executive officer of the Outlet Company in Providence, and retired colonel in the U.S. Air Force Reserve.

Sheila Widnall, of Lexington, Mass., associate professor of aeronautical engineering at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Labor Disputes in the Coal Industry

Statement Following Mineworkers' Approval of a Contract. March 25, 1978

I am pleased that the members of the United Mine Workers have voted to approve the latest coal contract. Miners will now be returning to work early next week, and full coal production will resume shortly.

From the outset, we have known that the only satisfactory conclusion to this strike would be a collectively bargained agreement, acceptable to both sides. Over the past 6 weeks, our efforts have been directed toward that end.

With Friday's vote, we have achieved that goal. This Nation has endured a long strike without widespread unemployment or drastic reductions in electric power. Despite many predictions to the contrary, there has been no serious violence.

The contract which was approved on Friday upholds the important principle of industrywide bargaining between the coal operators and the UMW.

The Governors of the States most affected by the strike have displayed great leadership and cooperation in dealing with its consequences.

I particularly wish to thank the people of the affected regions. Through their conservation efforts, coal demand was reduced and far worse coal shortages averted.

The work of three Federal departments also greatly aided the resolution of this problem. The Department of Labor and the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service were evenhanded as they facilitated collective bargaining, and the Department of Energy showed great ingenuity and organization as it coordinated the movement of coal to the areas which needed it most.

However, the Government's interest in the coal industry does not end with this contract agreement. I will soon appoint a Presidential Commission on the Coal Industry, a panel which will address the industry's long-term problems.

Friday's agreement, coupled with the work of this Commission, will enable the coal industry to take its rightful place as one of the foundations of our long-term energy strategy.

Sun Day, 1978

Proclamation 4558. March 27, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

Today the need to develop and expand renewable energy sources that can provide heating, cooling and power for homes, farms and factories is greater than at any other time in our Nation's history. For this reason, Americans are seeking ways of using the sun as an inexhaustible source of clean energy.

The Federal government and private organizations are working on programs to improve solar technology and encourage greater use of this safe, environmentally acceptable energy source. Our success, however, will depend upon an informed and involved public.

In order to inform the general public, industry and labor about solar technologies and to demonstrate the sun's potential in meeting America's energy needs, the Ninety-fifth Congress has adopted a joint resolution (H.J. Res. 715) designating Wednesday, May 3, 1978, as Sun Day and calling upon the President to issue a proclamation calling for its appropriate observance.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Wednesday, May 3, 1978, as Sun Day and call upon the American people to observe that day with appropriate activities and ceremonies that will demonstrate the potential of solar energy. I direct all appropriate Federal agencies to support this national observance.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this 27th day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

United States Savings Bonds Program

Memorandum From the President.
March 27, 1978

Memorandum for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies

I have appointed Ray Marshall, Secretary of Labor, as Chairman of the Federal Interagency Committee for the purchase of United States Savings Bonds. This is a crucial appointment, because he will be charged with the responsibility for making the government a leader in the Savings Bonds program.

The U.S. Savings Bonds program is a key tool in the management of the public debt. Today Americans own $77 billion worth of these securities, more than ever before. Savings Bonds constitute nearly one-fifth of the publicly-held portion of the Federal debt, and are the most stable element in the entire debt structure.

The program has also helped individuals save for a financially secure future.

Because the purchase of U.S. Savings Bonds supports the Government's policies and programs in these two important ways, it is fitting that employees of the Federal Government should take the initiative in the purchase of Savings Bonds through the Payroll Savings Plan and set an example for all Americans in securing their country's future.

The heads of departments and agencies, who make up the Interagency Savings Bonds Committee, have the special responsibility to offer and promote the Payroll Savings Plan to every employee.

I am confident that, under your leadership, the 1978 Federal campaign will attain a new high level of participation. You have my full support in this important endeavor.

Absaroka-Beartooth Wilderness in Montana

*Statement on Signing S. 1671 Into Law.
March 27, 1978*

I am signing into law today S. 1671, which designates the Absaroka-Beartooth Wilderness in the State of Montana.

This act adds 904,500 acres of some of Montana's most rugged and beautiful backcountry alpine lakes, meadows, and mountains to the National Wilderness Preservation System. It is the product of years of work by that tireless and dedicated conservationist, the late Senator Lee Metcalf of Montana. The enactment of this bill fulfills one of his dreams. I want to express my appreciation for the dedication of Senator Metcalf and to his colleagues in the Senate and House of Representatives who have helped make this act possible.

This administration's goal of incorporating the Nation's most deserving areas as wilderness before they are lost forever moves an important step closer to realization with the enactment of this bill.

NOTE: As enacted, S. 1671 is Public Law 95-249, approved March 27.

Redwood National Park Expansion Bill

*Statement on Signing H.R. 3813 Into Law.
March 27, 1978*

I take great pleasure today in signing into law H.R. 3813, which expands the boundaries of the Redwood National Park in California. Enactment of this bill implements one of the recommendations in the environmental message I sent to Congress last year.

This act will permit more people to visit the magnificent groves along Redwood Creek that contain the world's tallest trees and will ensure that those trees are adequately protected. The existing park will be nearly doubled in size by the addition of 48,000 acres of land. Some of the land to be acquired has been damaged by logging operations, and this bill will enable the Secretary of the Interior to restore it to as close to its natural state as possible.

I commend the many supporters of this important legislation. I especially want to thank Representative Phillip Burton and Senator Alan Cranston, both of California, and Senator James Abourezk for their leadership and commitment to the passage of this bill. Thanks also to Secretary Andrus, who made support of this legislation one of the first acts of this administration, and to Senator Clifford Hansen for his help in guiding the bill through the Senate.

At the same time, however, I must express my serious concerns with the extraordinary worker protection provisions contained in H.R. 3813. During the consideration of this bill, this administration repeatedly stated its firm resolve to ensure that the full range of existing Federal assistance benefits would be made available to individuals and communities adversely affected by the park expansion. I believe that in the absence of overriding national policy considerations, all workers who have lost their jobs through no fault of their own should be treated equally by the Federal Government.

While I am signing H.R. 3813 for the purpose of providing needed protection for Redwood National Park, this action in no way constitutes an endorsement by this administration of special worker benefits programs in future legislation.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 3813 is Public Law 95-250, approved March 27.

National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration

Nomination of George S. Benton To Be Associate Administrator. March 27, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate George S. Benton, of Baltimore, Md., to be Associate Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA). He would replace John Townsend, who has resigned.

Benton was born September 24, 1917, in Oak Park, Ill. He received an S.B. (1942) and Ph. D. (1947) from the University of Chicago.

From 1946 to 1948, Benton taught meteorology at the University of Chicago. From 1948 to 1960, he taught civil engineering at the Johns Hopkins University, and from 1960 to 1966, he was chairman of the Department of Mechanics and professor of meteorology at Johns Hopkins.

From 1967 to 1969, Benton was an adjoint professor in the Department of Astrogeophysics at the University of Colorado. From 1966 to 1969, he was Director of the Environmental Research Laboratories of the Environmental Science Services Administration (now NOAA) in Denver.

In 1969-70, Benton was chairman of the Department of Earth and Planetary Sciences and professor of meteorology at Johns Hopkins. From 1970 to 1972, he was dean of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences there, and from 1972 until 1977, he was vice president for Homewood Divisions of Johns Hopkins. Since earlier this year, he has been Assistant Administrator of NOAA.

Benton has served as a consultant and has been on numerous academic and government panels and commissions on meteorological subjects.

Federal Coal Mine Health Activities

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. March 27, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the 1975 Annual Report of Health Activities under the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969.

I recommend that the statutory reporting requirement for this report be changed from once every year to once every three years. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare staff resources and time could be better spent on more research rather than on the preparation of annual reports of largely repetitious material. Basic information in this field has been known for some time, and new findings develop only slowly and infrequently. All of the information contained in this report is available to Congress during annual appropriations and oversight hearings, and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will inform Congress immediately of any scientific breakthroughs in the field.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,

Federal Advisory Committees

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. March 27, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of Section 6(c) of the Federal Advisory Committee Act, I am transmitting the sixth annual report on the status of Advisory Committees.

This report reflects the results of the 1977 government-wide, zero-base review that I directed be conducted of all advisory committees:

—The total number of committees was reduced to 875 from 1,159 at the end of 1976.

—While some new committees were established during the year, some 333 committees were terminated, and the number was reduced further by 81 as the result of the consolidation of existing committees.

While we recognize the contributions that advisory committees can make, we will continue our efforts to assure, through careful management and review, that such committees are terminated when they no longer are necessary, and that new committees are established only when they are essential to meet the responsibilities of the Government.

National Urban Policy

*Remarks Announcing the Policy.
March 27, 1978*

Contrary to any previous reports, the urban policy has come through strong and unscathed. And I come this afternoon to address not recipients of the urban policy, but those of you who participated so deeply and sincerely and effectively in the evolution of it.

Twenty-one months ago in Milwaukee, I pledged to the United States Conference of Mayors that if I became President, the cities of our country would have a friend, an ally, and a partner in the White House.

Today I want to affirm that friendship, to cement that alliance, and to give form and substance to that partnership.

I'm convinced that it is in our national interest not only to save our cities and urban communities but also to strengthen them and to make them more attractive places in which to live and to work.

The policy that is embodied in the message that I'm sending to Congress today is designed to marshal the immense resources of America in a long-term commitment to pursue that goal. It is a comprehensive policy, aimed both at making our cities healthier and at improving the lives of the people who live in them.

The deterioration of urban life in the United States is one of the most complex and deeply rooted problems of our age. The Federal Government has a clear duty to lead the effort to reverse that deterioration, and I intend to provide the leadership.

But Federal efforts alone will never be enough. Everyone in this land has a personal stake in the health of our urban places. In the complex web of economic, social, and cultural relationships which holds our society together, none of us are immune from the distress of others. If we are to preserve the special values of urban, suburban, and rural life, we must recognize that those values are interdependent. To a greater extent than ever before, the future of our cities and the destiny of our Nation are joined.

I believe that this link is now recognized by almost every American. Yet, throughout most of our history, America has been ambivalent about our cities.

Reflecting these conflicting attitudes, direct Federal involvement in urban affairs has followed a kind of seesaw pattern. In formulating this new policy, we've had the benefit of past experience.

From the experience of the urban renewal program of the 1950's, we learned to be skeptical about what Reinhold Niebuhr called the "doctrine of salvation through bricks"—the idea that we can bulldoze away our urban problems.

From the experience of the Great Society in the 1960's and during more recent years, we learned—despite many successes—that we can succeed only if all levels of government work together with private citizens and interests in a fairly and fully coordinated way toward common goals.

The time has come to put an end to these abrupt swings of policy and to replace them with the kind of long-range urban policy that I promised in Milwaukee—"a coherent national urban policy that is consistent, compassionate, realistic, and that reflects the decency and the good sense of the American people."

We must acknowledge the value of our urban communities. This value includes a physical plant that must not be allowed to deteriorate any further—trillions of dollars invested in buildings, houses, streets and roads, transit systems, water and sewage systems, factories, offices, parks.

Even more important is the social value of cities to those who live in them and to the rest of those who live close to them—their services as centers of culture, entertainment, finance; the enormous variety of human exchange that's possible there; their creativity and their contribution to our common life; and the role they've always played as homes for people of all kinds and all circumstances who are searching for the American dream of opportunity.

Yet many of these communities and the people who live in them are in distress, and others face future hardship if we fail to act.

Today I call on all of you and the institutions and groups that you represent to join me in building a new partnership to conserve our communities—a working alliance of all levels of government, with the private sector of our economy and with our citizens in their communities and neighborhoods.

Are you willing to help? [Applause]

In spite of some beliefs that have been expressed around this particular home, mayors hold the most difficult public offices in our land. [Laughter] It's time that the rest of us fully support their efforts to ensure that our cities will not merely survive but prosper.

This new partnership offers no quick nor easy solutions. No such solutions exist. But it does give us the tools to build the kind of creative alliance that can produce long-term solutions. This is a tough, no-nonsense program, based on efficiency, effectiveness, and cooperation.

The new partnership is guided by these principles: simplifying and improving existing programs and policy; combining the resources of Federal, State, and local government and using them as a lever to involve the much greater strength of our private economy to conserve and strengthen our cities and communities; being flexible enough to give help where it's most needed and to respond to changing circumstances and the particular needs of each individual and different community; increasing access to opportunity for those who are disadvantaged in a special way by economic circumstances or by a history of discrimination; and, above all, drawing on the sense of community and the volunteer effort that I believe is still alive in America and on the loyalty that Americans feel for their own homes and their own neighborhoods.

The Federal contribution to the new partnership is a long-term commitment, involving three major areas of activity: first, the very substantial increases we've made and are making in programs that directly benefit urban communities; second, the reorientation of Federal activities to make certain that they support our urban goals; and third, new initiatives to help urban communities fiscally and economically and to help their people meet human and social needs.

This administration has been committed to the future of urban America ever since the first day that I took office. That's why we did not wait until the formal announcement of a national urban policy to strengthen existing programs and to initiate new ones that are crucial to that policy. The Congress, represented well here today, has cooperated enthusiastically.

Total assistance—in just 2 years—to State and local governments has already been increased by 25 percent, from $68 billion to $85 billion. We've had major improvements in such urban-related programs as the Community Development Block Grant program and the new Urban Development Action Grant program and urban education. I proposed a doubling in our expenditures for employment and training to over $12 billion in 1979, and we have already increased the number of public service jobs by 150 percent. We added 4.1 million new jobs last year.

In many of these programs, we are enlarging the share that's provided to cities and to urban areas. And I've asked for the abolition of the present disastrous welfare system and its replacement with a fair and workable Better Jobs and Income program that will provide immediate fiscal relief to State and local governments.

But increases in spending cannot be a substitute for effectiveness overall, nor are they the sole measure of the depth or extent of our commitment.

For those who live in our urban areas, the gravest flaw in past Federal policy was not that we failed to spend money; it was that too many of the programs were ineffective, and too many that did work had their benefits canceled by other conflicting Federal and State activities.

In developing this national urban policy, we took a long, hard look at the work of every single major department in the Federal Government. In the process, agencies ranging from the Defense Department to the General Services Administration have been made more sensitive to urban concerns. This is the beginning of a long-term change in the attitude of the entire Government bureaucracy toward urban communities.

Our review generated a large number of proposals for changes in existing programs. Some will require legislation; most of them can be done through immediate administrative action. There are more than 150 of them. Let me mention just three or four.

All agencies will develop goals and timetables for minority participation in their grants and contracts. Five major agencies have already taken such action.

The Defense Department will set up a new program to increase purchases in urban areas.

The Environmental Protection Agency will modify its water and sewer programs to discourage wasteful sprawl.

The General Services Administration will retain facilities in downtown urban areas and will also put new ones there.

If the kind of review that led to these changes had been done on a regular basis in the past, our urban problems would be much less severe today.

As a key component part of the comprehensive urban policy, I'm establishing a continuing mechanism, involving many of you, to analyze the effects of new Federal policies and programs on our communities. Once that mechanism is in place, analysis of the urban and regional impact of new programs will be an integral and a permanent part of all policy development throughout our Government.

I believe that this reorientation of Federal activities, to take account of the needs of other communities, will be as significant as any action the Federal Government could take.

But even with substantial increases and improvements in existing programs, gaps still remain. The new initiatives that I am proposing today—$4.4 billion in budget authority, $1.7 billion in new tax incentives, and $2.2 billion in loan guarantees—are designed precisely to fill those gaps.

To make government at all levels more efficient, I propose incentives to cities with coordinated economic development plans, a simplification of planning requirements, and a new coordinating mechanism for Federal programs.

To help relieve the distress of the most fiscally strained communities—replace the expiring countercyclical aid program with a new fiscal assistance program targeted on those communities with the highest unemployment rate.

To encourage the States to channel additional resources into their own distressed areas—a new incentive grant program.

To provide increased opportunities for our unemployed—a new employment tax credit to encourage private industry to hire jobless young people, whose plight is among the most serious human problems of our whole society, and a new program to encourage private industry, a new partnership with mayors, to hire and to train more disadvantaged workers.

To strengthen the economic base of cities—major incentives to private investment in urban areas through increased and affordable credit from a new National Development Bank, expanded grants, and a new tax incentive, and an innovative program of labor-intensive public works, aimed at repairing and rehabilitating the existing facilities in our urban communities.

An inner-city health and social service initiative, together with expanded support for mass transit, housing rehabilitation, and urban parks and recreation initiative, and a new arts and cultural program will promote community and human development and preserve historic buildings in our urban areas.

And to marshal the thousands of Americans who want to contribute their time and energy to the betterment of their own neighborhoods, I'm proposing neighborhood rehabilitation and anticrime projects and a new Urban Volunteer Corps.

All of us recognize, again, that the Federal Government does not have the resources by itself to do the job. We are ready to provide the leadership, the commitment, and the incentives which will encourage all sectors of our country to rebuild and to maintain the quality of America's communities.

Only through unprecedented consultation and cooperation has this urban policy been evolved. Thousands of government officials and private citizens have worked for many months to reach this goal, and now this same mutual effort can ensure success in implementing the proposals.

This job will not be done overnight. Problems which have built up over generations cannot be reversed in a year or even in a term of a President or a Senator. But let there be no doubt that today marks the turning point. For today, we commit the Federal Government to the long-term goal of making America's cities more attractive places in which to work and to live, and helping the people who live in them lead happier and more useful lives. With your help we will not fail.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4 p.m. to a group of Federal, State, and local officials in the East Room at the White House.

National Urban Policy

Message to the Congress. March 27, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit today my proposals for a comprehensive national urban policy. These proposals set a policy framework for actions my Administration has already taken, for proposed new initiatives, and for our efforts to assist America's communities and their residents in the years to come. The policy represents a comprehensive, long-term commitment to the Nation's urban areas.

The urban policy I am announcing today will build a New Partnership involving all levels of government, the private sector, and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in a major effort to make America's cities better places in which to live and work. It is a comprehensive policy aimed both at making cities more healthy and improving the lives of the people who live in them.

The major proposals will:

- Improve the effectiveness of existing Federal programs by coordinating these programs, simplifying planning requirements, reorienting resources, and reducing paperwork. And the proposals will make Federal actions more supportive of the urban policy effort and develop a process for analyzing the urban and community impact of all major Federal initiatives.

- Provide employment opportunities, primarily in the private sector, to the long-term unemployed and the disadvantaged in cities. This will be done through a labor-intensive public works program and tax and other incentives for business to hire the long-term unemployed.

- Provide fiscal relief to the most hard-pressed communities.

- Provide strong incentives to attract private investment to distressed communities, including the creation of a National Development Bank, expanded grant programs and targeted tax incentives.

- Encourage States to become partners in assisting urban areas through a new incentive grant program.

- Stimulate greater involvement by neighborhood organizations and voluntary associations through funding neighneighborhood development projects and by creating an Urban Volunteer Corps. These efforts will be undertaken with the approval of local elected officials.

- Increase access to opportunity for those disadvantaged by economic circumstance or a history of discrimination.

- Provide additional social and health services to disadvantaged people in cities and communities.

- Improve the urban physical environment and the cultural and aesthetic aspects of urban life by providing additional assistance for housing rehabilitation, mass transit, the arts, culture, parks and recreation facilities.

America's communities are an invaluable national asset. They are the center of our culture, the incubators of new ideas and inventions, the centers of commerce and finance, and the homes of our great museums, libraries and theatres. Cities contain trillions of dollars of public and private investments—investments which we must conserve, rehabilitate and fully use.

The New Partnership I am proposing today will focus the full energies of my Administration on a comprehensive, long-term effort. It will encourage States to redirect their own resources to support their urban areas more effectively. It will encourage local governments to streamline and coordinate their own activities. It will offer incentives to the private sector to make new investments in economically depressed communities. And it will involve citizens and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in meeting the economic and social needs of their communities.

The New Partnership will be guided by these principles:

- Simplifying and improving programs and policy at all levels of government.

- Combining the resources of Federal, State and local government, and using them as a lever to involve the even greater strength of our private economy to conserve and strengthen our cities and communities.

- Being flexible enough to give help where it is most needed and to respond to the particular needs of each community.

- Increasing access to opportunity for those disadvantaged by economic circumstances or history of discrimination.

- And above all, drawing on the sense of community and voluntary effort that I believe is alive in America, and on the loyalty that Americans feel for their neighborhoods.

The need for a New Partnership is clear from the record of the last fifteen years. During the 1960's, the Federal government took a strong leadership role in responding to the problems of the cities. The Federal government attempted to identify the problems, develop the solutions and implement the programs. State and local governments and the private sector were not sufficiently involved. While many of these programs were successful, we learned an important lesson: that the Federal government alone has neither the resources nor the knowledge to solve all urban problems.

An equally important lesson emerged from the experience of the early 1970's. During this period, the Federal government retreated from its responsibilities, leaving States and localities with insufficient resources, interest or leadership to accomplish all that needed to be done. We learned that States and localities cannot solve the problems by themselves.

These experiences taught us that a successful urban policy must build a partnership that involves the leadership of the Federal government and the participation of all levels of government, the private sector, neighborhood and voluntary organizations and individual citizens.

PRIOR ACTIONS

The problems of our Nation's cities are complex and deep-seated. They have developed gradually over a generation as a result of private market and demographic forces and inadvertent government action; and the problems worsened markedly during the early 1970's.

These problems will not be solved immediately. They can be solved only by the long-term commitment which I offer today, and by the efforts of all levels of government, the private sector and neighborhood and voluntary organizations.

For my Administration, this commitment began on the day I took office and it will continue throughout my Presidency. With the cooperation of Congress, my Administration has already provided substantial increases in funding in many of the major urban assistance programs. Total assistance to State and local governments has increased by 25 percent, from $68 billion in FY 1977 to $85 billion in FY 1979. These increases are the direct result of actions we have taken during the past 14 months. They are as much a part of my Administration's urban policy as the initiatives which I am announcing today. Some of the most important programs have already been enacted into law or proposed to the Congress. These include:

- A $2.7 billion increase over three years in the Community Development Block Grant Program, accompanied by a change in the formula to provide more assistance to the older and declining cities.

- A $400 million a year Urban Development Action Grant Program providing assistance primarily to distressed cities.

- An expansion of youth and training programs and an increase in the number of public service employment jobs, from 325,000 to 725,000. Expenditures for employment and training doubled from FY '77 to FY '79 to over $12 billion.

- A $400 million private sector jobs proposal has been included in my proposal to reauthorize the CETA legislation. This initiative will encourage private businesses to hire the long-term unemployed and the disadvantaged.

- A sixty-five percent increase in grants provided by the Economic Development Administration to urban areas.

- A thirty percent increase in overall Federal assistance to education, including a $400 million increase in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, targeted in substantial part to large city school systems with a concentration of children from low-income families.

- An economic stimulus package enacted last year, (Anti-Recession Fiscal Assistance, Local Public Works and CETA) which provided almost $9 billion in additional aid to States and cities.

- A welfare reform proposal which, upon passage, will provide immediate fiscal relief to State and local governments.

- A doubling of outlays for the Section 312 housing rehabilitation loan program.

- Creation of a consumer cooperative bank which would provide financing assistance to consumer cooperatives which have difficulty obtaining conventional financing.

IMPROVEMENTS IN EXISTING PROGRAMS

The Administration's Urban and Regional Policy Group (URPG) has examined all of the major urban assistance programs and proposed improvements. It also has worked with agencies traditionally not involved in urban policy, such as the Defense Department, the General Services Administration, and the Environmental Protection Agency, and has developed proposals to make their actions more supportive of urban areas. As a result of this massive effort, the Federal government has become more sensitive to urban problems and more committed to their solutions.

The review of existing Federal programs has resulted in more than 150 improvements in existing programs. Most of these improvements can be undertaken immediately through administrative action. Some will require legislation. None will increase the Federal budget.

A few examples of the improvements are:

- All agencies will develop goals and timetables for minority participation in their grants and contracts—five major agencies have already begun.

- The Defense Department will set up a new program to increase procurement in urban areas.

- EPA will modify its water and sewer program to discourage wasteful sprawl.

- HUD has retargeted the Tandem Mortgage Assistance Program to provide greater support for urban housing.

- The existing countercyclical fiscal assistance program will be retargeted to help governments with unemployment rates above the national average.

- HUD and EDA are developing common planning and application requirements.

- The General Services Administration will attempt to locate Federal facilities in cities whenever such a location is not inconsistent with the agency's mission.

- The Department of Transportation has proposed legislation to consolidate many categories of urban highway and transit grants, and to standardize the local matching share. These steps will provide local governments with greater flexibility to develop transportation systems suited to their needs.

- The Environmental Protection Agency will amend its regulations to accommodate new economic development in high pollution areas. Localities will be permitted to "bank" reductions in pollution which result from firms going out of business. These reductions then can be transferred to new firms locating in the community.

The effect of all these changes may be greater than even the substantial new initiatives which I have proposed in this message.

NEW INITIATIVES

The new initiatives which I am announcing today address five major urban needs:

- 1) Improving the operation of Federal, State and local governments
- 2) Employment and Economic Development
- 3) Fiscal Assistance
- 4) Community and Human Development
- 5) Neighborhoods and Voluntary Associations

These initiatives require $4.4 billion in budget authority, $1.7 billion in new tax incentives, and $2.2 billion in guaranteed loan authority in FY 1979. For FY 1980 the budget authority will be $6.1 billion, the tax incentives $1.7 billion and the guaranteed loan authority $3.8 billion.

I. IMPROVING THE OPERATION OF FEDERAL, STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

Federal Programs

Over the long run, reorganization of the economic and community development programs may be necessary. Last June, I directed my reorganization project staff in the Office of Management and Budget to begin exploring the reorganization options. They have completed the first stages of this work. During the next several months, they will consult with the Congress, State and local officials and the public to develop the best solution.

There are several actions I will take immediately.

- Urban and Community Impact Analysis

I am implementing a process through my Domestic Policy Staff (DPS) and Office of Management and Budget (OMB) to ensure that we do not inadvertently take actions which contradict the goals of the urban policy. Each agency submitting a major domestic initiative must include its own urban and community impact analysis. DPS and OMB will review these submissions and will ensure that any anti-urban impacts of proposed Federal policies will be brought to my attention.

- Interagency Coordinating Council

To improve program coordination, I will form an Interagency Coordinating Council, composed of the Assistant Secretaries with major program responsibilities in the key urban departments. The Council will have two functions:

It will serve as a catalyst for operational improvements which cut across Departments (for example, instituting uniform grant applications) ; and it will encourage interagency cooperation on projects which are too large or too complex to be funded by one agency. This Council will, for the first time, provide a coordinated Federal response to communities which develop comprehensive and multi-year projects. It will have direction from the Executive Office of the President.

- Consolidating Planning Requirements and Other Management Improvements

We soon will announce the consolidation of intra-agency planning requirements. I have asked the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to direct an interagency task force to improve the management of Federal grant-in-aid programs and consolidate the numerous planning requirements in the community and economic development grant programs.

- Improved Data and Information

I have asked the Secretary of Commerce, in her capacity as Chair of the Statistical Policy Coordination Committee, to design an improved urban data and information system. At the present time much of this data is inadequate or out of date.

The Role of State Governments

State government policies, even more than Federal policies, are important to the fiscal and economic health of cities. States affect their cities in a number of ways, including setting taxation and annexation powers, determining the placement of major development investments and apportioning the financial responsibility for welfare and education expenditures.

The Federal government has little or no control over these developments, all of which clearly affect the economic and fiscal health of cities and communities.

These State responsibilities underscore the need for an urban policy which includes the States as full and equal partners. The effectiveness of our urban policy will be enhanced if the States can be encouraged to complement the Federal effort.

To encourage States to support their urban areas, I will offer a new program of State incentive grants. These grants will be provided, on a discretionary basis, to States which adopt approved plans to help their cities and communities. The plans must be developed with the participation and approval of communities within the State. The grants will be provided to the States to finance a portion of the plan. The State Incentive Grant Program will be administered by HUD and will provide $400 million over two years.

Local Government Role

Many communities and cities can improve management and planning improvements by reforming fiscal management practices, streamlining local regulatory procedures, and coordinating local community and economic development activities.

The Federal government provides planning and technical assistance to communities through HUD and Commerce to help cities improve their management and planning practices. These funds will be used increasingly to build the local government's capacity to undertake the necessary fiscal and management reforms.

The Federal government will offer special consideration in discretionary programs to cities which achieve coordinated action at the local level.

II. EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

There is a serious shortage of jobs for many residents of our urban areas and a lack of investment to build the tax base of our cities.

The urban policy will address this issue in two ways.

In the short run, it will provide additional employment opportunities through a labor-intensive public works program, a targeted employment tax credit, and a private sector training and jobs initiative to encourage businesses to hire the hardcore unemployed, together with the extension I have already proposed in employment and training opportunities under the CETA Act.

In the long run, the policy attempts to rebuild the private sector economic base of these communities through a National Development Bank, a special tax incentive, an increase in economic development grants and other incentives.

Labor-intensive Public Works

I ask Congress for $1 billion a year for a program of labor-intensive public works, targeted on communities with high unemployment. Half of the estimated 60,000 full-time equivalent jobs created annually by this program will be reserved for the disadvantaged and the long-term unemployed. These workers will be paid at Davis-Bacon trainee wage levels.

This program will enable cities to make needed repairs on buildings, streets, parks, and other public facilities.

In contrast to the Local Public Works program—which involves projects requiring large equipment, material expenditures and a prolonged planning period—more of the funds under this labor-intensive program will go to job creation.

Targeted Employment Tax Credit

I also propose a Targeted Employment Tax Credit to encourage business to hire disadvantaged young workers between the ages of 18 and 24 who suffer the highest unemployment rates in the Nation.

Under my proposal, private employers of young and disadvantaged, or handicapped, workers would be entitled to claim a $2,000 tax credit for each eligible worker during the first year of employment and a $1,500 credit for each eligible worker during the second year.

I am proposing this Targeted Employment Tax Credit as a substitute for the expiring Employment Tax Credit. The current program costs $2.5 billion a year and has had little influence on hiring decisions. The Administration's targeted program will cost approximately $1.5 billion a year, with far greater impact.

Location of Federal Facilities

I will sign a new Executive Order directing the General Services Administration to give first priority to cities in locating new Federal facilities or consolidating or relocating existing facilities. Under my Administration, Federal facilities will be located in cities, unless such a location is inconsistent with the agency's mission.

Federal buildings and facilities can be an important source of jobs and of rental payments and, in many cities, a principal stabilizing force preventing decline.

The Federal government should set an example for the private sector to invest in urban areas.

Federal Government Procurement

To assure that Federal procurement is used to strengthen the economic base of our Nation's cities and communities, I will:

- strengthen the implementation of the existing procurement set-aside program for labor surplus areas, by directing the General Services Administration to work with each agency to develop specific procurement targets and to monitor their implementation. GSA will report to me every six months on the progress of each Agency;

- direct the Defense Department to implement an experimental program to target more of its procurement to high unemployment areas.

National Development Bank

I propose the creation of a National Development Bank, which would encourage businesses to locate or expand in economically distressed urban and rural areas. The Bank would be authorized to guarantee investments totaling $11 billion through 1981.

To lower operating costs in urban areas, the Bank would provide long-term, low-cost financing which, in conjunction with expanded grant programs administered by HUD and EDA, will reduce a firm's financing costs by up to 60 percent.

The Bank uses four major financing tools:

- Grants of up to 15 percent of a firm's total capital cost, to a maximum $3 million, for fixed assets of a project. The grants, which would be made under expanded EDA and HUD authorities, would cover expenditures for land assembly, site preparation, rehabilitation, and equipment.

- Loan guarantees, provided by the Bank to cover three-quarters of the remaining capital costs up to a maximum of $15 million per project. The Bank could, at its discretion, reduce the interest rate down to two and one-half percent for particularly desirable projects. Bank financing would be conditioned on obtaining 21 percent of the project's total costs from private lenders.

- The ceiling for industrial reserve bonds in economically distressed areas would be increased from $5 to $20 million with the approval of the Bank. A business which used this financing for a project could also receive a grant.

- The Bank also will provide a secondary loan market for private loans in eligible areas to finance capital expenditures. This will be particularly beneficial to small businesses.

Bank projects will require the approval of State or local government economic development entities, which would be responsible to the elected local leadership. Distressed urban and rural areas would be eligible. Additional employment would be a key test of project eligibility.

The Bank will be an interagency corporation, governed by a Board composed of the Secretaries of HUD, Commerce and the Treasury. This will ensure coordination between the major economic, community development and urban finance agencies of the government.

The Office of Management and Budget is currently assessing the organization of the Federal economic and community development activities. The Bank will function on an interagency basis pending recommendations in this area.

Economic Development Grants

I propose substantial increases of $275 million each in the UDAG grant program and the EDA Title IX program. These increases will be used in conjunction with the financing incentives available from the National Development Bank.

Taken together these major increases will help leverage substantial new private sector investment in urban areas and address the long-term economic deterioration experienced by certain urban and rural areas.

Differential Investment Tax Credit

I propose that firms that locate or expand in economically distressed areas be eligible for a differential 5 percent investment tax credit, to a total of 15 percent for both structures and equipment. The credit would be available only to firms awarded "Certificates of Necessity" by the Commerce Department based on financing need and employment potential.

Commerce will be authorized to issue up to $200 million in certificates for each of the next two years.

Air Quality Planning Grants

I propose a $25 million planning grant program to help cities and communities comply with the Clean Air Act without limiting severely new, private sector investment within their areas.

I have also asked EPA, HUD and EDA to provide technical assistance to help local governments reconcile potential conflicts between air pollution and economic development goals.

Minority Business

Minority businesses are a critical part of the private sector economic base of many cities, communities and neighborhoods, and provide important employment opportunities to city residents.

I propose today two important initiatives which will increase the role of minority businesses in our economy. First, in comparison with FY 1977 levels, we will triple Federal procurement from minority businesses by the end of FY 1979—an increase over our earlier commitment to double minority procurement.

In addition, I intend to ask all Federal agencies to include goals for minority business participation in their contract and grant-in-aid programs. Five agencies—HUD, Commerce, EPA, Interior and DOT—already have proposed improvements in minority business programs. These programs all build on our successful experience with the Local Public Works Program.

Finally, I intend to facilitate greater interaction between the minority business community and the leaders of our Nation's largest corporations.

Community Development Corporations

I propose that an additional $20 million be appropriated to the Community Services Administration as venture capital for the most effective Community Development Corporations. This assistance will help them have a substantial impact on their designated areas.

The funding will be made available for projects that receive support from local elected officials, involve leveraging private sector funds and are coordinated with HUD, EDA or the Small Business Administration.

Role of Private Financial Institutions

An effective urban strategy must involve private financial institutions. I am asking the independent financial regulatory agencies to develop appropriate actions, consistent with safe, sound and prudent lending practices, to encourage financial institutions to play a greater role in meeting the credit needs of their communities.

First, I am requesting that financial regulatory agencies determine what further actions are necessary to halt the practice of redlining—the refusal to extend credit without a sound economic justification. I will encourage those agencies to develop strong, consistent and effective regulations to implement the Community Reinvestment Act.

Second, I propose the creation of an Institute for Community Investment, under the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. The Institute will bring together appraisers, realtors, lenders, building and insurance companies to develop a consistent approach toward urban lending and to train urban lending specialists.

Third, I propose a pilot program to create Neighborhood Commercial Reinvestment Centers under the Comptroller of the Currency. This proposal is an adaptation of the highly successful Urban Reinvestment Task Force housing credit concept to the commercial credit area. Neighborhood Commercial Reinvestment Centers will be local organizations, comprised of merchants and neighborhood residents, local government officials, and commercial banks which will provide business credit in urban neighborhoods. SBA, EDA, and HUD will work with the financial regulatory agencies to revitalize specific commercial areas.

Finally, I have asked the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to chair an interagency task force to evaluate the availability of credit in urban areas and recommend appropriate further action. I have asked the task force to examine and make recommendations with respect to the following areas:

- The availability of mortgage and commercial credit in urban areas, and the impacts of the activities of Federal agencies on such credit;
- Existing mortgage insurance, casualty insurance and business credit insurance programs;
- The full range of urban credit and insurance risk reduction techniques.

III. FISCAL ASSISTANCE

While the fiscal condition of many State and local governments has improved dramatically over the last three years, many cities and communities still are experiencing severe problems. These cities and communities require fiscal assistance from the Federal government, if they are to avoid severe service cutbacks or tax increases.

Supplemental Fiscal Assistance

Cities and communities currently receive fiscal assistance through the Anti-Recession Fiscal Assistance Act (ARFA), which expires on September 30, 1978. This program has been an effective tool for helping States and local governments withstand the fiscal impact of high unemployment.

Current unemployment projections, however, suggest that even if the ARFA program were extended in its current form, it would phase out by mid-FY 1979, when unemployment is expected to drop below six percent. If the program is permitted to phase out, many cities and communities will experience severe fiscal strain.

I propose today that ARFA be replaced with a Supplemental Fiscal Assistance Program, which will provide $1 billion of fiscal assistance annually for the next two fiscal years to local governments experiencing significant fiscal strain. Further extension of this program will be considered together with General Revenue Sharing.

Fiscal Relief in Welfare Proposal

In addition, I propose to phase in the fiscal relief component of the Better Jobs and Income Act as soon as Congress passes this legislation, rather than in 1981 as originally planned.

IV. COMMUNITY AND HUMAN DEVELOPMENT

A comprehensive program to revitalize America's cities must provide for community and human needs. This involves both physical facilities, such as parks, recreation facilities, housing and transportation systems, and the provision of health and social services.

Housing Rehabilitation

The conservation and upgrading of our housing stock is important to maintaining the strength of urban areas. Housing rehabilitation improves the quality of community life and provides construction jobs in areas of high unemployment.

I propose an additional $150 million in FY 1979 for the Section 312 rehabilitation loan program, which will more than double the existing program. This expanded effort will permit the rehabilitation of small multi-family housing projects in distressed neighborhoods.

Urban Transportation

In many cities, public transportation is inadequately financed. The Federal government has begun to make substantial investments to rehabilitate, revitalize and construct urban transportation systems.

I have already submitted to Congress my proposals to extend and strengthen the highway and mass transit programs.

To supplement these efforts I today propose an additional $200 million for capital investments in intermodal urban transportation projects. These funds will be used to link existing transportation facilities in selected cities.

Resource Recovery Planning

Solid waste disposal is a growing problem in the many urban areas which face a shortage of landfill sites. At the same time, techniques to recover valuable resources and energy from solid waste have emerged.

I will request $15 million for the EPA to provide grants of $300,000 to $400,000 to cities for feasibility studies of solid waste recovery systems.

Arts and Culture

Cities are centers of culture and art, which thrive on the vitality of the urban environment.

To help renew and develop this artistic and cultural spirit, I propose a new Livable Cities program administered by the Department of Housing and Urban Development, with the participation of the National Endowment for the Arts. This program will provide up to $20 million in grants to States and communities for neighborhood- and community-based arts programs, urban design and planning, and the creation and display of art in public spaces. Historic preservation of buildings should also be encouraged.

Urban Parks and Recreation

The quality of life in urban areas is critically affected by the availability of open spaces and recreation facilities. Yet hard pressed communities often lack the resources to maintain and invest adequately in these amenities.

To address this problem, I propose a major new Federal grant program. Urban communities will compete for funds to revive and rebuild parks and recreation facilities. Challenge grants totalling $150 million will be provided for construction and major rehabilitation of urban recreation systems, such as parks, tennis and basketball courts, swimming pools, bicycle paths, and other facilities. Cities will be awarded grants based on the quality of their planning, the degree of need and their ability to match the Federal funds with private and local contributions.

Social Services

Urban revitalization efforts must be accompanied by efforts to help those in need to improve their own lives. A variety of income support and social service programs are designed to do this. Since 1974, however, the support given to State social service programs by the Federal government has declined in real terms.

I propose an additional $150 million of new budget authority for the Title XX program. These funds will be used to improve the delivery of social services in urban areas—ranging from Meals on Wheels for the elderly to day care for children of working mothers—and to develop greater coordination between local, public and private agencies.

Health Services

Nearly 50 million Americans live in areas without adequate health services. These areas, many of which are in inner cities, suffer from higher infant mortality rates, greater poverty and shortages of health care personnel.

In underserved areas, emergency room and outpatient departments of city hospitals are used as the routine source of medical care by the poor, primarily due to the lack of private physicians. As these departments were not designed to provide comprehensive medical care, the hospital resources are strained and the poor often go without adequate care.

To help meet the primary health care needs of the urban poor and reduce the strain on city hospitals, I propose to expand federally-supported Community Health Centers and to fund city-sponsored programs which provide comprehensive, but less costly, primary care services. The city-sponsored programs will enroll the medically indigent in existing health systems, such as HMOs. They also will help expand locally-supported centers, reform hospital outpatient departments and provide comprehensive health services.

Education

Schools are the focus of community activities in many places. Yet they are seldom fully used or linked to other community and social services.

I intend to provide $1.5 million to expand the experimental Cities in Schools program which seeks to bridge the gap by uniting a number of social services within schools to better serve both students and their families. We intend to expand this promising new program to 10 pilot schools.

In addition, I urge the Congress to enact the $600 million increase in the Title I program of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which I recently proposed, including my recommendation that $400 million of these funds be targeted to cities and other areas with high concentrations of low-income families.

V. NEIGHBORHOODS AND VOLUNTEER ORGANIZATIONS

No resource of our urban communities is more valuable than the commitment of our citizens.

Volunteer groups, which gain strength from the selfless efforts of many individuals, make an indispensable contribution to their cities.

Urban Volunteer Corps

I propose a $40 million program in ACTION to increase the effectiveness of voluntary activities at the local level. With the agreement of local government, the program will create a corps of volunteers at the local level and match their skills with the needs of local governments and community and neighborhood organizations.

It also will provide small grants averaging $5,000 for voluntary improvement and beautification projects.

ACTION would select, with the concurrence of local government, a lead agency in each city to administer the Urban Volunteer Corps.

Self-Help Development Program

Neighborhood associations are playing a key role in housing and neighborhood revitalization. We must strengthen that role.

I will request $15 million in FY 1979 for a self-help development program to be administered by the Office for Neighborhoods in HUD.

This new program will provide funds for specific housing and revitalization projects in poor and low-income areas. Each project would involve the participation of local residents, the private sector and local government and would require the concurrence of the mayor.

Crime Prevention

Street crime is a serious problem in America's cities and communities. Over the last few years a number of promising initiatives have been undertaken by community groups and local law enforcement agencies to combat street crime. Escort services for the elderly, centers to help the victims of crime, and neighborhood watchers are examples of promising developments.

I propose a program which will add $10 million in new resources to existing efforts in the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration for a program operated jointly by ACTION and LEAA. Under this program, mayors and local neighborhood groups will develop community crime prevention programs based on successful pilot models. My reorganization proposals for LEAA and the legislation I will submit to extend the Law Enforcement Assistance Act will strengthen our efforts at crime prevention.

Community Development Credit Unions

Some urban communities are not served by any financial institutions. Community Development Credit Unions address this problem by investing their assets in the communities in which they are established. This type of credit union was first established under the poverty programs in the 1960's. About 225 exist today, and many are the only financial institutions in their communities.

I am proposing a $12 million program to provide $200,000 seed capital for new Community Development Credit Unions, to provide them with an operating subsidy for staff, training and technical assistance.

The job of revitalizing the urban communities of our country will not be done overnight. Problems which have accumulated gradually over generations cannot be solved in a year or even in the term of a President.

But I believe that a New Partnership—bringing together in a common effort all who have a stake in the future of our communities—can bring us closer to our long-term goals. We can make America's cities more attractive places in which to live and work; we can help the people of urban America lead happier and more useful lives. But we can only do it together.

Defense Economic Adjustment Programs

Executive Order 12049. March 27, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution of the United States of America, in order to provide coordinated Federal economic adjustment assistance necessitated by changes in Department of Defense activities, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Functions of the Secretary of Defense.

(a) The Secretary shall, through the Economic Adjustment Committee, design and establish an Economic Adjustment Program to assist in the alleviation of serious economic and social impacts that result from major Defense realignments. The program shall provide for:

1. Identification of Defense-related impact problems of States, metropolitan areas, or communities that require assistance.

2. Preparation of development strategies and action plans to coordinate Federal, State and local economic adjustment efforts.

3. Strengthened and uniform economic impact analysis and analysis of community requirements for Federal economic adjustment resources, prior to base realignment action.

4. Timely and earliest possible consultation and cooperation with local,

State and Federal officials concerning impact problems and coordinated inter-agency and intergovernmental adjustment assistance.

5. A clearinghouse service to exchange information among Federal, State and local officials involved in the resolution of community adjustment problems; e.g., previous studies, technical information, and sources of public and private financing.

6. Application of consistent policies, practices, and procedures in the administration of Federal programs that are utilized to assist Defense impact communities.

7. Encouragement of effective State and regional cooperation and concerted involvement of public interest groups and private sector organizations in Defense adjustment activities.

8. Development, with representatives of appropriate agencies, of uniform criteria for the determination of social economic impact of a particular realignment.

9. Identification and strengthening of existing agency mechanisms to better coordinate employment opportunities for displaced agency personnel.

10. Increased attractiveness to the private sector of interim usage of lands and buildings and ways of streamlining property disposal procedures to enable impacted communities to acquire base property for job-generation purposes as military activities phase down.

(b) The Secretary of Defense shall ensure that sufficient resources and personnel are allocated to carry out these functions.

SEC. 2. Economic Adjustment Committee. (a) The Economic Adjustment Committee is hereby continued.

(b) The Committee shall be composed of the following, or a principal deputy, and such others as the President may designate:

- (1) The Secretary of Defense, who shall be the Chairman of the Committee.
- (2) The Secretary of Agriculture.
- (3) The Secretary of Commerce.
- (4) The Secretary of Energy.
- (5) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.
- (6) The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.
- (7) The Secretary of the Interior.
- (8) The Secretary of Labor.
- (9) The Secretary of Transportation.
- (10) The Attorney General.
- (11) The Chairman, Council of Economic Advisers.
- (12) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget.
- (13) The Director of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.
- (14) The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.
- (15) The Director of the Community Services Administration.
- (16) The Administrator of General Services.
- (17) The Administrator of the Small Business Administration.
- (18) The Chairman of the United States Civil Service Commission.

(c) The Committee shall advise, assist, and support the Secretary of Defense's Economic Adjustment activities.

(d) The Secretary of Defense shall provide all necessary administrative support for the Committee.

SEC. 3. Responsibility of Executive Agencies.

(a) The head of each agency represented on the Economic Adjustment Committee shall designate a permanent representative to: (1) serve as liaison with the Secretary of Defense's economic adjustment staff, (2) coordinate agency support and participation in assistance projects, and (3) assist in resolving community impact problems.

(b) All Executive agencies shall:

(1) Support, to the extent permitted by law, the economic adjustment assistance activities of the Secretary of Defense. Such support shall include the use and application of personnel, technical expertise, legal authorities, and available financial resources to the extent required to provide a coordinated Federal response to the needs of individual communities, States, and regions adversely affected by necessary Defense changes.

(2) Afford priority consideration to community requests for Federal technical assistance, financial resources, excess or surplus property, or other requirements that are part of a comprehensive plan issued by the Economic Adjustment Committee.

SEC. 4. Construction. Nothing in this Order shall be construed as subjecting any function vested by law in, or assigned pursuant to law to, any agency or head thereof to the authority of any other agency or officer or as abrogating or restricting any such function in any manner.

Defense Economic Adjustment Programs

Memorandum From the President.
March 27, 1978

Memorandum for the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Sec- retary of Labor, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the Secretary of Transportation, the Secretary of Energy, the Chairman, Civil Service Commission, the Director, Community Services Administration, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency, the Administrator, General Services Administration, the Director, Office of Management and Budget, the Administrator, Small Business Administration, the Director of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency

This Administration has initiated a major effort to strengthen military effectiveness and to reduce unnecessary Defense expenditures. Many required changes can be implemented with minimal impact on individuals and communities. Other changes, however, will involve a requirement to close installations or eliminate jobs and these could result in a serious economic impact in some localities.

I am fully committed to a reduction in Defense costs, but the burden should not be borne solely by the citizens who happen to reside or work in an impacted area. Therefore, I am equally committed to the implementation of these changes in a manner that reflects my genuine concern for those individuals and communities that are directly affected.

I have asked Secretary Brown to continue to chair the Economic Adjustment Committee in order to assure that coordinated Federal assistance is provided to impacted communities when it is required and that increased consideration is given to social and economic impacts in the implementation of Defense realignment actions.

The Economic Adjustment Committee has helped many communities to successfully overcome the impact of Defense changes in the past. The scope and extent of possible future changes, however, impose a requirement for increased participation and priority attention by all agencies involved with the Committee. To meet this need, I have today signed an Executive Order designating you as a member of the Committee. I have also designated Jack Watson, my Assistant for Intergovernmental Affairs and Secretary to the Cabinet, as a member of this Committee. Additionally, you should name a representative to work closely with the permanent Committee staff in the Office of Economic Adjustment.

My objective in issuing the order to strengthen the Committee is to assure that available Federal resources are coordinated and targeted in a manner that is responsive to the most important needs of Defense impacted communities. Priority consideration should be given to requirements for technical and financial assistance or other actions that may be required to support the Committee's projects.

You will appreciate that Defense impacts vary widely and they pose a complex challenge for the affected communities and states. They also serve as a test of the ability of the Federal departments and agencies to provide effective assistance. I therefore expect you to review your agency's support of economic adjustment assistance projects with the objective of identifying improvements, wherever possible.

Recognizing that funding and property are two Federal resources most often required to resolve local impact problems, I have asked the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to (1) review arrangements for identification of economic adjustment resources in the budgets of appropriate Federal agency programs, and (2) work with the Department of Defense and the General Services Administration to ensure that Federal property procedures are streamlined to expedite the interim use and transfer of excess base properties for job-generating purposes at prices the impacted communities can afford to pay.

In addition, I have asked the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to review the adequacy of the arrangements for the implementation of this Executive Order. Your cooperation with the Secretary of Defense and the Director of OMB will enable us to implement necessary Defense changes and render more effective Federal assistance to those in need.

Harry S Truman Scholarship Foundation

*Nomination of Anita M. Miller To Be a Member of the Board of Trustees.
March 27, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Anita M. Miller, of Sacramento, Calif., to be a member of the Board of Trustees of the Harry S Truman Scholarship Foundation for a term expiring December 10, 1983. She would replace Jonathan Moore, whose term has expired.

Miller, 49, is president of the National Association of Commissions for Women, a national network of official governmental commissions on the status of women. She is also president and executive director of the Institute for Studies in Equality.

The President's Trip to Latin America and Africa

Announcement Concerning Members of the Official Party During the Visit to Africa. March 27, 1978

Margaret Buckner Young and Jesse Hill, Jr., will be members of President Carter's official party on the Nigeria and Liberia portions of the President's trip to South America and Africa.

The President thought it would be appropriate that two such prominent black American leaders be members of the official party on the first state visit ever paid to black Africa by an American President. He thinks highly of Mrs. Young and Mr. Hill and asked that they join him on his trip.

Mrs. Young and Mr. Hill are expected to join the Carter traveling party in Rio de Janeiro Friday morning and remain with the party the rest of the trip.

Mrs. Young is the chairperson of the Whitney M. Young, Jr., Memorial Foundation. She is also an author. She is the widow of the late Whitney M. Young, Jr., a noted national black leader and the former head of the National Urban League (1961-1971).

Mrs. Young, a native of Campbells-ville, Ky., has written four children's books: "First Book of American Negroes," "The Picture Life of Martin Luther King, Jr.," "The Picture Life of Thurgood Marshall," and "Black American Leaders."

She was recently appointed by the President to be a member of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy.

Hill is the president and chief executive officer of the Atlanta Life Insurance Co. The insurance company is the largest stockholder life insurance company or financial institution controlled and managed by black Americans.

Mr. Hill, a native of St. Louis, Mo., is also the president of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce and is the holder of numerous civic positions—including memberships on the boards of directors of the National Urban Coalition, the National Urban League, and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Domestic Council, Office of Drug Abuse Policy, and Economic Opportunity Council

RELATING TO THE DOMESTIC POLICY STAFF, THE OFFICE OF DRUG ABUSE POLICY, AND THE ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY COUNCIL

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including Section 7 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101 (October 21, 1977)), Section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950 (31 U.S.C. 581c), and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for transfers of the functions of the Office of Drug Abuse Policy, the Domestic Council, and the Economic Opportunity Council, and the abolition of the Office of Drug Abuse Policy, the Domestic Council, and the Economic Opportunity Council, and for other purposes, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. (a) The transfer of all functions of the Domestic Council, as provided by Section 5D of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), is hereby effective.

(b) The redesignation of the Domestic Council Staff as the Domestic Policy Staff and the other provisions of Section 1 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), are hereby effective.

(c) The abolition of the Domestic Council, as provided by Section 3A of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), is hereby effective.

(d) The Domestic Policy Staff shall perform such functions as the President may from time to time direct.

SEC. 2. (a) The transfer of all functions of the Office of Drug Abuse Policy and its Director, as provided by Section 5C of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), is hereby effective.

(b) The abolition of the Office of Drug Abuse Policy, as provided by Section 3B of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), is hereby effective.

(c) The Domestic Policy Staff shall assist the President in the performance of the functions transferred by Section 5C of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101).

SEC. 3. (a) The transfer of all functions of the Economic Opportunity Council, as provided by Section 5G of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), is hereby effective.

(b) The abolition of the Economic Opportunity Council, as provided by Section 3D of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), is hereby effective.

SEC. 4. All provisions of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101) not made effective on or prior to the effective date of this order are hereby effective.

SEC. 5. The records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations, available or to be made available, which relate to the functions transferred, assigned, or delegated as provided in this Order are hereby transferred as appropriate.

SEC. 6. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall make such determinations, issue such orders, and take all actions necessary or appropriate to effectuate the transfers or reassignments provided in this Order, including the transfer of funds, records, property, and personnel.

SEC. 7. This Order shall be effective March 26, 1978.

Telecommunications Functions

Executive Order 12046. March 27, 1978

RELATING TO THE TRANSFER OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS FUNCTIONS

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including Section 7 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101 (October 21, 1977)), the authority and control vested in the President by Section 2 of Executive Order No. 11556, as amended, Section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950 (31 U.S.C. 581c), and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for the transfer of certain telecommunications functions, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1

REORGANIZATION PLAN

1-1. Implementation of Reorganization Plan.

1-101. The transfer of all the functions of the Office of Telecommunications Policy and of its Director, as provided by Section 5B of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 (42 FR 56101), is hereby effective.

1-102. The abolition of the Office of Telecommunications Policy, as provided by Section 3C of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977, is hereby effective.

1-103. The establishment of an Assistant Secretary for Communications and Information, Department of Commerce, as provided by Section 4 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977, is hereby effective.

1-2. Telecommunications Function.

1-201. Prior to the effective date of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977, the Office of Telecommunications Policy and its Director had the functions set forth or referenced by: (1) Section 1 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1970 (5 U.S.C. App. II), (2) Executive Order No. 11556 of September 4, 1970, as amended (47 U.S.C. 305 note), (3) Executive Order No. 11191 of January 4, 1965, as amended (47 U.S.C. 721 note), (4) Executive Order No. 10705 of April 17, 1957, as amended (47 U.S.C. 606 note), and (5) Presidential Memorandum of August 21, 1963, as amended by Executive Order No. 11556 and entitled "Establishment of the National Communications System."

1-202. So much of those functions which relate to the preparation of Presidential telecommunications policy options or to the disposition of appeals from assignments of radio frequencies to stations of the United States Government were transferred to the President. These functions may be delegated within the Executive Office of the President and the delegations are set forth in this Order at Sections 3-1 through 4-3.

1-203. Those telecommunications functions which were not transferred to the President were transferred to the Secretary of Commerce. Functions transferred to the Secretary are set forth in this Order at Sections 2-1 through 2-5.

SECTION 2

FUNCTIONS TRANSFERRED TO COMMERCE

2-1. Radio Frequencies.

2-101. The authority of the President to assign frequencies to radio stations or to classes of radio stations belonging to and operated by the United States, including the authority to amend, modify, or revoke such assignments, was transferred to the Secretary of Commerce.

2-102. This authority, which was originally vested in the President by Section 305(a) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 305(a)), was transferred and assigned to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by Section 1 of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1970 and Section 3 of Executive Order No. 11556.

2-103. The authority to assign frequencies to radio stations is subject to the authority to dispose of appeals from frequency assignments as set forth in Section 3-2 of this Order.

2-2. Construction of Radio Stations.

2-201. The authority to authorize a foreign government to construct and operate a radio station at the seat of government of the United States was transferred to the Secretary of Commerce. Authorization for the construction and operation of a radio station pursuant to this authority and the assignment of a frequency for its use can be made only upon recommendation of the Secretary of State and after consultation with the Attorney General and the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

2-202. This authority, which was originally vested in the President by Section 305(d) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 305), was delegated to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by Section 5 of Executive Order No. 11556.

2-3. Communications Satellite System.

2-301. Certain functions relating to the communications satellite system were transferred to the Secretary of Commerce. Those functions were delegated or assigned to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by Executive Order No. 11191, as amended by Executive Order No. 11556. The functions include authority vested in the President by Section 201(a) of the Communications Satellite Act of 1962 (76 Stat. 421, 47 U.S.C. 721(a)). These functions are specifically set forth in the following provisions of this Section.

(a) Aid in the planning and development of the commercial communications satellite system and aid in the execution of a national program for the operation of such a system.

(b) Conduct a continuous review of all phases of the development and operation of such system, including the activities of the Corporation.

(c) Coordinate, in consultation with the Secretary of State, the activities of governmental agencies with responsibilities in the field of telecommunications, so as to insure that there is full and effective compliance at all times with the policies set forth in the Act.

(d) Make recommendations to the President and others as appropriate, with respect to all steps necessary to insure the availability and appropriate utilization of the communications satellite system for general government purposes in consonance with Section 201(a)(6) of the Act.

(e) Help attain coordinated and efficient use of the electromagnetic spectrum and the technical compatibility of the communications satellite system with existing communications facilities both in the United States and abroad.

(f) Assist in the preparation of Presidential action documents for consideration by the President as may be appropriate under Section 201(a) of the Act, make necessary recommendations to the President in connection therewith, and keep the President currently informed with respect to the carrying out of the Act.

(g) Serve as the chief point of liaison between the President and the Corporation.

(h) The Secretary of Commerce shall timely submit to the President each year the report (including evaluations and recommendations) provided for in Section 404(a) of the Act (47 U.S.C. 744(a)).

(i) The Secretary of Commerce shall coordinate the performance of these functions with the Secretary of State. The Corporation and other concerned Executive agencies shall provide the Secretary of Commerce with such assistance, documents, and other cooperation as will enable the Secretary to carry out these functions.

2-4. Other Telecommunications Functions. Certain functions assigned, subject to the authority and control of the President to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by Section 2 of Executive Order No. 11556 were transferred to the Secretary of Commerce. These functions, subject to the authority and control of the President, are set forth in the following subsections.

2-401. The Secretary of Commerce shall serve as the President's principal adviser on telecommunications policies pertaining to the Nation's economic and technological advancement and to the regulation of the telecommunications industry.

2-402. The Secretary of Commerce shall advise the Director of the Office of Management and Budget on the development of policies relating to the procurement and management of Federal telecommunications systems.

2-403. The Secretary of Commerce shall conduct studies and evaluations concerning telecommunications research and development, and concerning the initiation, improvement, expansion, testing, operation, and use of Federal telecommunications systems. The Secretary shall advise appropriate agencies, including the Office of Management and Budget, of the recommendations which result from such studies and evaluations.

2-404. The Secretary of Commerce shall develop and set forth, in coordination with the Secretary of State and other interested agencies, plans, policies, and programs which relate to international telecommunications issues, conferences, and negotiations. The Secretary of Commerce shall coordinate economic, technical, operational and related preparations for United States participation in international telecommunications conferences and negotiations. The Secretary shall provide advice and assistance to the Secretary of State on international telecommunications policies to strengthen the position and serve the best interests of the United States, in support of the Secretary of State's responsibility for the conduct of foreign affairs.

2-405. The Secretary of Commerce shall provide for the coordination of the telecommunications activities of the Executive Branch, and shall assist in the formulation of policies and standards for those activities, including but not limited to considerations of interoperability, privacy, security, spectrum use and emergency readiness.

2-406. The Secretary of Commerce shall develop and set forth telecommunications policies pertaining to the Nation's economic and technological advancement and to the regulation of the telecommunications industry.

2-407. The Secretary of Commerce shall ensure that the Executive Branch views on telecommunications matters are effectively presented to the Federal Communications Commission and, in coordination with the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, to the Congress.

2-408. The Secretary of Commerce shall establish policies concerning spectrum assignments and use by radio stations belonging to and operated by the United States. Agencies shall consult with the Secretary of Commerce to ensure that their conduct of telecommunications activities is consistent with those policies.

2-409. The Secretary of Commerce shall develop, in cooperation with the Federal Communications Commission, a comprehensive long-range plan for improved management of all electromagnetic spectrum resources.

2-410. The Secretary of Commerce shall conduct studies and make recommendations concerning the impact of the convergence of computer and communications technology.

2-411. The Secretary of Commerce shall coordinate Federal telecommunications assistance to State and local governments.

2-412. The Secretary of Commerce shall conduct and coordinate economic and technical analyses of telecommunications policies, activities, and opportunities in support of assigned responsibilities.

2-413. The Secretary of Commerce shall contract for studies and reports related to any aspect of assigned responsibilities.

2-414. The Secretary of Commerce shall participate with the National Security Council and the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy in carrying out their functions under Sections 4-1, 4-2, and 4-3 of this Order, and may perform specific staff services for them as requested.

2-5. Consultation Responsibilities.

2-501. The authority to establish coordinating committees, as assigned to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by Section 10 of Executive Order No. 11556, was transferred to the Secretary of Commerce.

2-502. As permitted by law, the Secretary of Commerce shall establish such interagency committees and working groups composed of representatives of interested agencies, and shall consult with such departments and agencies as may be necessary for the most effective performance of his functions. To the extent he deems it necessary to continue the Interdepartment Radio Advisory Committee, that Committee shall serve in an advisory capacity to the Secretary. As permitted by law, the Secretary also shall establish one or more telecommunications advisory committees composed of experts in the telecommunications area outside the Government.

SECTION 3

FUNCTIONS ASSIGNED TO THE OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

3-1. Telecommunications Procurement and Management.

3-101. The responsibility for serving as the President's principal adviser on procurement and management of Federal Telecommunications systems and the responsibility for developing and establishing policies for procurement and management of such systems, which responsibilities were assigned to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy subject to the authority and control of the President by Section 2(b) of Executive Order No. 11556, were transferred to the President.

3-102. These functions are delegated to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

3-2. Radio Frequency Appeals.

3-201. The authority to make final disposition of appeals from frequency assignments by the Secretary of Commerce for radio stations belonging to and operated by the United States, which authority was vested in the President by Section 305(a) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 305(a)) and transferred to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1970 (5 U.S.C. App. II), was transferred to the President.

3-202. This function is delegated to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

SECTION 4

FUNCTIONS ASSIGNED TO THE NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL AND THE OFFICE OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY POLICY

4-1. Emergency Functions.

4-101. The war power functions of the President under Section 606 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 606), which were delegated to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by the provisions of Section 4 of Executive Order No. 10705, were transferred to the President.

4-102. The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall prepare to direct the exercise of these functions, and the National Security Council shall prepare to exercise appropriate policy direction, should the President so instruct. These instructions would be given in accordance with the National Emergencies Act (90 Stat. 1255, 50 U.S.C. 1601).

4-103. The Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy shall prepare Presidential policy options with respect to the evaluation by appropriate means, including suitable tests, of the capability of existing and planned communications systems to meet national security and emergency preparedness requirements, and report the results and any recommended remedial actions to the President and the National Security Council.

4-2. National Communications System.

4-201. The responsibility for policy direction of the development and operation of a National Communications System, which was assigned to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy by the Presidential Memorandum of August 21, 1963, as amended by Executive Order No. 11556, was transferred to the President.

4-202. The function is more particularly identified, and is delegated to the National Security Council, in the amendments made by Section 6-101 of this Order to the President's Memorandum of August 21, 1963.

4-3. Planning Functions.

4-301. The function of coordinating the development of policy, plans, programs, and standards for the mobilization and use of the Nation's telecommunications resources in any emergency, which function was assigned to the Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy subject to the authority and control of the President by Section 2(h) of Executive Order No. 11556, was transferred to the President.

4-302. The National Security Council shall assist the President in the performance of this function.

SECTION 5

RELATED TELECOMMUNICATIONS FUNCTIONS

5-1. The Department of Commerce.

5-101. The Secretary of Commerce shall continue to perform the following functions previously assigned by Section 13 of Executive Order No. 11556:

(a) Perform analysis, engineering, and administrative functions, including the maintenance of necessary files and data bases, as necessary in the performance of assigned responsibilities for the management of electromagnetic spectrum.

(b) Conduct research and analysis of electromagnetic propagation, radio systems characteristics, and operating techniques affecting the utilization of the electromagnetic spectrum in coordination with specialized, related research and analysis performed by other Federal agencies in their areas of responsibility.

(c) Conduct research and analysis in the general field of telecommunications sciences in support of assigned functions and in support of other Government agencies.

5-102. The Secretary of Commerce shall participate, as appropriate, in evaluating the capability of telecommunications resources, in recommending remedial actions, and in developing policy options.

5-2. Department of State.

5-201. With respect to telecommunications, the Secretary of State shall exercise primary authority for the conduct of foreign policy, including the determination of United States positions and the conduct of United States participation in negotiations with foreign governments and international bodies. In exercising this responsibility the Secretary of State shall coordinate with other agencies as appropriate, and, in particular, shall give full consideration to the Federal Communications Commission's regulatory and policy responsibility in this area.

5-202. The Secretary of State shall continue to perform the following functions previously assigned by Executive Order No. 11191, as amended:

(a) Exercise the supervision provided for in Section 201(a)(4) of the Communications Satellite Act of 1962, as amended (47 U.S.C. 721(a)(4)); be responsible, although the Secretary of Commerce is the chief point of liaison, for instructing the Communications Satellite Corporation in its role as the designated United States representative to the International Telecommunications Satellite Organization; and direct the foreign relations of the United States with respect to actions under the Communications Satellite Act of 1962, as amended.

(b) Coordinate, in accordance with the applicable interagency agreements, the performance of these functions with the Secretary of Commerce, the Federal Communications Commission, other concerned Executive agencies, and the Communications Satellite Corporation (see 47 U.S.C. 731-735). The Corporation and other concerned Executive agencies shall provide the Secretary of State with such assistance, documents, and other cooperation as will enable the Secretary to carry out these functions.

5-3. General Services Administration. The Administrator of General Services shall coordinate with the Secretary of Commerce, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, and the National Security Council the development of policies, plans, programs, and standards for the emergency use of telecommunications.

SECTION 6

GENERAL PROVISIONS

6-1. Transfer Provisions.

6-101. In order to reflect the transfer and assignment made by Section 5B of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977 and Section 13 of this Order, the President's Memorandum of August 21, 1963, entitled "Establishment of the National Communications System" (28 FR 9413, 3 CFR 1959-1963 Compilation) as amended by Section 8 of Executive Order No. 11556, is further amended as follows:

(a) Delete the first paragraph after the heading "Executive Office Responsibilities" and substitute therefor:

"The National Security Council shall be responsible for Presidential policy options concerning the development and operation of the National Communications System (NCS) and shall:".

(b) Delete the last two paragraphs in that part of the memo headed "Executive Office Responsibilities" and substitute therefor:

"In performing these functions, the National Security Council will consult with the Secretary of Commerce, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, and the Administrator of General Services, as appropriate; will establish arrangements for interagency consultation to ensure that the NSC will meet essential needs of all government agencies; and will be responsible for carrying on the work formerly done by the Subcommittee on Communications of the Executive Committee of the National Security Council. In addition to staff regularly assigned, the National Security Council and the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy may arrange for the detail or temporary assignment of communications and other specialists from any agency.

"The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, in consultation with the National Security Council, the Secretary of Commerce, the Administrator of General Services, and the Executive Agent of the NCS, will prescribe general guidelines and procedures for reviewing the financing of the NCS within the budgetary process and for preparation of budget estimates by participating agencies."

(c) In the paragraph after the heading "Agency Responsibilities", delete "Director of the Office of Telecommunications Policy" and substitute therefor "National Security Council."

6-102. The primary responsibility for performing all administrative support and service functions that are related to functions transferred from the Office of Telecommunications Policy and its Director to the President, including those functions delegated or assigned within the Executive Office of the President, are transferred to the Office of Administration. The Domestic Policy Staff shall perform such functions related to the preparation of Presidential telecommunications policy options as the President may from time to time direct.

6-103. The records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations, available or to be made available, which relate to the functions transferred, assigned, or delegated as provided in this Order are hereby transferred as appropriate.

6-104. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall make such determinations, issue such orders, and take all actions necessary or appropriate to effectuate the transfers or reassignments provided in this Order, including the transfer of funds, records, property, and personnel.

6-2. Amendments. In order to reflect the transfers provided by this Order, the following conforming amendments and revocations are ordered:

6-201. Section 306 of Executive Order No. 11051, as amended, is further amended to read:

"Sec. 306. Emergency telecommunications. The Administrator of General Services shall be responsible for coordinating with the National Security Council in planning for the mobilization of the Nation's telecommunications resources in time of national emergency."

6-202. Executive Order No. 11490, as amended is further amended by:

(1) substituting "National Security Council" for "Office of Telecommunications Policy (35 FR 6421)" in Section 401(27), and

(2) substituting the number of this Order for "11556" and deleting references to Executive Order No. 10705 in Sections 1802 and 2002(3).

6-203. Executive Order No. 11725, as amended, is further amended by substituting the number and date of this Order for the reference to Executive Order No. 11556 of September 4, 1970 in Section 3(16).

6-204. Executive Orders No. 10705, as amended, No. 11191, as amended, and No. 11556, as amended, are revoked.

6-3. General.

6-301. All Executive agencies to which functions are assigned pursuant to this Order shall issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry them out.

6-302. All Executive agencies are authorized and directed to cooperate with the departments and agencies to which functions are assigned pursuant to this Order and to furnish them such information, support and assistance, not inconsistent with law, as they may require in the performance of those functions.

6-303. (a) Nothing in this Order re-assigns any function assigned any agency under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, nor does anything in this Order impair the existing authority of the Administrator of General Services to provide and operate telecommunications services and to prescribe policies and methods of procurement, or impair the policy and oversight roles of the Office of Management and Budget.

(b) In carrying out the functions in this Order, the Secretary of Commerce shall coordinate activities as appropriate with the Federal Communications Commission and make appropriate recommendations to it as the regulator of the private sector. Nothing in this Order re-assigns any function vested by law in the Federal Communications Commission.

6-304. This Order shall be effective March 26, 1978.

Imported Objects of Cultural Significance

Executive Order 12047. March 27, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Act of October 19, 1965, entitled "An Act to render immune from seizure under judicial process certain objects of cultural significance imported into the United States for temporary display or exhibition, and for other purposes" (79 Stat. 985, 22 U.S.C. 2459), and as President of the United States of America, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. The Director of the International Communication Agency is designated and empowered to perform the functions conferred upon the President by the above-mentioned Act and shall be deemed to be authorized, without the approval, ratification, or other action of the President, (1) to determine that any work of art or other object to be imported into the United States within the meaning of the Act is of cultural significance, (2) to determine that the temporary exhibition or display of any such work of art or other object in the United States is in the national interest, and (3) to cause public notices of the redeterminations referred to above to be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

SEC. 2. The Director of the International Communication Agency, in carrying out this Order, shall consult with the Secretary of State with respect to the determination of national interest, and may consult with the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the Director of the National Gallery of Art, and with such other officers and agencies of the Government as may be appropriate, with respect to the determination of cultural significance.

SEC. 3. The Director of the International Communication Agency is authorized to delegate within the Agency the functions conferred upon him by this Order.

SEC. 4. Executive Order No. 11312 of October 14, 1966 is revoked.

SEC. 5. Any order, regulation, determination or other action which was in effect pursuant to the provisions of Executive Order No. 11312 shall remain in effect until changed pursuant to the authority provided in this Order.

SEC. 6. This Order shall be effective on April 1, 1978.

International Communication Agency

Executive Order 12048. March 27, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including Section 11 of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1977 (42 FR 62461 (December 13, 1977)), Section 202 of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950 (31 U.S.C. 581c), and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for the establishment of the International Communication Agency, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. (a) Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1977 (42 FR 62461), which establishes the International Communication Agency, except for Section 7(a)(14) thereof, is hereby effective.

(b) Section 7(a)(14) of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1977, relating to the Woodrow Wilson Memorial Act of 1968, shall be effective on July 1, 1978.

SEC. 2. The functions vested in the Secretary of State by Executive Order No. 11312 are assigned and redelegated to the Director of the International Communication Agency. All authority vested in the United States Information Agency or its Director by Executive order is reassigned and redelegated to the International Communication Agency or its Director, respectively.

SEC. 3. In order to ensure appropriate coordination among the Executive agencies, the Director of the International Communication Agency shall exercise primary responsibility for Government-wide policy guidance for international informational, educational, and cultural activities, including exchange programs.

The Director shall take into account the statutory functions of the other concerned Executive agencies.

SEC. 4. The Director of the International Communication Agency, with the assistance of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, shall prepare and submit to the President the reports which the President is to transmit to the Congress pursuant to Section 108(b) of the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961, as amended (22 U.S.C. 2458).

SEC. 5. The functions vested in the President by Sections 108(c) and 108(d) of the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961, as amended, are delegated to the Director of the International Communication Agency; because, (a) such a delegation is in the interest of the purposes expressed in that Act and the efficient administration of the programs undertaken pursuant thereto, (b) the Director is an appropriate official to perform those functions, and (c) those functions are not now delegated to any other officer of the Government.

SEC. 6. The Director of the International Communication Agency shall be the principal adviser to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of State on international informational, educational, and cultural matters. As such, the Director shall provide advice within the policy formulation activities of the National Security Council when such matters are considered. The Director shall ensure that the senior official of the Agency at each diplomatic mission provides advice to the Chief of Mission on such matters. The scope of the Director's advice shall include assessments of the impact of actual and proposed United States foreign policy decisions on public opinion abroad.

SEC. 7. The records, property, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations, available or to be made available, which relate to the functions transferred or reassigned, or redelegated as provided in this Order, are hereby transferred to the Director of the International Communication Agency.

SEC. 8. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall make such determinations, issue such orders, and take all actions, necessary or appropriate to effectuate the transfers or reassignments provided in this Order, including the transfer of funds, records, property, and personnel.

SEC. 9. This Order shall be effective on April 1, 1978.

Citizens Band Radio Transceivers

Letter to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate Transmitting a Report. March 27, 1978

Dear Mr. Speaker: (Dear Mr. President:)

In accordance with section 203(b)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974, enclosed is a report to the Congress setting forth my decision to modify the import relief recommendation of three Commissioners of the U.S. International Trade Commission (USITC) by proclaiming a moderate tariff increase for Citizens Band (CB) Radio Transceivers and giving the reasons for my decision and why the import relief recommended by the USITC is not in the national economic interest.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

As required by section 203(b)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974, I am transmitting this report to Congress setting forth the actions I will take with respect to citizens band (CB) radio transceivers covered by the affirmative injury finding of the U.S. International Trade Commission (USITC) reported to the President on February 3, 1978, under section 201(d)(1) of the Trade Act. As my decision provides import relief which differs from the action recommended by the USITC, I am setting forth the reasons for such difference.

After considering all relevant aspects of the case, including those considerations set forth in section 202(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, I have determined that neither of the recommendations of the USITC are appropriate in this case. I have, however, determined that import relief is in the national economic interest and therefore will proclaim a tariff increase with respect to citizens band (CB) radio transceivers (except hand-held), of 15 additional percentage points in the first year, to be phased down in three percentage point decrements for the following two years. The duty will then revert to its current rate of six percent ad valorem.

Expedited adjustment assistance would be ineffective in helping the industry cope with current problems of severe inventory overhang, low prices, and financial losses.

The import relief recommended by the USITC of a 30 percentage point tariff increase is not in the national economic interest because it would substantially increase costs to consumers. In a time when we are striving to control inflation, this cost would be too high.

The moderate tariff increase over a three-year period that I will proclaim will have a much smaller price effect than the 30 percentage point added duty over a five-year period recommended by the USITC. Furthermore, CBs are a final consumer good precluding ripple price effects on other goods.

The moderate tariff increase, when coupled with the recent appreciation in the Japanese yen (about 25%), would enable domestically produced CBs to be competitively priced relative to Japanese imports. Japanese imports represent about 85% of the total. The Republic of China and Korea and Hong Kong supply almost all the remainder (14%). Domestic manufacturers may be able to expand their share of the market. This could be achieved by utilizing their already developed, but now excess, capacity.

Firms and workers and communities would remain eligible for adjustment assistance.

Pursuant to section 202(b) of the Trade Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-618, 88 Stat. 1978), I have determined the action I will take with respect to the report of the United States International Trade Commission (USITC), transmitted to me on February 3, 1978, concerning the results of its investigation of a petition for import relief filed by E. G. Johnson Company on behalf of the domestic industry producing citizens band (CB) radio transceivers, provided for in item 685.25 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States.

After considering all relevant aspects of the case, including those considerations set forth in section 202(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, I have determined that neither of the recommendations of the USITC are appropriate in this case. I have, however, determined that import relief is in the national economic interest and therefore will proclaim a tariff increase with respect to Citizens Band (CB) radio transceivers (except hand-held), provided for in item 685.25 of the TSUS, of 15 additional percentage points in the first year, to be phased down in three percentage point decrements for the following two years. The duty would then revert to its current rate of six percent ad valorem.

Expedited adjustment assistance would be ineffective in helping the industry cope with current problems of severe inventory overhang, low prices, and financial losses.

The import relief recommended by the USITC of a 30 percentage point tariff increase is not in the national economic interest because it would substantially increase costs to consumers. In a time when we are striving to control inflation, this cost would be too high.

The moderate tariff increase over a three year period that I will proclaim will have a much smaller price effect than the 30 percentage point added duty over five years recommended by the USITC. Furthermore, CBs are a final consumer good precluding ripple price effects on other goods.

The moderate tariff increase would enable domestically produced CBs to be competitively priced relative to imports. Domestic manufacturers may be able to expand their share of the market. This could be achieved by utilizing their already developed, but now excess, capacity.

Firms and workers and communities would still remain eligible for adjustment assistance.

This determination is to be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

Energy Emergency in Pennsylvania

*Statement on Extending the Energy
Emergency Determination. March 27, 1978*

Based on a petition submitted to me by the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania pursuant to Section 110(f) of the Clean Air Act, I determined on February 24, 1978, that a regional energy emergency existed in the State of Pennsylvania of such severity that a temporary suspension of certain particulate and sulfur dioxide control regulations under the Pennsylvania Air Quality Implementation Plan might be necessary. I ordered the determination to be in effect for not more than 30 days unless I rescinded it before that time or extended it. Because of continuing energy supply problems throughout the State, I hereby extend the regional energy emergency determination for the State of Pennsylvania for a second 30-day period. During this extension, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency retains full authority to disapprove temporary suspensions of regulations in Pennsylvania on a case-by-case basis and to exercise his emergency powers authority under Section 303 of the Clean Air Act, when and if necessary.

I urge the Governor to continue to act with due care if he further suspends any air pollution regulations under the authority provided by the extension of this determination, since such regulations are important to protect public health.

NOTE: The statement was released on March 28.

The Presidential determination of March 27 is printed in the FEDERAL REGISTER of March 30, 1978.

The President's Trip to Latin America and Africa

Remarks on Departure From the White House. March 28, 1978

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. President and Rosalynn:

In our complete commitment to the success of this journey, we've decided to send with the President a mature adviser on foreign affairs, and I'm pleased to announce that we've been successful in our plans. Mr. Zbig Brzezinski, who is today 50 years old, carries with him all of those years and all of that experience and will bring that new talent and background to bear to assure the success of this mission.

Mr. President, in your commencement address at Notre Dame last year, you said that American foreign policy is based on an historical vision of America's role; derived from a larger view of global change; rooted in our moral values, which never change; reinforced by our military wealth and our material power; designed to serve mankind.

You pledged in your Notre Dame address that we will cooperate more closely with the newly influential countries in Latin America, Africa, and Asia. You said we need their friendship and cooperation in a common effort as the structure of the world changes.

The strength of your commitment to these objectives is demonstrated clearly by your travel this week to Venezuela, Brazil, Nigeria, and Liberia. Your journey underlines our friendship with these nations and the determination of the United States to work with them.

Mr. President and Rosalynn, we know your trip will be a success. You take with you the admiration and love of the American people, and we look forward to having you back with us.

THE PRESIDENT. When the Vice President was announcing that I was taking my senior foreign affairs adviser with me, I thought surely he was going to introduce Amy, who's also going on the trip. [Laughter]

Yesterday was Cy Vance's birthday. And we've all formed a very close and harmonious relationship as we've studied how our Nation should deal with foreign countries in the crucial element of preparing American people for the years ahead.

Today I leave on a journey which will reflect our own Nation's ability to deal in a constructive and a creative way with the diversity of the world in which we live. At every stop on this trip, our guiding principles will be economic justice, human rights, fair relations among nations, and a search for a peaceful resolution of the world's conflicts and potential conflicts.

We have special and longlasting ties with both Latin America and with Africa. Many of our people trace their roots to these two continents, and we share with these nations a history of freedom won through combat from colonial domination and rule.

The countries that I will visit exemplify the profound changes that are taking place and the growing importance of our relations with new leaders of the developing world. In Venezuela, in Brazil, in Nigeria, in Liberia we will attempt to strengthen friendships to share mutual interests and mutual opportunities and to learn from the leaders of these very influential nations.

By the end of this century, 80 percent of all the world's people will live in Latin America, Asia, and Africa. Rapidly developing countries such as the four that I will visit will play a larger and larger part in our own lives here in the United States. And in determining our shared human fate in this world of change, we will maintain our greatness only if we are able to change, while remaining true to the principles that have made our Nation strong.

I set out on this journey to explain our own American values proudly and clearly to our friends and to understand their opinions and their concerns. My greatest ambition will be to represent the people of my Nation truly and well. And that ambition, if realized, will ensure the success of my mission.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The exchange began at 7:35 a.m. on the South Lawn of the White House. Following the remarks, the Presidential party proceeded to Andrews Air Force Base, Md., where they departed for Venezuela.

The remarks were broadcast live on radio and television.

Telecommunications Functions

Statement on Signing Executive Order 12046.
March 28, 1978

I have signed an Executive order to implement the portion of my Executive Office reorganization plan that abolishes the Office of Telecommunications Policy. While reducing the size of the Executive Office, this reorganization will enhance the administration's ability to exercise leadership in communications policy.

Advances in communications are having a tremendous effect on the way people live. Developments in computers, satellites, electronic funds transfers, electronic mail, mobile radios, and cable TV will change many aspects of our daily lives. These changes pose important choices for our country.

The Office of Telecommunications Policy was never equipped to play a strong role in this debate. Now, for the first time, communications policy will be handled at the Cabinet level.

The Commerce Department will take the lead in conducting research, developing policy proposals, and representing the administration before Congress and the Federal Communications Commission. Commerce will also assign frequencies for the Federal Government's radio stations.

Some functions have been kept in the Executive Office because they could not be performed effectively in a line agency. The Office of Management and Budget will set policy for procurement and management of the Government's telecommunications systems and will decide appeals from Commerce's frequency assignments. The National Security Council and the Office of Science and Technology Policy will handle certain national security and emergency preparedness policy functions. The Domestic Policy Staff will keep me informed on communications developments.

I am pleased to have nominated a talented expert, Henry Geller, to handle Commerce's responsibilities. He will hold the new position of Assistant Secretary for Communications and Information.

NOTE: The text of Executive Order 12046 is printed on page 598 of this volume.

Federal Advisory Committees

*Announcement on Committee Reductions.
March 28, 1978*

President Carter reported today that the number of Federal advisory committees dropped last year to 875, the lowest since the Government started keeping close track of such groups.

The President ordered a stiff review of advisory committees a year ago, declaring that many had outlived their usefulness or were not providing balanced advice. The annual report he submitted to Congress on Monday reflected early results of that executive branch review. It found that as of last December 31:

- The number had decreased by 284, the largest cutback in the last 4 years.
- Fewer new committees were established in 1977, apart from those formed by merging existing groups.
- Of the 875 still operating, 228 are required by law.

Those 875 committees compared with 1,439 at the end of 1972. That was the year in which Congress passed the Federal Advisory Committee Act to control the number and makeup of committees.

Advisory committees are created by Congress and Executive order, but principally by department and agency heads. Their cost is estimated at $76 million in 1978.

The report showed substantial progress toward reaching targets set by the White House last August. Ninety percent of the 261 committees slated for elimination were out of business by the end of the year. The remainder included committees which can be abolished only by law.

In addition, 92 other committees were terminated as they finished their work or were found to be unnecessary.

More than one-third of scheduled committee consolidations also were accomplished, with 111 merged into 30 for a reduction of 81. Two major consolidations are due for early completion. These would combine 51 State committees of the Commission on Civil Rights and 63 district committees of the Small Business Administration into 10 each.

The General Services Administration has overall responsibility for advisory committee management. It plans a further review this year to carry out the President's directive that new committees be established only when essential and existing groups be terminated when no longer necessary.

Medic Alert Program

Statement by the President. March 28, 1978

The high quality of medical services in the United States continues to be a source of national pride. Too often, however, we tend to regard the responsibility for the quality of the medical treatment we receive as resting solely with health care professionals. We often overlook our own responsibility to assure that these professionals have the information necessary to provide proper and effective treatment, especially in emergencies.

For over 20 years, the Medic Alert Foundation International has dedicated itself to serving persons with hidden or special medical problems that cannot easily be seen or recognized. When, in time of emergency, its members may be unable to communicate, the Medic Alert bracelet or necklace indicates the general condition. A wallet card provides more details, and through its unique 24-hour, worldwide emergency medical answering system, Medic Alert gives medical personnel that individual's current situation.

Persons with heart conditions, diabetes, epilepsy, and severe allergies, and those who are taking special medication are among the many whose lives have been saved through the Medic Alert system. Indigent people can receive this valuable service free.

It is appropriate that the people of the United States consider the contributions to the public health of the Medic Alert program.

I applaud the contributions of the Medic Alert program to the public health, and urge Americans to give the Medic Alert program their full support.

Corporation for Public Broadcasting

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. March 28, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

Enclosed is the "Annual Report of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting for FY 1977," prepared in accordance with the requirement of Section 396(i) of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 (Public Law 90-129) as amended.

The Corporation has again prepared a thoughtful report which highlights its efforts for the past fiscal year. The accomplishments of public broadcasting are well articulated with emphasis on television and radio programming, technological innovation, and human development services.

It should be noted that the projections of long range Federal financial contributions from the Federal Government exceed levels contained in the Administration's legislative proposal to reauthorize the Corporation for the period FY 1981-85.

The Annual Report is being forwarded so that it is available to the Congress for its deliberations.

Caracas, Venezuela

PRESIDENT PÉREZ. Mr. President, Jimmy Carter, Mrs. Rosalynn:

It is with great satisfaction that we Venezuelans receive today your visit among us. You, President Carter, and your wife have been a very well known spokesman and advocates of the cause of universal democracy. For Venezuela, because of this reason, it is a very special satisfaction to have you here, and it is a great satisfaction for us to see that our homeland is the first country you visit in this trip to Latin America, Mr. President.

You come to Latin America at a time when all of our peoples are directing their eyes and their ears towards the Congress of the United States, towards this great debate which the Senate has at present, which will decide the fate of the relations between South America and North America. Each word pronounced there is of enormous importance, and it will have a very deep impact on Latin America.

When we, the Presidents and Chiefs of State of Latin America, went to Washington and met at the headquarters of the OAS, at that time all of our peoples of Latin America, whatever be their race, their creed, or the origin of their government, supported the treaties signed by you, Mr. President, and the Chief of State of Panama, General Omar Torrijos.

Never since the beginning of the Second World War, Latin American countries have expressed such a total solidarity as at that time.

This means that that day, on September 7, 1977, history was written in this hemisphere. This is the date when there was a deletion of the resentment between our peoples. This is the date which put an end to historical circumstances, just as the circumstances that were put to an end in the past between the United States and England, between Latin America and Spain. This is the immense meaning of that date.

And we all trust the Americanistic spirit of the Senate of the United States. We know that Republicans and Democrats represent there the people of the United States and the desire the American people have for liberty, dignity, and the sovereign rights which were first claimed in the United States in 1776, when you achieved your independence.

I say this, as I know that with my words I interpret the feelings of Latin America. We are very optimistic as far as the treaties are concerned, but I must be frank and say that we also see with great concern any parliamentary eventuality which might still appear.

However, we hope that this treaty will be parallel to a new era, this new era the Bicentennial of which you just celebrated in the United States, and we celebrated it with you also. We hope that this new treaty will be the beginning of a new era of new friendship between the United States and Latin America.

This trip, Mr. President, has also another very important meaning, and this trip means the ratification of your policy towards the problems of the Third World. The two countries you have decided to visit in Latin America are Venezuela and Brazil, and we consider this fact as an expression of your concern towards Latin American problems. Then you will go to Africa and visit Nigeria and Liberia, and again with such a visit, you will ratify the importance you give to Third World problems. We know that the Third World has in you a receptive and sincere listener and a person willing to dialog with the Third World towards the attainment of international justice.

With these brief words, I would like to tell you that your name has achieved today great dimensions in Latin America and in the world, because you have given an ethical meaning to the policies of your Government.

We, the Venezuelan people and the people of Latin America, feel deep satisfaction to see that the President of one of the most powerful countries of the world has given to human rights a high priority in the policies of his Government. These are new ethical values which you have opened in the policies of your country, and this is a new humanistic outlook you have given to world politics in general. And through it, you have helped to strengthen the struggle that people wage throughout the world towards their well-being, but their well-being with dignity.

Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, in the name of Venezuela, of my government, of my wife, and in my own name, I wish you to receive our most friendly welcome, and I would like to ask you to feel at home in this land of our liberator, Simón Bolívar.

PRESIDENT CARTER. Mr. President, my dear friends:

Thank you for your welcoming words.

I understand what has been said here. The ratification of the Panama treaties are also important for the United States.

This morning, I left the United States on a journey of 7 days and many thousands of miles. As I left, I told the people of my country that my purpose in making this trip would be to discuss with the leaders of four nations the great issues that will shape our future as a human family: peace, justice among individuals and among nations, the defense of human liberty, how to make the resources of the Earth meet the needs of all the world's people.

There is no place I would rather begin such a journey than here in Venezuela, my Nation's ally in support of democracy and one of the world's leaders in the solution of those issues that trouble us so much.

Of all the ties that unite our nations, none is stronger than the devotion we share to liberty. During my visit, I will place a wreath on the Pantheon of Simón Bolívar, who is as admired by my people as he is by yours. Whenever we honor one defender of liberty, we honor all whose lives served that great cause.

Just as our continents are linked, our destinies are linked as democratic nations.

We know that what in the modern world affects one nation eventually will affect all of us. That is why the strength of your democratic institutions here means so much to us.

We know that whenever the rights of any individual in the world are diminished, our own rights are in danger, and that wherever they are defended, as in Venezuela, our rights are strengthened.

Your country has many times shouldered the burden of reducing regional and international tensions and of attempting to reduce proliferation of conventional and nuclear arms. It is these responsibilities which we share that I wish to discuss with your President and my friend, Carlos Andrés Pérez.

We have united in seeking cooperation on energy and on the economic issues that exist between the nations of the North and South.

Venezuela has been an important and constructive leader in the movement toward greater regional cooperation—in the Andean Pact, in its contribution to the Caribbean Group, and in its creative direction in establishing SELA, the Latin American Economic System.

The people of Venezuela were most gracious and kind in the welcome that was extended to my wife, Rosalynn, on her visit here last year, and I am very happy to return with her.

I am proud to be here among friends.

NOTE: The exchange began at 1:22 p.m. at Simón Bolívar International Airport. President Pérez spoke in Spanish, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter. President Carter also spoke in Spanish, and the translation of his remarks follows the White House press release.

Caracas, Venezuela

I want to speak to all the Venezuelans and to the rest of our friends gathered here.

I am very moved. I have just offered in the name of my people the affection and respect due to the liberator Simón Bolívar. I have also just set foot on Venezuelan soil and felt the generous friendship of this great democracy.

Bolívar has not plowed in the sea. His inspiring presence and the goals that our two countries share are forces that inspire me and give me confidence in the success of our struggle for the dignity of man and the well-being of peoples in the Americas and throughout the world.

His dream and the dream of George Washington, of San Martín, of all those who struggle today for human liberty, will triumph.

I am happy to be with you.

Viva Venezuela!

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:57 p.m. at the Pantheon Plaza. He spoke in Spanish, and the translation of his remarks follows the White House press release.

Following the ceremony, President Carter and President Pérez proceeded to La Casona, the presidential residence, for meetings.

Caracas, Venezuela

Informal Exchange With Reporters Following Meetings Between President Carter and President Pérez. March 28, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. We signed agreements this afternoon between Venezuela and the United States which determined the maritime boundaries between ourselves and Venezuela.

This is the first agreement that Venezuela has signed with any other country. And the next step would be to reach an agreement on fishing rights between our two countries and the marine areas that we both control.

We also signed a very important agreement between ourselves and Venezuela to control narcotics. We have an increasing problem between South America and North America in the shipment of narcotics between the two continents, and we have already begun to cooperate very closely between our two countries to control these illegal shipments.

I might say that between the United States and Venezuela there are very few differences. I am blessed by having a friend in President Pérez with great experience in international affairs and also a great interest in the affairs of the world.

He also has a different perspective from the one that the President of the United States might have, and he has been a very good counselor for me in understanding the relationships that exist between the developed, industrial nations of the world on the one hand and the developing nations on the other.

So, we just expressed this afternoon new agreements that typify the good relations between us and the people of Venezuela.

Q. Do you think that the trade laws that affect foreign trade in our country might be derelict by the Congress of the United States?

PRESIDENT CARTER. Of course, we already enjoy a great trade with Venezuela. We purchase from your country roughly $4 billion worth of oil and other products each year. We sell to Venezuela about $1 billion less, about $3 billion.

I would guess that in the future we would move to increase the opportunities for trade and to remove any obstacles to favored-nation status that exist.

At the present time, our laws passed by Congress prevent the preferred trading status among nations who sell large quantities of oil, because they are soon to be very rich. But this may be changed in the future, and I would be glad to see the changes made.

Q. Could we ask both of you to comment on something? The Saudis have said they cannot promise to hold down the price of oil if the U.S. dollar continues to decline. Did the two of you discuss this today? And what is your understanding of President Pérez' position on this?

PRESIDENT CARTER. I might add that this afternoon we limited our discussions to political matters and to matters of bilateral nature and also international affairs.

Tomorrow morning we will continue our discussions, and they will be devoted to economic matters, including, of course, the value of the dollar, the price of oil, and other similar subjects. We have not yet discussed those subjects.

Q. Mr. President, did both of you discuss the question of human rights in a general way, and specifically, was there any discussion of criticism concerning the situation in Nicaragua and our position as opposed to the Venezuelan position?

PRESIDENT CARTER. It doesn't take long to discuss the question of human rights with the Venezuelan leaders, because we are in complete harmony on this subject.

I would say that Venezuela took a very early and very strong position on human rights, which we later adopted as our own. And we have worked closely with them, in the Organization of American States and individually with countries where human rights were threatened, to bring about a realization of those hopes that we both share.

We have had discussion about the situation in Nicaragua not only this afternoon, but President Pérez and I have exchanged correspondence continually about it, and several letters.

I have derived a great benefit from his advice. We are both concerned about the situation in Nicaragua, and we both feel that a delegation from the United Nations or the OAS should be welcomed into Nicaragua, and other countries where human rights are threatened, to provide the facts to the outside world.

We have a policy in our country, which I am insistent in maintaining, of not intervening in the internal affairs of other nations. But we have a right to express our own selves forcefully and also to encourage action on the part of the United Nations and OAS in going into countries to determine the facts.

I am sure that President Pérez would like to reply as well.

Q. Did you say also that there is no difference of opinion between the two of you on the question of Nicaragua?

PRESIDENT PÉREZ. [President Pérez responded in Spanish.]

PRESIDENT CARTER. Tomorrow we will make every attempt, President Pérez and I, to find some differences between ourselves and between our countries that might serve to titillate the press and to make a more newsworthy story. But I think President Pérez has accurately described the situation. We discussed these issues very thoroughly, and although I don't know the details of the beliefs of the officials of Venezuela, we did not detect any differences between us.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The exchange began at 5:30 p.m. at La Casona.

As printed above, the item follows the White House press release.

Caracas, Venezuela

Toast at the State Dinner. March 28, 1978

President and Mrs. Pérez, distinguished friends from Venezuela and from my own country:

It is a great honor and a pleasure for us—my wife, my daughter, and I—to be here with you.

I speak a little better Spanish than I understand, and I may have gotten a few words of the President incorrectly, and I'm sure he'll correct me tomorrow morning if I make a mistake. But I would like to thank him for his offer to reduce the price of oil 5 percent each year for the next 5 years and to lend the United States enough to balance our budget next year.

Thank you very much, Mr. President.
[Laughter]

I cannot hope to match the richness and the profound remarks of President Pérez. I will try to respond more fully to economic matters in my speech tomorrow morning to the Congress of Venezuela. But tonight, I do want to offer a few comments of my own.

As I said, I'm delighted to be with friends in Venezuela, not only because of the path that our nations are walking together but also because of the rare, personal friendship that has developed between President Pérez and me.

Since I took office, I've had an opportunity to meet with many foreign leaders—last year, more than 65. And in different ways, I have learned a lot about them all. But there are no others who have equaled the guidance and the vision of President Pérez, nor with whom I have felt such kinship of purpose. It is no coincidence that this is the third opportunity which I have arranged for extensive consultations with him.

President Pérez knows that I look upon him, in spite of his great youth, as a senior statesman. And he deserves this title in the finest sense of the term, for he has proven his statesmanship and also the maturity of his judgment.

The most satisfying aspect of our friendship is that it clearly reflects the compatibility between our governments and also between our people.
